But, on the power of congress to make internal improvements; ay, sir, on the power of congress, hear him! What were then his rules of construction and interpretation? How did he at that time read and understand the constitution? Why, sir, he said that "he was no advocate for refined arguments on the constitution. The instrument was not intended as a thesis for the logician to exercise his ingenuity on. It ought to be construed with plain good sense." This is all very just, I think, sir; and he said much more. He quoted many instances of laws, passed, as he contended, on similar principles, and then added, that "he introduced these instances to prove the uniform sense of congress and of the country, (for they had not been objected to,) as to our powers; and surely," said he, "they furnish better evidence of the true interpretation of the constitution than the most refined and subtle arguments."

Here, you see, Mr. President, how little original I am. You have heard me, again and again, contending in my place here for the stability of that which has been long settled; you have heard me, till I dare say you have been tired, insisting that the sense of congress, so often expressed, and the sense of the country, so fully known, and so firmly established, ought to be regarded as having decided, finally, certain constitutional questions. You see now, sir, what authority I have for this mode of argument. But while the scholar is learning, the teacher renounces. Will he apply his doctrine now—I sincerely wish he would—to the question of the bank, to the question of the receiving of bank notes by government, to the power of congress over the paper currency? Will he, sir, will he admit that these ought to be regarded as decided, by the settled sense of the congress of the country? Oh, no. Far otherwise. From these rules of judgment, and from the influence of all considerations of this practical nature, the honorable member now takes these questions with him into the upper heights of metaphysics, into the regions of these refinements and subtle arguments which he rejected with so much decision in 1817, as appears by this speech. He quits his old ground of common sense, experience, and the general understanding of the country, for a flight among theories and abstractions.

And now, sir, let me ask, when did the honorable member relinquish these early opinions and principles of his? When did he make known his adhesion to the doctrines of the state-rights party? We have been speaking of transactions in 1816 and 1817. What the gentleman's opinions then were, we have seen. But when did he announce himself a state-rights man? I have already said, sir, that nobody knew of his claiming that character until after the commencement of 1825; and I have said so, because I have before me an address of his to his neighbors of Abbeville, in May of that year, in which he recounts, very properly, the principal incidents in his career, as a member of congress, and as head of a department; and in which he says that, as a member of congress, he had given his zealous efforts in favor of a restoration of specie currency; of a due protection of those manufactures which had taken root during the war, and, finally, of a system for connecting the various parts of the country by a judicious system of internal improvement.

And he adds, that it afterwards became his duty, as a member of the administration, to aid in sustaining, against the boldest assaults, those very measures, which, as a member of congress, he had contributed to establish.

And now, sir, since the honorable gentleman says he differed from me on constitutional questions, will he be pleased to say what constitutional opinion I have ever expressed, for which I have not his express authority? Is it on the bank power? the tariff power? the power of internal improvement? I have shown his votes, his speeches, and his conduct, on all these subjects, up to the time when general Jackson became a candidate for the presidency. From that time, sir, I know we have differed; but if there was any difference before that time, I call upon him to point it out—what was the occasion, what the question, and what the difference? And if, before that period, sir, by any speech, any vote, any public proceeding, or by any other mode of announcement whatever, he gave the world to know that he belonged to the state-rights party, I hope he will now be kind enough to produce it, or to refer to it, or to tell us where we may look for it.

Sir, I will pursue this topic no further. I would not have pursued it so far—I would not have entered upon it at all—had it not been for the astonishment I felt, mingled, I confess, with something of warmer feeling, when the honorable gentleman declared that he had always differed from me on constitutional questions.

Sir, the honorable member read a quotation or two from a speech of mine in 1816, on the currency or bank question. With what intent, or to what end? What inconsistency does he show? Speaking of the legal currency of the country, that is, the coin, I then said it was in a good state. Was not that true? I was speaking of the legal currency; of that which the law made a tender. And how is that inconsistent with any thing said by me now, or ever said by me?

I declared then, he says, that the framers of this government were hard-money men. Certainly they were. But, are not the friends of a convertible paper hard-money men, in every practical and sensible meaning of the term? Did I, in that speech, or any other, insist on excluding all convertible paper from the uses of society? Most assuredly I did not. I never quite so far lost my wits, I think. There is but a single sentence in that speech which I should qualify, if I were to deliver it again—and that the honorable member has not noticed. It is a paragraph respecting the power of congress over the circulation of state banks, which might, perhaps, need explanation or correction. Understanding it as applicable to the case then before congress, all the rest is perfectly accordant with any present opinions. It is well known that I never doubted the power of congress to create a bank; that I was always in favor of a bank, constituted on proper principles; that I voted for the bank bill of 1815, and opposed that of 1816 only on account of one or two of its provisions, which I and others hoped to be able to strike out. I am a hard-money man, and always have been, and always shall be. But I know the great use of such bank paper as is convertible into hard-money, on demand; which may be called specie paper; and which is equivalent to specie in value, and much more convenient and useful.

On the other hand, I abhor all irredeemable paper; all old-fashioned paper money; all deceptive promises; every thing, indeed, in the shape of paper issued for circulation, whether by government or individuals, which may not be turned into specie at the will of the holder.

But, sir, I have insisted that government is bound to protect and regulate the means of commerce, to see that there is a sound currency for the use of the people.

The honorable gentleman asks, what then is the limit? Must congress also furnish all means of commerce? Must it furnish weights, and scales, and steel-yards? Most undoubtedly, sir, it must regulate weights and measures; and it does so. But the answer to the general question is very obvious. Government must furnish all that which none but government can furnish. Government must do for individuals which individuals cannot do for themselves. That is the very end of government. Why, else, have we a government? And can individuals make a currency? Can individuals regulate money? The distinction is as broad and plain as Pennsylvania avenue. No man can mistake it, or well blunder out of it. The gentleman asks if government must furnish for the people ships, and boats, and wagons. Certainly not. The gentleman here only recites the president's message of September. Those things, and all such things, the people can furnish for themselves; but they cannot make a currency; they cannot, individually, decide what shall be the money of the country. That, every body knows, is one of the prerogatives and one of the duties of government; and a duty which I think we are most unwisely neglecting. We may as well leave the people to make war and to make peace, each man for himself, as to leave individuals the regulation of commerce and currency.

Mr. President, there are other remarks of the gentleman of which I might take notice. But, should I do so, I should only repeat what I have already said, either now or heretofore. I shall, therefore, not now allude to them.

My principal purpose, in what I have said, has been: first, to defend myself—that was my first object; and next, as the honorable member has attempted to take to himself the character of a strict constructionist, and a state-rights man, and on that basis to show a difference, not favorable to me, between his constitutional opinions and my own, heretofore, it has been my intention to show that the power to create a bank, the power to regulate the currency by other and direct means, the power to lay a protecting tariff, and the power of internal improvement, in its broadest sense, are all powers which the honorable gentleman himself has supported, has acted on, and in the exercise of which, indeed, he has taken a distinguished lead in the councils of congress.

If this has been done, my purpose is answered. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, nor to spin it out into a colloquy. If the honorable member has any thing new to bring forward; if he has any charge to make—any proof, or any specification; if he has any thing to advance against my opinion or my conduct, my honor or patriotism, I am still at home. I am here. If not, then, so far as I am concerned, this discussion will here terminate.

I will say a few words, before I resume my seat, on the motion now pending. That motion is, to strike out the specie-paying part of the bill. I have a suspicion, sir, that the motion will prevail. If it should, it will leave a great vacuum; and how shall that vacuum be filled?

The part proposed to be struck out, is that which requires all debts to government to be paid in specie. It makes a good provision for government, and for public men, through all classes. The secretary of the treasury, in his letter, at the last session, was still more watchful of the interest of the holders of office. He assured us, bad as the times were, and notwithstanding the floods of bad paper which deluged the country, members of congress should get specie.

In my opinion, sir, this is beginning the use of good money, in payment, at the wrong end of the list. If there be bad money in the country, I think that secretaries and other executive officers, and especially members of congress, should be the last to receive any good money; because they have the power, if they will do their duty, and exercise the power, of making money of the country good for all. I think, sir, it was a leading feature in Mr. Burke's famous bill for economical reform, that he provided, first of all, for those who are least able to secure themselves. Every body else was to be well paid all they were entitled to; before the ministers of the crown, and other political characters, should have any thing. This seems to me very right. But we have a precedent, sir, in our own country, more directly to the purpose; and as that which we now hope to strike out is the part of the bill furnished, or proposed originally by the honorable member from South Carolina, it will naturally devolve on him to supply its place. I wish, therefore, to draw his particular attention to this precedent, which I am now about to produce.

Most members of the senate will remember that, before the establishment of this government, and before, or about the time, that the territory which now constitutes the state of Tennessee was ceded to congress, the inhabitants of the eastern part of that territory established a government for themselves, and called it the state of Franklin. They adopted a very good constitution, divided into the usual branches of legislative, executive, and judicial power. They laid and collected taxes, and performed other acts of legislation. They had, for the present, it is true, no maritime possessions, yet they followed the common forms in constituting high officers; and their governor was not only captain-general and commander-in-chief, but admiral also, so that the navy might have a commander when there should be a navy.

Well, sir, the currency of this state of Franklin became very much deranged. Specie was scarce, and equally scarce were the notes of specie-paying banks. But the legislature did not propose any divorce of government and people; they did not seek to establish two currencies, one for men in office, and one for the rest of the community. They were content with neighbor's fare. It became necessary to pass what we should call, now-a-days, the civil-list appropriation-bill. They passed such a bill; and when we shall have made a void in the bill now before us, by striking out specie payments, for government, I recommend to its friends to fill the gap by inserting, if not the same provisions as were in the law of the state of Franklin, at least something in the same spirit.

The preamble of that law, sir, begins by reciting, that the collection of taxes, in specie, had become very oppressive to the good people of the commonwealth, for the want of a circulating medium. A parallel case to ours, sir, exactly. It recites further, sir, that it is the duty of the legislature to hear, at all times, the prayer of their constituents, and apply as speedily a remedy as lies in their power. These sentiments are very just, sir, and I sincerely wish there was a thorough disposition here to adopt the like.

Acting under the influence of these sound principles, sir, the legislature of Franklin passed a law, for the support of the civil list, which, as it is short, I will beg permission to read:

"Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Franklin, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, That, from the 1st day of January, A. D. 1793, the salaries of the civil officers of this commonwealth be as follows, to wit:

"His excellency the governor, per annum, one thousand deer skins; his honor, the chief justice, five hundred do. do.; the attorney-general, five hundred do. do.; secretary to his excellency the governor, five hundred racoon do.; the treasurer of the state, four hundred and fifty other do.; each county clerk, three hundred beaver do.; clerk of the house of commons, two hundred racoon do.; members of assembly, per diem, three do. do.; justice's fee for signing a warrant, one muskrat do.; to the constable, for serving a warrant, one mink do.

"Enacted into a law this 18th day of October, 1788, under the great seal of the state.

"Witness his excellency, &c.

"Governor, captain-general, commander-in-chief, and admiral in and out said state."

This, sir, is the law, the spirit of which I commend to gentlemen. I will not speak of the appropriateness of these several allowances for the civil list. But the example is good, and I am of opinion, that until congress shall perform its duty, by seeing that the country enjoys a good currency, the same medium which the people are obliged to use, whether it be skins or rags, is good enough for its own members.

Mr. Calhoun again rose and said, I am not at all surprised, Mr. President, that the senator from Massachusetts should show such solicitude to free himself from the responsibility of converting this discussion into a mere personal altercation, so unworthy the place and the occasion. But it is not a little unjust in him to attempt to transfer the responsibility from himself to me, having acted throughout, as I have, wholly on the defensive, and done every thing I could to avoid personalities. I have, in truth, a deep and unfeigned aversion to personal altercations, in any case; especially here, in my official character, where duty and self-respect, as well as the dignity of the body, forbid its introduction. On the present occasion, I had every reason to avoid it. The subject is one unsurpassed in magnitude and importance, and which requires the calmest and most deliberate consideration. I have had entire confidence in the strength and truth of the side I support; and, of course, felt deep solicitude to limit the discussion strictly to the merits of the question.

But the senator, in order to throw the blame on me, denies that he drew a comparison between us. Does he consider it no comparison to claim for himself the most universal and ardent patriotism; and to attribute to me the opposite qualities, of being sectional, and entertaining feelings far from friendly to the union? And this, too, without any thing in the question, or my previous remarks, that could, by possibility justify it? Does he really think that I ought to have sat in silence without attempting to show, as I have done, how perfectly unfounded are his claims to superior patriotism, and how unjust his charges against me?

But in order to justify himself, he accuses me of having first attempted to fix on himself and friends the charge of inconsistency, in supporting the substitute of the senator from Virginia, (Mr. Rives.) I made no such charge. I simply availed myself of the opinion which he and they entertained and expressed, in relation to a similar measure in 1834—acquitting them expressly of all inconsistency. So far from a charge of the kind, I placed my argument on the assumption, that their opinion remained unchanged; and yet this he calls a charge of inconsistency—a throwing of the first stone; and on which he rests the justification of his unprovoked personalities.

The senator next attributes to me the assertion, that I intended to draw a comparison between his course and mine during the late war, if time had permitted, accusing me, at the same time, of making a "railroad accusation" against him. My answer is, that I said nothing like it; and made no accusation whatever, either "railroad" or specific. I said not a word of "time permitting me." What I really said was entirely different; and bears no analogy whatever to what he attributes to me, as the senate must remember. I confined myself to an inquiry into the truth of the picture he had drawn of his patriotism; and his comparison between his public conduct and mine. I demonstrated what little claims he had to the high qualities he arrogated to himself; and how unfounded his assumption was to a more universal and ardent patriotism. I illustrated all this by a reference to his course in relation to abolition and the tariff; and declined going into a comparison between our courses during the late war—not for a want of time, as he states, but expressly on the ground that the events of that day were by-gone, and belonged to history, where I was willing to leave it, and where I should leave it, unless provoked to go into the comparison, by some future attack from the senator. I added not a word of accusation whatever, either "railroad" or otherwise. It is true, I said that, at one time, I intended to go into a comparison. I certainly had no reason, personally, to decline it; but I felt a strong repugnance, which I could not overcome, to recurring back to such distant events, that have passed out of the circle of the politics of the day. Acting under its influence, I limited my remarks, in reference to the senator and myself, to the great and living questions of the day, which are still unsettled, and are destined to exercise an important control over the future destiny of the country.

But if I should be forced into the comparison, I shall not confine myself simply to what the senator did at that important period of our history; I would take a far wider range. He claims for himself an exalted patriotism, far above others, and myself in particular; and that, too, in war as well as peace; and he would have no right to complain, if held responsible not only for what he did, but for what he did not; not only for his own acts, but also for his political associates and party, which passed without his censure or rebuke. I have no wish, for the reasons I have stated, to enter on the comparison; but if he desires it, I will read a statement of some dozen or fifteen of his votes, which I laid my hands on since he commenced his reply; and which will furnish some index of his course during that period. (Mr. Webster indicating no desire for the reading, Mr. Calhoun proceeded.)

Dropping, then, the senator's course during the war, I shall proceed to notice some remarks of his in reference to myself. He has hunted up with much industry, and brought forward with great parade, my course in relation to the tariff—to the bank—and the bonus bill, immediately subsequent to the late war, in order to fix on me a charge of inconsistency. I am pleased that he has afforded me, on this occasion, an opportunity to speak of this portion of our political history, and of the part I took. It is one that requires explanation, not only in reference to myself, but the party to which I belong.

In supporting the measure to which the senator referred, I was not alone; I acted with the great body of the party: and, if I took a more prominent part in relation to them than others, it is to be attributed to the position which I held in the house and the party at the time. It is not my intention to defend those measures; but to explain, in justice to myself and the party, the circumstances under which we acted. I do not deny but that we departed, more or less from the true principles and policy of our party; but it was under circumstances which, though they do not justify the departure, are calculated, in a great degree, to excuse it; and to repel effectually any inference that it was an intentional abandonment of them.

No popular party is proof against success, and the long possession of power: and such proved to be the fact in our case. We had been in the uninterrupted possession of power for more than sixteen years, and had just carried through successfully a war against the greatest power on earth, and, at the same time, overthrown the party in opposition to us. The flush of victory had, as is usual, the effect of working a considerable change in the feelings and views of our party, which contributed to the introduction of the measures to which the senator refers. But there were other, and powerful causes, which also contributed to it. During the war, the country had suffered much from a depreciated and unequal currency; from the want of domestic supplies to take the place of those articles which we had been cut off by the war, and from the want of good roads, and other channels of conveyance, on which to transport munitions of war, and to concentrate promptly a sufficient force on the points menaced or attacked by the enemy. After its termination, there was a vivid recollection of the difficulties occasioned by these wants. The danger, at the time, to the country, was believed to be connected exclusively with our foreign relations. The war, it is true, had terminated successfully; but there were hostile feelings left behind on both sides, between our country and Great Britain; and she kept up a powerful force in her possessions in our immediate vicinity, which was calculated to excite our vigilance, and to admonish us of the necessity of being prepared for a renewed contest. Besides we were in danger in being involved in a long and dangerous contest, growing out of the revolution in Spanish America; in which at one time the great powers of Europe united by what was called "The Holy Alliance," were strongly inclined to interfere. Under these circumstances, and when the political principles of our party appeared to have gained a permanent ascendancy, by the prostration of our old opponents, and to be in no danger, it is not at all wonderful that the measures with which the senator now reproaches me should have received the support of myself and the party to which I belong. I confess, for myself, that I then believed the danger to be, not within, but without—not from the giving away of our principles, but violence from abroad: and that I had no suspicion that it lay in the quarter which experience has shown it really did. This accounts for my course at that period.

In voting for the tariff of 1816, which I am still of opinion was a judicious measure, with the exception of the minimum principle, of which I think as badly as any one, I regarded it as a revenue measure, and called for by the circumstances of the time. But I did not dream that, in the short space of twelve years, it would be perverted by those interested in an instrument of such unbounded oppression as to exact and pass into the treasury one-half of the whole proceeds of our foreign exchanges. Nor did I imagine that, in introducing a bill to set apart a particular fund for internal improvement, and leaving it to congress to determine thereafter the extent of power over that subject, and to what objects the funds should be applied, (that was its real character) there was the least danger that, in a few years, the whole revenue of the country would become an object of scramble among the various sections in which the struggle would be, who should get most, without any reference to the public good. As to the bank, placed in the circumstances in which I and those with whom I acted were, I do not see how we could have acted differently, even with our present experience. The time for reformation in reference to the currency had not then arrived; and any attempt at reform would have proved abortive.

But I offer not what I have said as a justification; I acknowledge we all departed, in a greater or less degree, from the stern and rigid principles of the party, and the true policy of the government, and well have we paid the penalty. It has taught me a lesson never to be forgotten, and I now call on the younger and more inexperienced members of the party, as I then was, to profit by our example. Avoid, as you would the greatest evil, the least departure from principle, however harmless and innocent it may at the time appear to be. The smallest departure will prove to be an entering wedge; and the others, differing from you in views and principles, will drive the measure farther than you ever contemplated; just as we have seen our old opponents seize on the tariff, internal improvement, and the bank, to overthrow our principles and to establish their own. Never cease to bear in mind that ours is a limited government, with specific powers; and that if the prescribed line be passed over so little, there is no fixing any limits to the encroachments of power.

Nor is the period of which I am speaking the only one in which success has caused departure from the principles and policy of our party. The vast revenue, which the protective tariff placed at the disposal of the government, had the effects on those in power which might have been anticipated. They no longer relied on principles as the means of preserving their ascendancy. The patronage and resources of the Government were deemed sufficient for that purpose; and many measures were adopted, which will hereafter be regarded as great and dangerous departures from the creed of the party; and which have done more to reconcile the people to the principles and policy of our opponents, and to weaken their confidence in ours, than all other causes put together.

As to myself, each revolving year impresses me deeper and deeper with the truth and wisdom of the old Virginia school of politics. She was blessed, when this government went into operation, with leaders of the clearest discernment and purest patriotism; the Jeffersons, the Taylors, and Roanes, and many others, who had formed the most just conception of our system of government, and the policy to be pursued to preserve it. I had, from my earliest years, imbibed a strong attachment for that school. Indeed, I may say, it was inherited by me. But I never realized to the full extent the depths of its wisdom, and the vast importance of adhering rigidly to its maxims, till experience, and the reflection of riper and more advanced years, taught me. And here is the broad line of distinction between the senator and myself, which he, with all his ingenuity, cannot obliterate. He belongs, and always has, to another and an opposite school, which, to designate by its most distinguished leader, may be called the school of Hamilton; a man distinguished for his great abilities, perfect frankness, and ardent patriotism, but who was decidedly inferior to Mr. Jefferson in genius, the power of original thinking, and the clearness and depth of his conception of the true nature and character of our government. Belonging, as we do and ever have, to schools so diverse, our agreement has been casual, while our difference has been habitual and fundamental, both as to the nature and character of our government, and the policy it ought to pursue; and which has placed us opposite to each other on the present, and most of the other great questions which have been agitated in our time.

He sees in the success of the present question the advancement of the principles and policy to which I am devoted, and in its defeat the advancement of his own; hence our difference, and the ardor of the present conflict—a conflict of opposing systems, in which, as one or the other may prevail, the future destiny of the country will be permanently influenced. The separation of the political and moneyed power will give a lasting ascendancy to the political school to which I belong, and their union to that of the senator.

He is right in fixing on 1825 as the year when my views in relation to the principles and character of the government became firmly fixed and settled. It was then I took my seat in the chair which you, sir, now occupy. I had devoted the seven preceding years laboriously to the duties of the war department, which I had found in a state of complete disorder, and which so engrossed my attention as to leave me little leisure to attend to the general politics of the country. The change of office gave me both time and opportunity to view more minutely the general operations of the government, which I did not neglect. I soon saw the incipient state of those disorders, which had then just begun to develop themselves, and the causes in which they originated, as well as the fearful consequences to which they threatened to lead. This induced me to make a careful review and examination of the principles of the government. I went to the source, the Kentucky resolutions and the Virginia resolutions and report, which I carefully investigated, in all their bearings. I then turned my attention more carefully to the investigation of the character and tendency of what was called, at the time, the American system, and saw clearly its oppressive, corrupting, and dangerous tendency. I took a firm stand against it. Since then, my life has been one incessant struggle to maintain or restore the principles and policy of the old state-rights republican party, regardless of all personal consequences. During this long period of thirteen years of continued action, amidst the most trying scenes, I may bid defiance to the most rigid scrutiny to point out the slightest variation in my course, or the least departure from the principles or doctrines of the political school to which I belong. I may be accused of carrying my principles too far, or of adhering too rigidly to my doctrines, but of the opposite fault none have ventured to accuse me. My adherence to them has never wavered under the greatest difficulties or danger. If, then, I erred in common with the great body of the party, under the circumstances which I have explained, I, at least, have long since made, I trust, ample amends. If I have done any thing to contribute to the common errors of the period immediately subsequent to the late war, I have done far more, I hope, towards their correction, and the restoration of the principles and doctrines which our party profess, as well as to arrest the ascendancy of the opposite. To this great object, which I solemnly believe, involves our liberty and the perpetuation of our popular and free institutions, I have devoted my life.

Mr. Webster said he would correct one misapprehension. The senator from South Carolina had understood him to say that he (Mr. W.) would embrace the earliest opportunity to revive the tariff. But what he had said was, that there was doubt whether the manufactures, under the minimum provided by the present law, would be sufficiently protected; and if it should be found that they were not, he (Mr. W.) would endeavor to procure that protection.

Mr. Clay said it would be with extreme reluctance that he should, at any time, interfere in a discussion between the two distinguished senators from Massachusetts and South Carolina, and he did not now rise for such purpose. But the senator from South Carolina had used and repeated several times an expression which he (Mr. C.) could not permit to pass unnoticed. He was the more surprised at it because he had supposed that the adjustment of accounts between that senator and himself, made on a former day, had been mutually satisfactory, as it certainly had been entirely so to him (Mr. C.) As if, however, the senator still had some remaining feeling about it, he had been pleased to describe the senator from Massachusetts and himself (Mr. C.) as "associates" in an attack upon him. There was no foundation for such an assertion. He (Mr. C.) had never conferred with the senator from Massachusetts on the subject of what he (Mr. C.) had intended to say towards the senator from South Carolina. And he was equally ignorant of what course the senator from Massachusetts intended to pursue towards the senator from South Carolina until he heard him in the senate. Had he consulted with him on the subject, he (Mr. C.) should have advised him to have foreborne. There was, therefore, no ground whatever for the imputation of association or concert in any attack upon the senator from South Carolina.

Mr. Calhoun said that he did not intend to impute any improper motives; and he had alluded more particularly to the senator from Massachusetts.

The senate then adjourned.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION--SENATE.

April 20. Mr. McKean presented a petition of citizens of Terrytown, Bradford county, Pennsylvania, and three petitions from citizens of Rush township, Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania, praying congress to abolish slavery immediately in the District of Columbia. Motion to receive laid on the table.

Mr. King, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize George Whitman to import an iron steamboat free of duty. Read twice, and referred.

On motion of Mr. Wall, the committee on the post office and post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new mail route from Hacketts town to Belvidere, Warren co., N. J.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the resolution offered by him, concerning the annexation of Texas to the United States, was made the special order for Monday next.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

The subject was discussed at great length, almost wholly on the question of the constitutional power to pass the bill, by Messrs. Wall, Preston, Clay, of Ala., White, Grundy Prentiss, Rives, Calhoun, Roane, and Brown.

Mr. Buchanan was understood to say that had the time not been late, he might have said something on the constitutional question involved in the bill; but he should now say nothing till the bill should come up on its third reading; nor should he probably then, unless induced to do so by something from the other side.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Con., Tipton, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, White—14.

The senate then adjourned till Monday.

April 23. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose and said, he had for some time held in his possession, and he would now present, certain proceedings and resolutions of a large and respectable meeting of the citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, opposed to the sub-treasury bill. They attributed (Mr. C. said) the present deranged state of the currency and business of the country to the action of this government, and they deprecated in strong but respectful language the passage of the bill to which he had alluded. They regarded the proposed separation of the government from the currency and business of the country as wholly unjustifiable, and utterly repugnant to the nature and genius of our institutions; and they were desirous that the government should do something to bring back the state of prosperity which the government had lost for itself and the country.

These proceedings emanated (Mr. C. believed) from the second town in importance in the state of Ohio, situated at the outlet of the great canal of that state into Lake Erie. They were great friends of the credit system, and well they might be, because by that system the great work had been achieved, which was so beneficial and important to them, and so creditable to the enterprise and energy of that state.

The bill which they deprecated was now in the other house, and Mr. C. hoped and believed that it was dead, dead, dead, and he could not even add that supplication which usually closed the sentence of our tribunals of justice on a condemned prisoner, [May the Lord have mercy upon your soul.] Yet, though he believed it was dead, it was possible that the president and the other friends of the measure might revive it; and it was to meet it, if it should come up in any shape, that Mr. C. now presented these resolutions, and asked that they might be printed, and lie on the table.

The proceedings were accordingly laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Vice President presented a message from the president of the United States, with papers relating to Indian depredations on the property of an individual, (not heard.)

On motion of Mr. White, referred, and ordered to be printed.

After a number of petitions had been presented, and some other business of minor importance transacted, the senate took up, on its third reading, the bill to prohibit the issuing and circulation of the notes of the late Bank of the United States.

Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, occupied the rest of the day in an earnest debate on this subject, (to be published hereafter.)

The bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Con., Tipton, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Merrick, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, White—13.

Mr. Preston gave notice of his design to enter on the question of the annexation of Texas tomorrow.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

April 24. Mr. Clay of Kentucky, rose and said he had been requested to present a petition, very numerously signed, by individuals embracing every class of the community—members of literary institutions, authors, merchants, and, in short, all the classes of society—in behalf of passing an amendment to the copyright law; that is, to extend the privilege of copyright to authors of such foreign countries as allowed American authors the copyright there. They urged that the amendment would conduce greatly, not only to the encouragement of American literature, but at the same time, would be an act of justice to foreign authors. This subject had been presented by Mr. C. at the last session of congress, and also early in the present one; it had engaged a large share of the public attention, and had occasioned much discussion pro and con, and it had been itself the apparent cause of the publication of several books. Mr. C. would now take the opportunity to say that every conviction which had impressed him heretofore in the favor of this object, and which had induced him to move in the matter, remained unshaken, and was even strengthened, by all which he had since seen and heard. The committee had had this subject under their consideration for some time, and had very properly waited that they might fully learn the views of all the parties concerned; but, as the session was now far advanced, Mr. C. felt himself at liberty to express the hope that the committee would now report on the subject to the senate at some early day, and that the measure asked for would be passed. He moved that the memorial be laid on the table, and printed; which was ordered accordingly.

Mr. Rives also presented a memorial, which he said was precisely similar, and which did not require any remark from him, as it spoke ably and fully for itself. He would only say that it came from some of the brightest ornaments of American literature, and was entitled to every respect and consideration. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Preston also presented a memorial of a similar character, signed by different classes of persons, booksellers and others. The discussion before the public, Mr. P. said, to which the senator from Kentucky had alluded, was mainly between authors and publishers, who had supposed themselves to have different interests on this subject, authors being of opinion that their interests would be subserved by an international copy-right law. The discussion had been of some warmth, and had run out somewhat into other collateral matters. Mr. P. believed the senate had already passed the bill asked for, and, as far as he could ascertain, public opinion was very generally favorable to it, not only in this country, but in all civilized foreign countries. A distinguished member had introduced a bill of this kind in the British parliament, and had advocated it with much eloquence and ability. In France, also, a measure of the same kind was contemplated or in progress; and in Germany, where it was of more consequence than any where else, because they were the most extensive makers of books. Mr. P. would be happy to think that the United States had taken the first step on this subject, by proposing a general system for the community of nations, and for the literary class, who exercised a very great control over public sentiment.

And there could not be said to have been a more favorable time for the adoption of this general measure than the present, at the moment when the public mind throughout the world was in a state of repose, was in a state of general sympathy and homogeneity, and of general union on subjects connected with the happiness and improvement of mankind. This was owing to the great degree of universal peace, prosperity, and happiness, which had existed for the last twenty-five years throughout the civilized world—a degree greater than had existed before since the death of the second Antioch.

This memorial, Mr. P. said, was, to a great extent, from booksellers and publishers, showing that there was now on their part a conformity with the opinions of American authors on this subject. Mr. P. moved that it be printed, and lie on the table; which was ordered.

Mr. Buchanan presented a memorial from the chamber of commerce of Philadelphia, stating that the attempt to keep the river free of ice by means of the icebreakers had essentially failed, and asking farther facilities from congress; recommending, also, that New Castle be made a port of entry, that a winter harbor be provided for low down the river Delaware, and that certain piers in that river be repaired or constructed. Referred.

Mr. B. also presented the memorial of Walter Johnson, asking the establishment of a national institution of the physical sciences as connected with the public service. Referred.

Mr. Bayard presented a memorial of the society of friends, praying some act for the protection or amelioration of the condition of the Indian tribes, and particularly against the unnecessary prosecution of the war in Florida. Laid on the table.

Mr. White and Mr. Robinson presented some papers, which were referred, the general import, even, of which, the reporter could not ascertain.

After several bills for the relief of individuals had been reported, and ordered to a second reading,

The bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, Vermont came up, and was opposed by Mr. Hubbard, who presented a letter to him from the commissioner on pensions, adverse to the object, which was read.

Mr. Prentiss said, that in introducing the bill he had been influenced by motives of public accommodation, and especially by a regard to the convenience and interest of that class of patriotic and meritorious persons who were enjoying the liberality and beneficence of the government. The bill had been reported by the committee on pensions at two or three successive sessions, and he had hoped that no opposition would be made to it. The committee had not acted upon the supposed narrow and arbitrary rule, that no more than two pension agencies should be established in any state. They had at different times reported bills establishing additional agencies, though these bills, for the want of time, had not been finally acted upon.

The bill proposed to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, the seat of government of Vermont, for the payment of pensioners residing in the counties of Washington, Orange, Caledonia, Orleans, Essex, and Lamoille, counties lying north of or adjacent to Montpelier. No one looking to the geography of the state, no one casting his eye upon the map, could hesitate for a moment to say, without regard to any other considerations, that Montpelier, of all places in the state, was the most suitable and proper one for a pension agency. It was central in its position, of easy access from all parts of the state, and especially from the several counties named in the bill.

The state was from forty to fifty miles wide at its southern extremity, gradually widening in extent until it became more than a hundred miles in width on its northern frontier. There was an agency established on the extreme western limits, and also one on the extreme eastern limits, the latter being within sixty miles of the south line of the state. Many pensioners in the counties mentioned in the bill were obliged to go from seventy to a hundred miles, and some a hundred and thirty or forty miles, to get to either of these agencies. This was not only a great inconvenience to the pensioners, but occasioned an expense and charge to them to which they ought not to be subject. If the agency provided by the bill should be established, this inconvenience would be removed and the expense now incurred in a great measure avoided. Montpelier, as already observed, was the seat of government. The legislature convened there early in October, soon after one of the semi-annual instalments to pensioners became due; and as each town in the state sent a representative, pensioners might send and get their money without expense or inconvenience.

It was true, as had been stated by the senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. Hubbard,) that the secretary of war had, by law, power to establish as many agencies as he, in his discretion, might think proper, and that application might be made to him. But it was also true, as the senator well knew, that the secretary had adopted as a rule of his department, in order to rid himself of troublesome and vexatious importunities, to establish but two agencies in any one state; leaving it to the discretion of congress to establish more or not. It would be in vain, therefore, to apply to the war department, as two agencies already existed in Vermont. Mr. P. believed that the additional agency would be a great convenience and benefit to the pensioners residing in the northern part of the state, and he hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. Swift and Mr. Clay, of Alabama, also spoke in favor of the bill, which was then passed, and sent to the other house for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. Roane, the bill respecting the banks of the District of Columbia was taken up and made the special order for Friday next.

On motion of Mr. Trotter, (who made some remarks to show the urgency and propriety of the measure,) the senate took up the bill to extend the time for the commission instituted for claims under the Choctaw treaty, and the bill was amended as recommended by the committee, and ordered to a third reading.

The senate then proceeded to the special order of the day—being the following preamble and resolution, moved by Mr. Preston on the 4th of January, viz:

Whereas the just and true boundary of the United States, under the treaty of Louisiana, extended on the southwest to the Rio Grande del Norte, which river continued to be the true boundary line until the territory west of the Sabine was surrendered to Spain by the treaty of 1819: And whereas such surrender of a portion of the United States is of evil precedent, and of questionable constitutionality: And whereas many weighty considerations of policy make it expedient to re-establish the said true boundary, and to annex to the United States the territory occupied by the state of Texas, with the consent of the said state:

Be it therefore resolved, That, with the consent of the said state, previously had, and whenever it can be effected consistently with the public faith and treaty stipulations of the United States, it is desirable and expedient to re-annex the said territory to the United States.

Mr. Preston rose and addressed the senate about two hours in support of the resolution. When he had concluded, no other member rising, the resolution was, at the instance of Mr. P., for the present, ordered to lie on the table, in consequence of the indisposition of Mr. Walker, who, it was understood, desired to speak on it.

The senate then took an executive session, and then adjourned.

April 25. The Vice President presented a communication from the navy department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of March 1st, with a list of agents of the navy pension fund, copies of the instructions given them, of accounts and correspondence with them, &c. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hubbard presented a communication from the collector at Boston, in relation to certain banks in that city. Referred.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the purchase by the United States of the island at the confluence of the St. Peter's and Mississippi rivers. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Some business of minor importance was disposed of, when the bill supplementary to the acts to the appointment of commissioners under the 14th article of the treaty of 1830 with the Choctaw Indians, was read a third time and passed.

The resolution reported by Mr. White, chairman of the select committee on the case of Mr. Ruggles, declaring that there was no satisfactory evidence to sustain the charge made by Mr. Jones, of New Jersey, against the honorable John Ruggles, and that it was inexpedient for the senate to take any farther measures thereon, was taken up, and agreed to, without debate or dissent.

On motion of Mr. Prentiss, the senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

On motion of Mr. Merrick, the bill was so amended as to require the special solicitor to file written arguments in reply to the arguments of counsel for claimants, not only when he should think proper, but when the board should require him to do so; and, also, prohibiting him from practising as an attorney in any court of law or equity in the country.

Mr. King, who said he had not been attending to the adoption of these amendments, moved to modify the bill so as to take away all discretion on this point, and require the solicitor to file a written argument with the commissioners in every case.

The general merits of the bill were now discussed at length, by Messrs. Norrell, Hubbard, Prentiss, Benton, Calhoun, Niles, Buchanan, Tipton, Bayard, Clay, of Alabama, Serier, White, and Linn.

Mr. Bayard (Mr. King having temporarily withdrawn his amendment) moved to strike from the bill the provision for a special solicitor.

Mr. Calhoun moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to refer the whole subject to a special committee, who should devise and report a system of joint rules for the two houses, by which claims should be more certainly and efficiently decided by the two houses themselves, the claims being presented as now and heretofore. This motion was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Lumpkin, Morris, Norvell, Serier, Smith of Indiana, Trotter, Wright, Young—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Walker, White, Williams—27.

The question recurring on Mr. Bayard's motion to strike out the whole provision for a special solicitor, it was carried in the affirmative without a division. On motion of Mr. Bayard, the number of commissioners provided for by the bill was reduced from three to two. The provision allowing claimants to appear by counsel, was also stricken out, to correspond with the want of a solicitor on the part of the United States. On motion of Mr. Morris the senate then adjourned.

April 26. The senate was engaged nearly all of to-day on the bill to create a board of commissioners to examine and report on claims against the United States. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Yeas 23, nays 15. Particulars of the day's proceedings in our next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 20. Among the reports made to-day were the following:

Mr. Petrikia, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported, without amendment, the bill to incorporate certain banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported with amendments, senate bill to authorize the appointment of four additional clerks in the office of the commissioner of Indian affairs.

Mr. Randolph, from the committee of agriculture, reported a joint resolution to authorize the president of the United States to lease gratuitously, for ten years, any lot of land belonging to the United States, and not included in the enclosed public lands, for the cultivation of the mulberry and sugar beet.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the secretary of war to purchase a site in the District of Columbia for a powder magazine and keeper's house.

Mr. Hopkins' resolution of inquiry, as to the connexion of the government with the press, and the expediency of destroying that connexion, with Mr. Dromgoole's amendment, extending that inquiry to some kindred and other topics, coming up in order, Mr. Garland, of Virginia, commenced a reply to his colleague, (Mr. Dromgoole,) who had proposed the amendment, (which will be given, when finished, with the rest of the debate,) but which was not completed when the hour expired.

This day being private business day, and the board of claims bill being the special order,

Mr. Cambreleng rose, and said that the public business required to be proceeded with immediately. He would therefore move to postpone the private and special orders, and take up the unfinished public business. On this motion, (requiring a vote of two-thirds,) Mr. C. demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion prevailed by the following vote: Yeas 139, nays 46.

The unfinished business, being the Cumberland road bill, was then taken up, pending Mr. Underwood's motion to recommit, with instructions; and the debate (to be given hereafter, in full) was continued by Messrs. Clowney, Pickens, and Corwin.

Mr. Casey, of Illinois, then took the floor, and moved the previous question. Mr. Pickens moved to lay the bill on the table. [This motion had precedence.] Mr. Briggs asked for the yeas and nays. Ordered. Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, asked for a call of the house. Lost.

The question was then taken on Mr. Pickens' motion, and decided in the negative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Cambreleng, John Campbell, W. B. Carter, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, James Garland, James Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haynes, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, Thomas B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, J. W. Jones, Kemble, Lawler, Legare, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Mallory, J. M. Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, A. McClellan, Montgomery, Samuel W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Pennybacker, Pickens, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Robertson, Rumsey, Sawyer, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Slade, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vanderveer, Weeks, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Beatty, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, W. B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Davies, Dunn, Everett, Ewing, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Howard, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, Jenifer, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, Keim, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Marvin, S. Mason, May, Maxwell, R. McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Miller, Mitchell, Morgan, Calvary Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Patterson, Paynter, Peck, Petrikim, Phelps, Pope, Potts, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sheffer, Sibley, Snyder, Southgate, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Webster, A. S. White, John White, E. Whittlesey, J. L. Williams, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—109.

The demand of Mr. Casey for the previous question was seconded by tellers—Ayes 91, noes 61.

Mr. Sherrod Williams demanded the yeas and nays on the question "Shall the main question be now put?" Ordered. And the house decided that the main question should now be put—Yeas 108, nays 86. Mr. Montgomery, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment. Lost. The question recurring on the engrossment of the bill, Mr. Reed demanded the yeas and nays. Ordered. And the house ordered the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, by the following vote: Yeas 100, nays 95. Mr. Fillmore moved an adjournment. Lost. Mr. Rhett moved a call of the house. Lost. Next Monday, to-morrow, and this day, were named as the time of reading the bill the third time. Monday—lost. To-morrow—lost. The Chair naming the question as being on to-day, Mr. Thomas moved the first Monday of May next, and on this he asked the yeas and nays. Mr. Rhett then moved an adjournment. Lost. Mr. Elmore moved a call of the house. Mr. Thompson asked for the yeas and nays on this motion. Ordered. Mr. Elmore moved an adjournment. Lost. Ayes 73, noes not counted. The yeas and nays were then taken on ordering a call of the house; and it was decided in the negative as follows: Yeas 62, nays 107. Mr. Thompson moved an adjournment. Lost. The motion of Mr. Thomas was rejected by the following vote: Yeas 83, nays 95. The question recurring on ordering the bill to be read a third time this day, Mr. Chapman, of Alabama, asked for the yeas and nays. Lost. The house then ordered the bill to be read a third time this day. And the bill being read, Mr. Boon demanded the previous question (on the passage of the bill,) which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. Connor demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were ordered, and the bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Beatty, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, John Calhoun, Casey, Chambers, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Dunn, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Grennell, Haley, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Howard, W. H. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, J. L. Williams, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Bouldin, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, J. Campbell, W. B. Carter, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Edwards, Elmore, Everett, Farrington, Fry, J. Garland, Graves, Griffin, Hawes, Haynes, Hopkins, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Lewis, Loomis, Lyon, Martin, Maury, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, S. W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Pennybacker, Pickens, Reily, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Robertson, Rumsey, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Shields, Slade, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Toucey, Towns, H. L. Turney, Underwood, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, J. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise—80.

On motion of Mr. McKenna, the house then adjourned—it being twenty minutes before 6 o'clock.

Saturday, April 21. After several reports on private claims had been received,

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on the public buildings reported an amendment to the bill for taking down the treasury building, which was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Chapman, the committee on the public lands were discharged from the petition of William Stringer; also, of the petition of the Alabama legislature, for pre-emption to settlers who lost their settlements by certain Indian treaties, and for the passage of a law authorizing entries of public lands in lots of 40 acres; which said petitions were severally committed to the committee of the whole house which have in charge bills for similar purposes.

The joint resolution of the house, authorizing the secretary of war to purchase a site in the District of Columbia for a new powder-magazine and keeper's house, and the bill for the relief of J. A. Fleming, were severally read a third time and passed.

Mr. Fairfield obtained leave to offer several petitions in relation to the late duel, which were referred to the select committee on that subject.

The house then proceeded to the unfinished business of the morning hour, which was Mr. Hopkins' resolution for separating the government from all connexion with the public press.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, resumed and concluded his remark on that subject; when Mr. Wise obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. S. Williams, who moved to amend the amendment offered by Mr. Dromgoole to Mr. Hopkins' resolution by appending thereto his own resolution on the subject of retrenchment; modified, however, by omitting the words "illustrious Andrew Jackson," and substituting "the late president of the United States."

On this amendment he addressed the house, and had proceeded for a short time, when the morning hour expired, and the subject lies over.

Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, asked the house to take up the motion for reconsidering the leave of absence from the 1st of May next of Mr. Smith, of Maine.

Objection being made, he moved to suspend the rules, and on this motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 87, nays 92. (Not a majority, two-thirds being necessary to carry the motion.)

The house then proceeded to consider the calendar of private bills, and took up the bill for the relief of Dr. Philip Turner, with the amendment from the committee of the whole, proposing to strike out the enacting clause.

A motion was made by Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, to make the bill appointing commissioners of private claims the special order of the day for Friday next, but it was not agreed to.

Mr. Petrikim moved the previous question on Mr. Turner's bill, but it was not sustained; and the debate on the bill was re-opened, and, as before, occupied the house for several hours. [The reason of the interest felt in this bill (beyond that ordinarily exhibited in regard to private bills) was that it involves the principle of the allowance of interest on the commutation pay of revolutionary officers.]

Mr. Haley terminated this vexed discussion by moving the previous question.

Mr. Cushman thereupon moved a call of the house.

On this motion, Mr. Glascok demanded the yeas and nays, but the house refused to order them.

Mr. Dawson moved an adjournment; lost, ayes 62, noes 68.

The previous question was then seconded—ayes 75, noes 49, when the question on engrossing the bill was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 75, nays 76. So the bill was rejected.

After the yeas and nays had been taken, but before they were announced, Mr. Wise said he had voted through inadvertence, being personally interested in the question; and he requested that his vote be erased.

After some hesitation, it was ordered that the vote be erased from the journal; not as though he were excused, but on the ground that he had no right to vote.

Mr. Mercer made a similar request, and on the same ground. Several attempts were made to debate the question, which were declared to be out of order, the house having decided on it by yeas and nays. Mr. Mercer's vote was erased.

Mr. Toucey, from the select committee on the late duel, by leave, made a report, the consideration of which he moved should be postponed to two weeks from Monday next, and that it be printed. He said this motion was made by the unanimous order of the committee.

[This report not having been ordered to be printed, the clerk of the house has, perhaps very properly, declined to allow copies to be taken of any part of it. We are enabled, however, to state generally, that its conclusions are that Mr. Wise, on account of his participation in the duel, is deeply involved in a breach of the privileges of the house, and is deserving of censure by the house; that Mr. Jones is also involved in a breach of the privileges of the house, and also deserving of censure. In regard to other persons, accessories or spectators, (except as follows,) the committee contents itself with stating facts and evidence, without recommending any action. From the Globe of Saturday night, whose publishers appear to have had access to the report before it was presented to the house, we obtain the following quotations from the report:

FROM THE GLOBE.

In relation to Mr. Graves, the recommendation is in the following words:

"The committee, therefore, viewing the breach of the rights and privileges of the house, on the part of Mr. Graves, to have been an offence of this high character, against the vital principle of a deliberative assembly and of representative government, feel constrained, by a sense of duty, to present to the house a resolution that he be expelled therefrom."

In conclusion the report says:

"The committee entertain no doubt that James Watson Webb has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the house, but they also concur unanimously in the opinion, that if there be any real ground to believe that a conspiracy to assassinate actually existed, as set forth in that atrocious paper drawn up by him, signed by Daniel Jackson and William H. Morell, sworn to by the latter, and published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, he be left to the chastisement of the courts of law and public opinion, and that the house will consult its own dignity and the public interests by bestowing upon him no further notice."

Mr. Grennell, in behalf of himself and Mr. Rariden, members of the committee, presented a written statement of their views, which he asked might be printed with the report.

Mr. Elmore, not being able to agree with either in the report of the majorities, asked leave to present in writing his views, and that this paper might be printed with the rest.

Mr. Robertson said that, having understood that this report would probably be brought into the house to-day, he had examined the parliamentary law relating to the subject. The subject was of importance, not merely as it related to the parties implicated, but as it bore upon the privileges of the house. The result of his examination was a conviction that it was the duty of the house to recommend these reports to the select committee from which they came, with instructions that, if any member or members of the house should be implicated, the committee should forthwith report that fact to the house, and await its further order on the premises. He quoted Jefferson's Manual, to show that such was the law of parliament as laid down in that book, viz: That the committee could not proceed a step on its own authority when the character of a member of the house was involved; because it was the privilege of the house itself to take cognizance of the conduct of its members; and of every member to have such cognizance exerted by the house alone. He was utterly ignorant of what might be the contents of the voluminous report made by the committee; but whatever they might be, he hoped they would not be sent to the world till this question should be duly considered. He therefore moved that the report and all the other papers be laid for the present upon the table.

Mr. Fillmore called for the reading of the resolution, if any, which the majority of the committee had reported to the house.

Mr. Boon moved that the house adjourn; which motion prevailing, ayes 86, The house thereupon adjourned.

Monday, April 23. The motion of Mr. Toucey, chairman of the select committee on the subject of the late duel, to postpone the consideration of the report, and to print, was discussed during the whole of to-day by several members; of which discussion an account will be given in our next, if practicable. No question was taken.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, the committee of the whole were discharged from the bill heretofore reported to authorize the issue of $10,000,000 in treasury notes; as also from the bill reported, supplementary to the act of October last, authorizing the issue of $10,000,000 in treasury notes; and these bills were recommitted to the committee of ways and means. And thereupon,

Mr. Cambreleng, from the committee of ways and means, reported a new bill in the following words:

A bill to carry into effect an act approved the 12th day of October, 1837, "to authorize the issuing of treasury notes."

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of an act entitled "an act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be, issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the treasury and cancelled.

This bill was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

The Chair laid before the house the following:

To the house of representatives of the United States: In compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 16th instant, relative to an attack on the steamboat Columbia, in the gulf of Mexico, by a Mexican armed vessel, I transmit a report from the secretary of state, to whom the resolution was referred.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, April 23, 1838.

To the President of the United States:

The secretary of state, to whom was referred a resolution of the house of representatives of the 16th instant, requesting the president to communicate to that house, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information he may have received, officially or otherwise, relating to an attack by a Mexican armed vessel upon the steamboat Columbia, bearing the flag of the United States, in the gulf of Mexico, has the honor to report that no information on this subject (except through the newspapers) has been received at this department. Respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 23, 1838.

Mr. Adams moved to refer it to the committee on foreign affairs, with instructions to report upon the subject forthwith. It was now five months since the president of the United States recommended war against Mexico, and nothing had yet been heard from the committee on the subject.

Mr. Howard explained that the reason of this delay was, that negotiations were pending on this very subject; and the longer the committee delayed reporting, the stronger was the probability of an amicable arrangement of the affairs between the two nations.

Mr. Adams said he had thought that all negotiations were broken off. He was glad to hear that they were going on; and would withdraw his motion to instruct.

The papers were then referred to the committee on foreign affairs: and,

The house adjourned.

[In the course of Monday's sitting, a motion was made by Mr. Bell, that the house reconsider the vote (75 to 76) whereby the house refused to engross and read a third time the bill for the relief of the heirs of doctor Philip Turner, in which bill was involved the general question of interest on commutation claims of half-pay revolutionary officers. The motion to re-consider goes over till next Friday, when it will come up when the house proceeds to the private orders of the day.]

Tuesday, April 24. As soon as the journal was read, Mr. Howard, chairman of the committee on foreign affairs asked permission of the house to re-state what he had said yesterday evening, when the president's message was read in reply to some remarks which had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams.) Leave being granted, Mr. H. said that the importance of the subject of our relations with Mexico, and the desire which he felt to avoid the communication of any erroneous information to the public, induced him to repeat what he had said, because he found, by the newspaper which he held in his hand, that it had not been distinctly apprehended. He was not at all surprised at this, as the noise was so great that he doubted whether he had made himself heard even by the speaker. The house was just about to adjourn when the subject came up, and the members were beginning to disperse.

The message of the president related to the recent attack upon the steamboat Columbia, by a Mexican vessel of war, and he (Mr. H.) was reported to have said that negotiations were pending upon this very subject. This was an error. He had no knowledge upon this point. But what he did say, in reply to the motion to instruct the committee to report speedily, was this: that the delay which had occurred in reporting upon the subject of Mexico was not accidental but intentional. The reason was this. In November last the Mexican minister had informed the government of the United States, when he announced the rejection of some few of the claims which had been presented to it, that as soon as the other claims could be examined the decision upon them would be made known. The committee were willing to wait for this decision as long as the nature of the case would admit; and it was clear that the more this time was extended the greater was the chance of restoring amicable relations between the two governments, in case the government of Mexico was inclined to restore them. This was all that he had said; and upon this statement the gentleman from Massachusetts withdrew his motion to instruct the committee.

The motion of Mr. Toucey, to postpone for two weeks and to print the reports of the select committee upon the subject of the late duel, being under consideration, (and having precedence, as a privileged question,) came up in order; and was further discussed by several gentlemen, all of whose remarks will be given hereafter.

Wednesday, April 25. The question of postponing and printing the report of the select committee, and the separate reports offered by members of the committee, together with the proposition of Mr. Robertson to refer the whole subject to a committee of privileges, with instructions to report as to the steps to be taken by the house with regard thereto, was farther discussed to-day by Messrs. Slade, Foster, Fletcher, Toucey, Wise, Thomas, Graves, Grantland, Bell, Pennybacker, and Sergeant, whose remarks will be given hereafter.

Mr. Boon then moved the reading of the report. Mr. Fillmore asked for the reading of the testimony.

Mr. Bell protested against the reading. The pending question was not merely the disposition of the report, but one touching the regularity of the proceedings of the committee.

The Chair decided it to be the right of a member to have the report read he was called upon to vote on. The Clerk having been directed to proceed, read as follows:

The committee appointed to investigate the causes which led to the death of the hon. Jonathan Cilley, late a member of the house of representatives, and the circumstances connected therewith, and to inquire whether there has been, in the case alluded to, a breach of the privileges of the house, and to whom were referred sundry memorials upon the subject, now ask leave to submit their

REPORT:

In discharging the trust committed to them by the house of representatives, the committee have endeavored implicitly to obey its order, notwithstanding short, on the one hand, of the full measure of the duty imposed upon them, nor transcending its just limits on the other. They were of the opinion that the investigation was instituted solely for the maintenance of the privileges of the house. It was not within the province of the house of representatives to investigate the causes which led to the death of one of its members, or the circumstances which attended it, with a view to the punishment of any offender for a high crime or misdemeanor. That belongs, in every case, exclusively to the courts of law. Senators and representatives are not privileged from arrest in cases of "treason, felony, and breach of the peace;" and it is a constitutional provision, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted by the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence." The inquiry, therefore, is directed to one object only—the maintenance of the privileges of the house; and the question is, what, in that view, were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, and the circumstances connected therewith, and did they involve a breach of those privileges?

In pursuing this investigation, the committee have examined all whose testimony, there was reason to believe, might be material; and Messrs. Graves, Wise, and Jones, members of the house, were permitted to attend, and to examine and cross-examine the witnesses; and the same leave was extended to Mr. Menelee, of the house, and to Mr. Pierce, of the senate, at their request. The entire mass of the testimony is now submitted as a part of this report. One witness, Daniel Jackson, of the city of New York, who was summoned to attend, and called upon to testify, was neglected to obey the requisition, though he appeared before the committee, and interrogatories were put to him; but, from the position in which he stood, and the disclosures of another witness, it was not thought worth the time or attention of the house or of the committee to notice him further.

The late Jonathan Cilley, a member of the house from the state of Maine, fell by the hand of William J. Graves, a member of the house from the state of Kentucky, in a duel fought with rifles, near the boundary line between the District of Columbia and the state of Maryland, on Saturday, the 24th of February last.

The causes which led to his death are intimately connected with the proceeding of this house. On the 12th of February Mr. Wise, of Virginia, presented to the house a publication in the New York Courier and Enquirer, charging a member of congress with corruption upon the authority of an anonymous writer under the signature of "the Spy in Washington;" and thereupon moved a resolution for the appointment of a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire into the charge. Mr. Wise said: "The character of the authority upon which the charge is made, is vouched for as respectable and authentic by the editor of the Courier and Enquirer, in whose paper it appears, and the house is called upon to defend its honor and dignity against the charge."

Mr. Cilley addressed the house in opposition to the resolution. In the course of the debate "he said he knew nothing of this editor, but if it was the same editor who had once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $52,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think his charges were entitled to much credit in an American congress." These words, spoken by Mr. Cilley in debate, were strictly in order, were pertinent to the subject under discussion, and "did not exceed the bounds and limits of his place and duty;" and though they implied a doubt inconsistent with unblemished honor and character in the person alluded to, yet Mr. Cilley was justified in the use of them, by a report of a committee of the house of representatives, appointed on the 14th of March, 1832, to inspect the books and examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States. An extract from the report, made by the majority of the committee, and published by order of the house of representatives, is herewith annexed, in which it is stated that, "for sixteen months" the New York Courier and Enquirer "was warmly opposed" to the Bank of the United States; that on the 26th of March, 1831, and within less than nine months thereafter, the bank made three loans, amounting "to the sum of $52,975, which consisted of notes drawn and endorsed by the editors only;" and the

"on or about the 8th of April, 1831, it (the paper,) changed its course in favor of the bank."

It was in reference to the facts contained in this report, and published to the world by order of the house of representatives, that Mr. Cilley spoke the words, which had been already recited; and for thus alluding to facts put forth in the published documents of the body of which he was a member, he was called in question by the editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer. James Watson Webb, on the 21st of February last, addressed a note to him, reciting those words, apprising him that the writer of it was the editor of that paper, and concluding with a demand of explanation, couched in very explicit terms.

Washington, February 21, 1838.*

SIR: In the Washington Globe of the 12th instant, you are reported to have said, in the course of the debate which took place in the house of representatives on that day, growing out of a publication made in the New York Courier and Enquirer—"He (you) knew nothing of this editor; but if it was the same editor who had once made grave charges against an institution of this country, and afterwards was said to have received facilities to the amount of some $32,000 from the same institution, and gave it his hearty support, he did not think his charges were entitled to much credit in an American congress."

I deem it my duty to apprise you, sir, that I am the editor of the paper in which the letter from the "Spy in Washington," charging a member of congress with corruption, was first published; and the object of this communication is to inquire of you whether I am the editor to which you alluded, and, if so, to ask the explanation which the character of your remarks renders necessary.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

To the Hon. Jonathan Cilley.

This demand of explanation, under the circumstances which existed, was not susceptible of misinterpretation, and, the sequel proves, was not misunderstood. Mr. Graves was the bearer of this note, having read it, and being fully apprized of its contents, and tendered it to Mr. Cilley, in the hall of the house of representatives, while the house was in session. Mr. Cilley declined to receive it, and thereupon a brief correspondence ensued, which terminated in the challenge and death of Mr. Cilley by the bearer of this note. The first note of Mr. Graves was delivered by himself to Mr. Cilley, on the same day on which he bore the note of Webb, that is, on Wednesday, the 21st of February, 1838, and should have borne that date. It is as follows:

House of Representatives, February 20, 1838.

In the interview which I had with you this morning, when you declined receiving from me the note of colonel J. W. Webb, asking whether you were correctly reported in the Globe in what you are there represented to have said of him in this house, on the 12th instant, you will please say whether you did not remark, in substance, that in declining to receive the note, you hoped I would not consider it, in any respect, disrespectful to me; and that the ground on which you rested your declining to receive the note was distinctly this: That you could not consent to get yourself into personal difficulties with conductors of public journals, for what you might think proper to say in debate upon this floor, in discharge of your duties as a representative of the people; and that you did not rest your objection, in our interview, upon any personal objections to colonel Webb as a gentleman.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

W. J. GRAVES.

Hon. Jonathan Cilley.

It will be observed that the note which Mr. Graves bore, is described by him as the note of colonel J. W. Webb, asking whether Mr. Cilley was correctly reported in the Globe, in what he was there represented to have said in the house of representatives, on the 12th instant. But it will be perceived that the note itself, though it is thus described by Mr. Graves whenever he speaks of it afterwards, does not contain that inquiry.

Mr. Cilley, on the same day, personally delivered to Mr. Graves the following note in reply:

House of Representatives, February 21, 1838.

The note which you just placed in my hands has been received. In reply, I have to state that in your interview with me this morning, when you proposed to deliver a communication from colonel Webb, of the New York Courier and Enquirer, I declined to receive it, because I chose to be drawn into no controversy with him. I neither affirmed or denied any thing in regard to his character; but when you remarked that this course on my part might place you in an unpleasant situation, I stated to you, and now repeat, that I intended, by the refusal, no disrespect to you.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. Graves.

On Thursday, the day following, Mr. Graves sent his second note to Mr. Cilley, which was delivered to him in his seat, during the session of the house, by Mr. Menefee, of Kentucky, the latter accompanying its delivery with an expression of the hope that Mr. Cilley would perceive the propriety of relieving Mr. Graves from a position which was painful to him. Mr. Cilley remarked that the note should be attended to. It is as follows:

House of Representatives, February 22, 1838.

SIR: Your note of yesterday, in reply to mine of that date, is inexplicit, unsatisfactory, and insufficient. Among other things in this, that, in your declining to receive colonel Webb's communication, it does not disclaim any exception to him personally as a gentleman. I have, therefore, to inquire whether you declined to receive his communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or a man of honor. A categorical answer is expected.

Very respectfully,

WM. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. Cilley.

Mr. Cilley, on the same day, returned the following reply, by Mr. Duncan, of Ohio:

House of Representatives, February 22, 1838.

SIR: Your note of this date has just been placed in my hands. I regret that mine of yesterday was unsatisfactory to you; but I cannot admit the right on your part to propound the question to which you ask a categorical answer, and therefore decline any further response to it.

Very respectfully,

JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. Graves.

On Friday, the 23d of February, Mr. Wise presented to Mr. Cilley, at his boarding house, a few minutes before 12 o'clock, M. a challenge from Mr. Graves.

Washington city, Feb. 23, 1838.

As you have declined accepting a communication which I bore to you from colonel Webb, and as by your note of yesterday you have refused to decline on grounds which would exonerate me from all responsibility growing out of the affair, I am left no other alternative but to ask that satisfaction which is recognized among gentlemen. My friend, hon. Henry A. Wise, is authorized by me to make the arrangements suitable to the occasion.

Your obedient servant,

WM. J. GRAVES.

Hon. J. Cilley.

On the evening of the same day, about the hour of five o'clock, P. M. Mr. Jones, the delegate from Wisconsin, delivered to Mr. Graves, in the room of Mr. Wise, and in his presence, an acceptance of the challenge:

Washington city, Feb. 23, 1838.

Your note of this morning has been received. My friend, general Jones, will "make the arrangements suitable to the occasion."

Your obedient servant,

JONA. CILLEY.

Hon. W. J. Graves.

Mr. Jones immediately submitted the following proposition to Mr. Wise:

Washington, Feb. 23, 1838.

SIR: Mr. Cilley proposes to meet Mr. Graves, at such place as may be agreed upon between us, tomorrow, at 12 o'clock, M. The weapons to be used on the occasion shall be rifles; the parties placed side to side at eighty yards distance from each other; to hold the rifles horizontally at arm's length, downwards; the rifles to be cocked, and triggers set; the words to be, "Gentlemen, are you ready?" After which, neither answering "No," the word shall be, in regular succession, "Fire—one, two, three, four." Neither party shall fire before the word "fire," nor after the word "four." The positions of the parties at the ends of the line to be determined by lot. The second of the party losing the position shall have the giving of the word. The dress to be ordinary winter clothing, and subject to the examination of both parties. Each party may have on the ground, besides his second, a surgeon, and two other friends. The seconds, for execution of their respective trusts, are allowed to have a pair of pistols each on the ground, but no other person shall have any weapon. The rifles to be loaded in the presence of the seconds. Should Mr. Graves not be able to procure a rifle by the time prescribed, time shall be allowed for that purpose.

Your very obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. Henry A. Wise.

About nine o'clock, P. M. Mr. Wise replied:
Washington, Feb. 23, 1838.

SIR: The terms arranging the meeting between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, which you presented to me this evening, though unusual and objectionable, are accepted; with the understanding that the rifles are to be loaded with a single ball, and that neither party is to raise his weapon from the downward horizontal position until the word "fire."

I will inform you, sir, by the hour of 11 o'clock, A. M. to-morrow, whether Mr. Graves has been able to procure a rifle, and, consequently, whether he will require a postponement of the time of meeting.

Your very obedient servant,

HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. Geo. W. Jones.

At 8 o'clock, A. M. on the 24th, Mr. Jones left at Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

Washington city, D. C. Feb. 24, 1838.

SIR: I will receive, at Dr. Reilly's, on F street, any communication you may see proper to make me, until 11 o'clock, A. M. to-day.

Respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. Wise.

Dr. Feilly's, F street,

February 24, 1838, 10 o'clock, A. M.

SIR: I have called at this place, in conformity with your note of this morning, to inform you that Mr. Graves has not as yet been able to procure a rifle and put it in order, and cannot be ready at 12 o'clock, M. to-day. He is desirous, however, to have the meeting to-day, if possible, and I will inform you by half-past 12 o'clock, M. to-day, what time to procure and prepare a weapon he will require.

Very respectfully, &c.

HENRY A. WISE.

Hon. Geo. W. Jones.

February 24, 1838.

Your note, dated 10 o'clock to-day, is received. In reply, I have the pleasure to inform you that I have in my possession an excellent rifle, in good order, which is at the service of Mr. Graves.

Very respectfully, &c.

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. Wise.

Afterwards, Mr. Jones sent to Mr. Wise's room the following note, to wit:

Washington, February 24, 1838, 11 A. M.

SIR: Through the politeness of my friend, Dr. Duncan, I now tender to you, for the use of Mr. Graves, the rifle referred to in my note of 10½ A. M. this morning.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. W. JONES.

Hon. H. A. Wise.

And with this note a rifle and powder-flask, and balls, were left at Mr. Wise's room.

The rifle was procured by Mr. Jones, and sent by him to Mr. Wise, in accordance with a previous request of Mr. Wise, or in consequence of a conversation between them. Mr. Jones says it was in strict accordance with the request of Mr. Wise: and Mr. Wise says he had a conversation with Mr. Jones upon the subject, requested Mr. Jones to inform him where one could be obtained, and has no doubt that it was in consequence of this conversation that Mr. Jones sent the rifle, and that he acted with the best motive in sending it.

Mr. Wise having received the last note, called on Mr. Jones, and informed him that Mr. Graves had procured another rifle, and would be ready for the meeting at three o'clock, P. M. The parties met by arrangement on the road to Marlborough, in Maryland. Mr. Cilley was accompanied by his second, Mr. Jones, by Mr. Bynum of North Carolina, and colonel James W. Schaumburg, as his friends, and by doctor Duncan, of Ohio, as his surgeon. Mr. Graves was attended by Mr. Wise, as his second, by Mr. Crittenden, senator from Kentucky, and Mr. Menefee, of Kentucky, as his friends, and by Dr. Foltz, of this city, as his surgeon; and all proceeded thence about 2 o'clock, P. M. to the place of meeting. Mr. Jones and Mr. Wise immediately marked off the ground. The line of fire was at right angles with the rays of the sun. The choice of positions fell by lot to Mr. Wise, and Mr. Jones had the giving of the word. Mr. Wise chose the position at the northwesterly nd of the line. The distance was about ninety-yards. There was a strong wind falling on the inc of fire at an angle of about forty-five degrees against Mr. Cilley. The position of Mr. Graves was near a wood, partly sheltered by it, and that of Mr. Cilley was on higher ground, and in the open field. The calibre of Mr. Graves' rifle was nearly twice as large as that of Mr. Cilley's, and would receive a ball of about eighty to the pound; while the rifle of Mr. Cilley would receive a ball of about one hundred and thirty-two to the pound. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Hawes, both members of the house from Kentucky, were at some distance off as spectators. Mr. Wise had two rifles on the ground, one of which, not being loaded, remained by consent in one of the carriages. The hack drivers were on the ground; and two other persons (Grafton Powell and James F. Brown) were present, without the consent of either party or their friends. Shortly after three o'clock, P. M. the parties exchanged shots, according to the terms of meeting. Mr. Cilley fired first, before he had fully elevated his piece; and Mr. Graves fired one or two seconds afterwards. Both missed. Mr. Graves could not have reserved his fire, had he been disposed to do so.

The friends assembled at the request of Mr. Wise, and Mr. Jones inquired of Mr. Wise whether his friend, Mr. Graves, was satisfied? Mr. Wise immediately said: "Mr. Jones, these gentlemen have come here without animosity towards each other; they are fighting merely upon a point of honor; cannot Mr. Cilley assign some reason for not receiving at Mr. Graves' hands colonel Webb's communication, or make some disclaimer which will relieve Mr. Graves from his position?" Mr. Jones replied: "While the challenge is impending, Mr. Cilley can make no explanations." Mr. Wise said: "The exchange of shots suspends the challenge, and the challenge is suspended for explanation." Mr. Jones, thereupon, went to Mr. Cilley and returned; and after a few words in regard to putting in writing what had been and might be said, Mr. Jones proceeded to say: "I am authorized by my friend, Mr. Cilley, to say, that in declining to receive the note from Mr. Graves, purporting to be from colonel Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, because he entertained for him then, as he now does, the highest respect and the most kind feelings; but that he declined to receive the note, because he chose not to be drawn into any controversy with colonel Webb," or, "he refuses to disclaim disrespect for colonel Webb, because he does not choose to be drawn into an expression of opinion as to him." Both expressions were used in the course of the conversation. After a consultation on each side, Mr. Wise said to Mr. Jones, "This answer leaves Mr. Graves precisely in the position in which he stood when the challenge was sent." From an examination of the evidence, it will be perceived that, although the language made use of by the persons present, in narrating what passed on this occasion, is not the same, there is yet no substantial difference between them. Mr. Cilley re-asserted the ground which he had assumed in the correspondence; that he declined to receive the note of Webb, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with him; that he refused to disclaim any personal exception to Webb as a gentleman, or man of honor, because he would neither affirm nor deny any thing in regard to his character; and that in declining to receive the demand of explanation, he had intended no disrespect to Mr. Graves. Mr. Cilley even went farther, and declared that he entertained for him the highest respect and the most kind feelings. The position of Graves was, therefore, not changed, except so far as the peril of life by Mr. Cilley in defence of his own position, and the subsequent voluntary avowal of the highest respect and the most kind feelings for the individual who had put him in jeopardy, may be supposed to have changed it.

Mr. Crittenden says, that it was now "urged on the part of Mr. Graves, that Mr. Cilley ought to make some such explanation or declaration as had been proposed, for the satisfaction of Mr. Graves; while on the part of Mr. Cilley it was urged that Mr. Graves ought to be satisfied with the exchange of shots, without any such explanation or declaration." All the friends of Mr. Cilley urged that Mr. Graves should now be satisfied, and that the affair should now terminate, without requiring from Mr. Cilley any further concession beyond what he had already made. Doctor Foltz said he "thought the affair should end here; that there was no personal ill feelings between the parties; that they had proved themselves men of honor and courage; and that Mr. Cilley's opinion of colonel Webb could not be changed by the further exchange of shots or the receipt of wounds." Mr. Crittenden was understood, by nearly all present, to concur in these views, though it seems he did not intend so to be understood, but acquiesced with Mr. Wise and Mr. Menefee in insisting that the fight should go on, unless Mr. Cilley would make the concession which had been demanded. Accordingly the challenge was renewed, and the parties resumed their position, and again exchanged shots in the manner prescribed by the terms of meeting. Mr. Graves fired first, before he had fully elevated his piece; Mr. Cilley fired about two seconds afterwards. They both missed. Mr. Cilley could not have reserved his fire had he been disposed to do so. Mr. Jones, Mr. Bynum, Mr. Schaumburg, doctor Foltz, Mr. Wise, and Mr. Fuller, thought, from the motions and appearance of Mr. Graves, that he was hit. He at once said, "I must have another shot." Mr. Wise says, "he positively, peremptorily, and repeatedly insisted upon another shot."

The seconds and friends again assembled, and the challenge was again withdrawn. Mr. Jones said, "Mr. Wise, my friend, in coming to the ground and exchanging shots with Mr. Graves, has shown to the world that, in declining to receive the note of colonel Webb, he did not do so because he dreaded a controversy. He has shown himself a brave man, and disposed to render satisfaction to Mr. Graves. I do think that he has done so, and that the matter should end here." Mr. Wise replied, in substance: "Mr. Jones, Mr. Cilley has already expressed his respect for Mr. Graves, in the written correspondence, and Mr. Graves does not require of Mr. Cilley a certificate of character for colonel Webb; he considers himself bound not only to preserve the respect due to himself, but to defend the honor of his friend, colonel Webb. Mr. Graves only insists that he has not borne the note of a man who is not a man of honor and not a gentleman." The challenge was again renewed, and while the friends were loading the rifles, Mr. Wise and Mr. Jones walked apart, and Mr. Wise asked Mr. Jones "if Mr. Cilley could not assign the reason for declining to receive the note of colonel Webb, that he [Mr. Cilley] did not hold himself accountable to colonel Webb for words spoken in debate?" Mr. Jones replied, that "Mr. Cilley would not assign that reason, because he did not wish to be understood as expressing the opinion whether he was or was not accountable for words spoken in debate." Mr. Wise then asked Mr. Jones whether "Mr. Cilley would not say that, in declining to receive the note of colonel Webb, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly?" To which Mr. Jones replied affirmatively, adding, "Mr. Cilley entertains the highest respect for Mr. Graves, but declined to receive the note because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with colonel Webb." Mr. Jones says that Mr. Wise took no exception to this answer, but continued to require other concessions, as stated, to be made. Mr. Wise says that in making that proposition he went beyond his instructions; and that the proposition and the response to it were not communicated to Mr. Graves, but were communicated both to Mr. Graves and to Mr. Menefee. Mr. Crittenden says he does not remember to have heard them, nor to have heard of them, during the progress of the contest, and that he does not remember to have given any advice or opinion upon them. Mr. Menefee remembers the proposition and reply, and positively or by acquiescence gave the advice that the reply, thus qualified, was but a reiteration, in substance, of the original ground assumed by Mr. Cilley, and held to be inadmissible by Mr. Graves. Mr. Wise had in his possession, on the ground, three written propositions, neither of which was exhibited, nor their substance submitted, in any other manner than as before stated.

Mr. Jones, Mr. Bynum, Mr. Schaumburg, Dr. Duncan, and Dr. Foltz, now objected, in the strongest language, against the further prosecution of the contest, and insisted that it should now cease, and that Mr. Graves should declare himself satisfied. Mr. Crittenden was understood again, by nearly all present, to concur in these views; but it appears, from his testimony, that he acquiesced in the views of Mr. Wise and Mr. Menefee. They insisted that the fight should go on, unless Mr. Cilley would make the concessions which were demanded; either a direct disclaimer of any personal exception to James Watson Webb, as a gentleman and a man of honor, in declining to receive his note, or an indirect disclaimer, by placing the refusal to receive it upon the ground of privilege; both of which Mr. Cilley, in the correspondence and throughout the affair upon the field, had refused to do, and, persisting in it, had twice received the fire of his antagonist.

Immediately previous to the last exchange of shots, Mr. Wise said to Mr. Jones, "If this matter is not terminated this shot, and is not settled, I will propose to shorten the distance." To which Mr. Jones replied, "After this shot, without effect, I will entertain the proposition." Mr. Graves had directed Mr. Wise, if they missed repeatedly, to prevent a prolongation of the affair by proposing closer quarters; in consequence of which, Mr. Wise made the proposition, which would have aggravated the severity of the terms. The rifles being loaded, the parties resumed their stations, and fired the third time, very nearly together. Mr. Cilley was shot through the body. He dropped his rifle, beckoned to one near him, and said to him, "I am shot," put both his hands to his wound, fell, and in two or three minutes expired.

Early in the day on which he fell, an agreement was entered into between James Watson Webb, Daniel Jackson, and William H. Morell, to arm themselves, repair to the room of Mr. Cilley, and force him to fight Webb with pistols on the spot, or to pledge his word of honor to give Webb a meeting before Mr. Graves; and, if Mr. Cilley would do neither, to shatter his right arm. They accordingly took measures to ascertain whether Mr. Cilley was at his lodgings; and finding that he was not, they proceeded, well armed, to Bladensburg, where it was said the duel between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley was to take place. Before arriving there, it was agreed between Webb, Jackson, and Morell, that Webb should approach Mr. Cilley, claim the quarrel, insist on fighting him, and assure him that if he aimed his rifle at Mr. Graves, he [Webb] would shoot him [Mr. Cilley] on the spot. It was supposed by them that Mr. Graves or Mr. Wise, or some of the party, would raise a weapon at Webb, whereupon it was agreed that Webb should instantly shoot Mr. Cilley, and that they should then defend themselves in the best way they could. Not finding the parties at Bladensburg, they followed in pursuit to the old magazine, and thence to the shore of the Potomac, near the arsenal, at Greenleaf's point, whence, it being after 3 o'clock, P. M. they returned to the city, to await the result. "It is unnecessary to add," say they, in a statement drawn up by Webb, signed by Jackson and Morell, and published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, "what would have been the course of colonel Webb, if Mr. Graves, instead of Mr. Cilley, had been injured. Suffice it to say, that it was sanctioned by us; and however much we deplored it, we could not doubt but the extraordinary position in which he would have been placed would have warranted the course determined upon." It is difficult to imagine what is here darkly shadowed forth, if it be not that, had Mr. Cilley survived the encounter with Mr. Graves, and had the latter suffered in it, it would then have been the fate of Mr. Cilley to have encountered an assassin.

Such were the material facts and circumstances which attended the death of Mr. Cilley. The committee, entertaining the opinion that the cause of the challenge was the cause of the death of Mr. Cilley, have sought for it where it should be found in the most authentic form, in the correspondence of the parties.

Mr. Cilley declined to receive the note of Mr. Webb, because he "chose to be drawn into no controversy with him." He placed his refusal to receive a demand for explanation of the words spoken by him in debate solely on the ground of his own voluntary election, without assigning any other reason. "He chose to be drawn into no controversy" with Webb. He declared, at the same time, that he neither affirmed nor denied any thing in regard to Webb's character, in declining to receive the note. He declared further, that he had before stated, and now repeated, that he intended by the refusal no disrespect to Mr. Graves, and that he had said this only in reply to a remark of Mr. Graves, that this course might place him in an unpleasant situation.

Mr. Graves, in his second note, takes but one exception to this first note of Mr. Cilley. "It does not disclaim any exception to him (Webb) personally as a gentleman." He says: "Your note of yesterday, in reply to mine of that date, is inexplicit, unsatisfactory, and insufficient; among other things is this—that, in your declining to receive colonel Webb's communication, it does not disclaim any exception to him, personally, as a gentleman." "I have, therefore," he adds, "to inquire whether you declined to receive his communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or a man of honor? A categorical answer is expected."

Mr. Cilley, in his second note, regrets that his first was unsatisfactory, but cannot admit the right of Mr. Graves to propound the question, and, therefore, he declines any further response to it.

It is difficult to conceive that Mr. Graves, upon this correspondence of Mr. Cilley, could have challenged him for intending disrespect to Mr. Graves; for any such intention was positively disclaimed, and, as appears, in a most unexceptionable and courteous manner, in reply to a suggestion of his own, which called for it; or for affirming or denying any thing in regard to the character of Webb, in declining to receive his note; for any such affirmation or denial is also disclaimed, in equally positive terms. Mr. Cilley had declined to receive a call from James Watson Webb, for explanation of words spoken in debate in the house of representatives, and had put his refusal solely on the ground that he chose to be drawn into no controversy with him; but he is pressed further, and interrogated beyond this limit, which he had assigned to himself, and a categorical answer is demanded to the question whether he declined on the ground of any personal exception to Webb as a gentleman or a man of honor. He denies the right to interrogate him in this manner for declining a call, which his right, and duty, as a member of the house of representatives, and the just maintenance of the privileges of that body, required him to decline; and, denying the right to interrogate, he, therefore, refused to submit to answer any further. And it was because he refused to receive the note, and refused to answer any further, that he was challenged by another member of the same body.

This matter is not left open to inference or argument. The cause of the challenge appears in a manner which precludes all doubt. It is still further specified and avowed by Mr. Graves himself, in his own note, which contains the challenge. It is stated clearly, unequivocally, and with the utmost precision, and is assigned expressly, and in form, as the cause for which the challenge is given. "As you have declined accepting a communication which I bore to you from colonel Webb, and as by your note of yesterday you have refused to decline on grounds which would exonerate me from all responsibility growing out of the affair, I am left no other alternative but to ask that satisfaction which is recognised among gentlemen." Mr. Cilley, by his "note of yesterday," had refused to answer the question to which a "categorical answer" had been demanded: that is to say, "whether he declined to receive colonel Webb's communication on the ground of any personal exception to him as a gentleman or man of honor." The ground of challenge, therefore, is, by Mr. Graves himself, expressly stated to be, that Mr. Cilley declined to receive the communication from Webb, and, by his note of February 22d, refused to answer that question, touching the honor of Webb. This was the open and avowed cause, set forth and presented to Mr. Cilley, by which he was guided, and upon which he acted, in a matter involving the utmost extremity of human responsibility. For this cause, and for this alone, he was challenged and fell by the hand of Mr. Graves; unless it be admissible to believe that, after all verbal communication had ceased between him and his antagonist, and the difference had assumed the form exclusively of a written correspondence between them, he was challenged and fell for a cause not set up in that correspondence, not put forth as a ground of complaint, not made known to him or his friends as a matter of grievance, and in regard to which, therefore, it may be believed, he was profoundly ignorant, and had no opportunity afforded him in any way of voluntary satisfaction or explanation.

Nor is there any thing in what subsequently occurred, as disclosed by the joint statement of the seconds, or the testimony of any witness which gives color to a suggestion, that there was, at any time afterwards, a change of the ground of controversy.

No communication whatever, upon the subject of difference, took place between the principals, their respective seconds, or friends, after the challenge was given, before the first exchange of shots. Of course, no change of the ground of controversy could have occurred until after Mr. Cilley had received the fire of his antagonist, and had hazarded his life in defence of the position which he had assumed in the correspondence. After the first exchange of shots, as already shown, Mr. Cilley re-assumed his original position, and Mr. Wise insisted that what was then said by Mr. Jones only placed "the affair upon the original grounds," and left Mr. Graves precisely in the position in which he stood when the challenge was sent. There was, in fact, no change whatever in the position of the parties, except what arose from the circumstance that Mr. Cilley had given to Mr. Graves the satisfaction demanded of an exchange of shots, and from the further circumstance that Mr. Cilley not only repeated the disclaimer that he had meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, but positively avowed, also, that he entertained for him the highest respect and the most kind feelings.

In this state of the controversy the challenge is renewed, and Mr. Cilley again puts his life in jeopardy. The challenge being once more suspended, he again insists upon his original position, that he had declined to receive the demand for explanation of the words spoken by him in debate, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with Webb, and that he would assign no other reason; and while, on the other hand, it was insisted for Mr. Graves that he considered himself bound not only to preserve the respect due to himself, but to defend the honor of his friend, colonel Webb, and that he only insisted "that he had not borne the note of a man who was not a man of honor and not a gentleman," Mr. Cilley replied affirmatively to a proposition submitted on the part of Mr. Graves, that in declining to receive the note, he meant no disrespect to Mr. Graves, either directly or indirectly; and declared that he entertained the highest respect for him, but declined to receive the note, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy with colonel Webb. He excluded, in direct and positive terms, every possibility of disrespect to Mr. Graves, directly or indirectly, and in effect only insisted on his right to decline a demand for explanation of words spoken in debate, because he chose to be drawn into no controversy upon the subject, without assigning any other reason. But he was interrogated for another reason, and another reason was demanded; and for resisting that demand the challenge was again renewed, and he fell a victim in defence of what he conceived to be his rights as an individual, or as a representative of the people in the house of representatives.

The committee were disposed to pursue this inquiry in every form. Not content with tracing the cause of the challenge in the written correspondence, in the assignment of reasons for the challenge under Mr. Graves' own hand, and in the various propositions which were submitted on the field, from the beginning to the end of the contest, they proceeded to put to every witness who was believed to know any thing upon the subject, the direct inquiry, whether "Mr. Graves or his second, at any time before Mr. Cilley fell, communicated to Mr. Cilley, his second, or attendant friends, that a question of veracity between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley was a point of difficulty to be adjusted?" Mr. Jones answered, "Certainly not to me, nor to Mr. Cilley, at any time, to my knowledge, either before or during the day the duel was fought. I did not hear of the existence of such a question until the Sunday or Monday after Mr. Cilley was killed." The written correspondence between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley does not show the existence of any such question of veracity." Mr. Bynum answered, "I heard no such communication, directly or indirectly, from either Mr. Graves or his second, made or intimated to Mr. Cilley or any of his friends, before he fell." Mr. Schaumburg answered, "I did not understand that there was a 'question of veracity' between the parties, nor was there any conversation on the subject." Dr. Duncan answered, "They never did to my knowledge. I never heard the question of veracity assigned, during Mr. Cilley's life, as the cause of any difficulty." Mr. Pierce answered, "I never held any conversation with Mr. Graves, or his second or attendant friends, in relation to the late fatal duel, nor did I ever hear, until subsequently to the 24th of February last, that any question of veracity between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, was a point of difficulty to be adjusted." Dr. Foltz answered, "They did not." Mr. Wise answered, "I do not know what Mr. Graves may have communicated to Mr. Cilley at any time before he fell, as to a question of veracity between them. I presume they both knew what had passed between them, verbally. I believe that I did state to Mr. Jones, or to other friends of Mr. Cilley, on the ground, that Mr. Graves said Mr. Cilley had assigned to him the reason for declining to receive the note of colonel Webb, that he did not choose to be held accountable for words spoken in debate. I think I so informed Mr. Jones when I asked him if Mr. Cilley could not assign this reason on the ground: but of this I am not positive." Mr. Crittenden answered, "Not that I know of. I know of no communication between any of these parties other than as before stated, so far as I now recollect. Whether those communications involve any such question it is not for me to decide; no such question was made, in terms, that I know of." Mr. Menefee answered, "Mr. Graves had no communication of any kind with Mr. Cilley, his second, or attendant friends, and of course did not communicate to them that such a question was a point of difficulty. Nor did the second of Mr. Graves, as far as I remember, make such a communication, except so far as may be implied from the propositions made by him, in connection with the correspondence, &c. One, at least, of the friends of Mr. Graves, in the presence of his second, made frequent attempts to direct the attention of the second and friends of Mr. Cilley to the difficulty which was presented by the terms of Mr. Graves' first note (giving his version of what Mr. Cilley had said) and the ground which Mr. Cilley had subsequently assumed. But it was not referred to, in terms, as a question of veracity. It was believed that Mr. Cilley had honorable grounds, which would be satisfactory to Mr. Graves, and at the same time compatible with the truth, which would effect the object, without making directly such a question whilst efforts were pending to accommodate. Whether the views, thus expressed, were communicated to Mr. Cilley, I know not. For the character of what occurred on this point, so far as I participated in it, the committee are referred to my general statement."

Mr. Graves said to Dr. Foltz, on the way to the field, "That he had been the bearer of a note from colonel Webb to Mr. Cilley, inquiring if Mr. Cilley had been correctly reported in the Globe. Mr. Cilley refused to receive the note, and declined giving his reasons, which implicated me, in consequence of which I challenged him, but I have no personal animosity towards him." Mr. Wise said on the field, "Mr. Jones, these gentlemen have come here without animosity towards each other; they are fighting merely upon a point of honor." "These men have nothing against each other; they are merely settling a point of honor."

This concurrent testimony of all, without exception, taken in connection with the written correspondence, the various propositions and answers on the field, and the further fact that Mr. Cilley had not been informed that Mr. Graves had undertaken to repeat to others any verbal communication between them, or that any misapprehension or misunderstanding existed between them on that subject, utterly repels the suggestion, that any question of veracity had arisen, or had been made, or was the cause of the challenge, or of the death of Mr. Cilley. Indeed, any misapprehension on that subject would have given no more just ground of animosity, and least of all of the highly vindictive feelings necessarily aroused by a question of veracity, than the very evident misapprehension which Mr. Graves labored under in regard to some parts of the note of James Watson Webb, of which he was the bearer.

The committee will not, in justice to Mr. Graves, harbor the belief, that there were rankling secretly in his bosom any vindictive or hostile feelings towards Mr. Cilley, growing out of any question of personal veracity, and prompting him to carry on a deadly warfare under another pretext, not only without a direct and explicit disclosure of the real cause of difficulty, such as would have left no misapprehension on the mind of any one, but under circumstances which misled the other party and his friends, and left him, under that false impression, to the forfeit of his life.

The committee have, therefore, come to the conclusion, that the words spoken by Mr. Cilley in debate in the house of representatives, the refusal of Mr. Cilley to receive a demand for explanation of those words, and his refusal to assign any other reason for it, than that he chose to be drawn into no difficulty upon the subject, were the causes which led to the death of Mr. Cilley, under the circumstances which have been substantially detailed.

It remains to inquire whether there has been a breach of the privilege of the house.

It is a breach of the highest constitutional privileges of the house, and of the most sacred rights of the people in the person of their representative, to demand in a hostile manner, an explanation of words spoken in debate; to be the bearer of such a demand; to demand a reason for refusing to receive it, beyond the mere voluntary election of the member interrogated; or to demand, under any circumstances, any reason at all. No member can be questioned in a hostile way, and put to his plea, and yield to it, without subjecting himself to great disadvantages in the estimation of many, and impairing his influence and his usefulness as a member. It is a still more aggravated breach of the privilege of the house, and of the rights of the people in the person of their representative, to challenge a member, and to slay him in combat, for refusing to comply with any such demand. It is the highest offence which can be committed against either house of congress; against the freedom of speech and of debate therein; against the spirit and the substance of that constitutional provision, that for any speech or debate in either house, the member shall not be questioned in any other place, and violates essentially the right of perfect immunity elsewhere for words spoken in debate here, which is essential to the independence of congress, and to the existence of constitutional liberty. And when this offence is committed by a member, it calls for the exercise of the highest powers of the house to purge itself of the evil, to maintain effectually its rights and privileges, and to preserve inviolate this immunity, which is guaranteed by the constitution, not for the sake of the individual, but for his constituents and the country.

The present case is without any circumstance of extenuation. A member of the house, in a manner most strictly parliamentary, on an occasion most appropriate, in language most decorous and moderate, in defence of the honor of the house against an anonymous and unfounded charge of corruption, and alluded to the published records of former proceedings with perfect truth and accuracy; had in obedience to his duty, declined a hostile demand for explanation in a manner in which the committee can discover no cause of offence; had respectfully with expressions of regret, declined to admit the right to interrogate him further; had disclaimed all disrespect, directly or indirectly, towards his antagonist, and avowed for him the highest respect and the kindest feelings; and, after all this, avowed without hostility, and against the strongest protestations of others, he was required fatally to expose himself to the third discharge of a rifle. On the other hand, Mr. Graves, a member of the house, voluntarily and unnecessarily became the bearer of a demand from another member in attendance, for an explanation of words spoken in debate; he presented it in the house while the house was in session; he demanded a reason for the refusal, beyond the voluntary election of that member to be drawn into no difficulty upon the subject; which being withheld, he then challenged him in this city, and slew him in this vicinity, while congress was in session. Every step of Mr. Graves in this progress, involved him deeper and deeper in a breach of the privileges of the house, until their destruction was consummated in the person of Mr. Cilley. The eye of reason can discover, in the whole course of Mr. Cilley, no offence towards those who pursued him, except that given by alluding to the records of congress, in the faithful and upright discharge of his duty as a member, which, justly, could have given no offence at all. Nor can his death be vindicated or excused by any circumstance whatsoever, not even by that custom, the relic of unenlightened and barbarous ages, which was formerly supposed to be a proof of some degree of physical courage, but is, in fact, a signal monument of the want of the higher attribute of moral courage; which has, in these modern times, degenerated into a game of chances and a scramble for undue advantages; which can furnish no criterion for truth, justice, or honor, and deals out its inflictions of misery most severely upon the unoffending and the helpless; which is deeply deplored by all men, even those who submit to it, and is forbidden, in every stage of it, by all law, human and divine.

It is not necessary, on the present occasion, to go into any consideration of the general power of the house to punish for breach of privilege; or to inquire into the origin and foundation of that power over contempts, which has been asserted by the parliament of Great Britain, from time immemorial, by every legislative body, by every judicial tribunal from the highest to the lowest, and repeatedly, by one or the other house of congress, and has been recognized as existing in the house of representatives by the supreme court of the United States. Whether it be a power necessary to the continued existence of the legislative body, or a power necessary to the free exercise of its legislative functions, it is in either case a necessary power, strictly granted by the constitution, and as fully granted as if it were literally expressed. But in the case of members, the constitution has expressly granted the power to punish for disorderly conduct; and has, also, expressly granted the power, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member for any cause which two-thirds of the house may deem sufficient.

The committee, therefore, viewing the breach of the rights and privileges of the house, on the part of Mr. Graves, to have been an offence of this high character, against the vital principle of a deliberative assembly and of representative government, feel constrained, by a sense of duty, to present to the house a resolution that he be expelled therefrom.

It has been decided by the house of representatives, on a former occasion, that it was a breach of privilege to send a challenge to a member in attendance, or to be the bearer of such challenge. And it is equally so to act as second to the challenger. In the present instance it appears that Mr. Wise had no knowledge of the demand of explanation which was borne by Mr. Graves, and had never seen that paper until after the fatal catastrophe. But having been early consulted by Mr. Graves upon the first letter of Mr. Cilley, and concurred with him in his views of it, he bore the challenge to Mr. Cilley, and he acted throughout as the second of the challenger, advising and insisting that the fight should go on, until Mr. Cilley fell. The committee, therefore, deeming him deeply involved, under the circumstances which this case presents, in a breach of the privileges of the house, report a resolution that he deserves the decided censure of the house, and that he be censured accordingly.

Mr. Jones had no knowledge of the affair until the determination of Mr. Cilley had been formed as to the acceptance of the challenge, and the time, mode, weapon, and other preliminaries of the meeting. But he was the bearer of the acceptance, and acted throughout as the second of the challenged party; and it is the opinion of the committee that he was thereby involved in a breach of privilege, and that he be censured therefor.

In regard to the persons, not principal nor seconds, who were present on the field, and expressed their opinions at the request of the parties, without having advised, instigated, or procured the meeting, however they might be implicated in the courts of law, the committee entertain doubts how far they would be involved in a breach of privilege; and, under a strong conviction that the power of the house should be exercised, never in a doubtful case, always with moderation, they content themselves with presenting the facts and circumstances, so far as those persons are concerned, without proposing any action thereon.

The committee entertain no doubt, that James Watson Webb has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of the house; but they also concur unanimously in the opinion, that if there be any real ground to believe that a conspiracy to assassinate actually existed, as set forth in that atrocious paper drawn up by him, signed by Daniel Jackson and William H. Morell, sworn to by the latter, and published in the New York Courier and Enquirer, he be left to the chastisement of the courts of law and of public opinion, and that the house will consult its own dignity and the public interests by bestowing upon him no further notice.

As soon as the report was read, as the clerk was about to read the resolutions with which it concludes,

Mr. Wise asked leave to propound a question to the chairman of the committee, in justice to all the parties concerned.

Mr. Turney inquired if the reading of the whole paper was concluded?

The Chair replied in the negative.

Mr. Turney must then object to arresting it at this stage.

Mr. Wise would remark to the gentleman that the question came in pertinently at that time. It was a single question.

Mr. Turney would withdraw it for that purpose, but he should renew the objection if it arrested the reading of the report for any length of time.

Mr. Wise said it was one of serious import as respected himself as second in that affair, or he should not have interposed at that time. There was a general remark, as would be noticed by the house, in the report of the majority in relation to the general practice of duelling. Speaking of the character of that practice, they speak of it generally as a scramble for undue advantages. I merely wish, said Mr. W. to ask the chairman, to ask all the members of the committee, so that my remark may not be misunderstood by the world, or by any here present or absent, whether the least particle of the least conviction existed in the mind of any one member of that committee, that the least undue, or scramble for undue advantage, was taken, or attempted to be taken, in this fight? Whether the friends of the deceased did not think the fight was perfectly fair, and whether there was any evidence to show there was any undue advantage taken in any way, in any manner, by any of the parties?

Mr. Toucey said I will answer in the most positive manner, as far as I know, that it was not the intention of the committee, in that general remark, to make any application of it to this particular case nor to accuse any one on the field for any scramble for undue advantage, or any thing that would be denominated unfair. Nor was there any evidence of any thing of the kind.

The resolutions with which the report concludes were then read, as follows:

Resolved, That William J. Graves, a member of this house from the state of Kentucky, in bearing to the late Jonathan Cilley, then a member of this house, the demand for explanation of words spoken in debate, demanding his reasons for declining to receive it, and challenging him, and engaging in a late duel with him, which terminated in his death, has been guilty of a breach of the privilege of this house.

And be it further resolved, That the said W. J. G. for said breach of privilege be, and hereby is, expelled from this house.

Resolved, That Henry A. Wise, in bearing a challenge to the late Jonathan Cilley, then a member of this house, and acting as a second to the challenger in the duel, which terminated in the death of Mr. Cilley, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this house, and that he deserves the decided censure of this house, and hereby is, censured accordingly.

Resolved, That Geo. W. Jones, in acting as second to the challenged party, the late Jonathan Cilley, then a member of this house, in the duel which terminated in his death, has been guilty of a breach of the privileges of this house, and that he be therefor, and hereby is, censured accordingly by this house.

Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, at this stage, moved an adjournment; lost.

The report, counter-report, of Messrs. Grennell and Kariden was then read through by the clerk, and having been concluded,

Mr. Bronson moved that the house do adjourn; which motion was carried in the negative.

The clerk then proceeded to read the report of Mr. Elmore, another member of the select committee.

[These two reports will be given hereafter.]

As soon as the reading of the above report was concluded—

Mr. Toucey obtained the floor, and, on his motion,

The house adjourned.

Thursday, April 26. The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting, in reply to the resolution of the 16th instant, statements of the amount received from the sales of public land subject to the making of the Cumberland road, and the amount of unsold land in each state, &c.

Also, a letter from the secretary of the navy, correcting an error in his report of the 16th of March, in obedience to the order of the house of the 19th February, as to the date of the appointment of the members of the scientific corps of the exploring expedition.

Also, a letter from the postmaster general transmitting the information called for by the house on the 16th instant, as to the irregularities and failures of the great western mail between the city of Washington and Wheeling within the last three months, and the causes thereof, as far as known to the department.

Also, the following letter from the postmaster general, in answer to the call of the house of the 16th instant:

Post office department, April 24, 1838.

Hon. J. K. POLK,

Speaker house of representatives:

SIR: In compliance with a resolution adopted by the house of representatives on the 16th instant, I have the honor to inform the house that the number of failures in the arrival at the New York post office, in respect to the express mail between New Orleans and New York, since the first day of January last, appears by the books of the inspection office to have been thirty-four.

These are not total failures, but failures to arrive on the proper day.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
AMOS KENDALL.

A number of resolutions, petitions, &c. were presented, and several bills read, on leave, and appropriately referred.

The reading of the documents accompanying the report of the duelling committee, was begun immediately after the presentation of the communications referred to above, and occupied the whole day's sitting.

During the reading, the private secretary of the president of the United States appeared at the bar with a message.

The Chair announced this fact, stating that, pending a privilege question, a message would be received by consent of the house.

Mr. Sawyer, of North Carolina, objected to its reception.

The Chair restated the rule of the house with regard to this point, at the same time remarking that the president of the United States had, at any time, a right to send a message to the house; a right by the constitution, and one to which he had never known an objection to have been made before.

Mr. Sawyer adhered to his objection. He said that he regarded the whole of the proceeding (in regard to the late duel) now pending before the house, as a solemn farce; the sooner it was finished the better, and he was for having every thing else to give way to it, until it were got through with.

The Speaker said it was a grave question; but that if he were to be called on to decide between the orders of the house and the constitutional right of the executive to approach it with a message, he must decide that the message must be received. He hoped the objection would be withdrawn, however.

The objection was withdrawn, and the message was received.

Mr. Howard rose, and gave notice that before the house should adjourn, he should ask for the reading of this message.

The house adjourned at 4 o'clock, however, without taking any question, or concluding the reading of the evidence.

CHRONICLE.

Important slave case. The district court of the United States, in session at Trenton, judge Baldwin presiding, has been engaged during a week past with a suit brought by Culbreth, of Md. against Griscom and others, inhabitants of Salem, in the state of New Jersey, for rescuing a fugitive slave which the plaintiff had claimed in the vicinity of that town. After a laborious trial, Mr. Southard for the plaintiff and Mr. Frelinghuysen, and others, for the defendants, the jury returned a verdict on Friday of $1000 damages and costs against the defendants. A motion was made for a new trial, which will be argued at the next term.

[Poulson's Daily Advertiser.]

The Valley Creek bridge on the Columbia railroad, was recently destroyed by fire. It was nearly 800 feet long, and in thirteen days after the fire a new bridge, of the same length, was erected and ready for travel.

A gentleman coming up the river to Pittsburg dropped his wallet overboard containing $5000 in bank notes. The yawl was launched and the wallet picked up two miles below the place it was dropped. Had it been that amount in Benton's mint drops, it would have gone to the bottom like a lump of sugar in a tea cup.

Willis vs. Clifton. Here is a suit in earnest.—Willis wrote a play expressly for the lovely Josephine, and the price was to have been $1000. The author demanded his money for the play, which Josephine's secretary paid by a note of hand.—When the note was due it was protested for non-payment, and for this cause is the action brought against the pretty actress. She says she won't pay it, and intends to plead "no consideration and no value."

The Bank of Montreal has offered a reward of 1000*l* for the recovery of about 10,000*l* alleged to have been stolen by Wm. Coates, late first teller in the branch of that institution established in Quebec.

The Ohio Journal states, that the express mail to the west is soon to be discontinued.

Mr. Dunham, late cashier of the Lafayette Bank of Boston, has been convicted of perjury.

Swamp lands of North Carolina. Charles B. Shaw, esq. engineer of the literary board of the state of North Carolina, reports that 150,000 acres of valuable swamp lands in the eastern section of the state, may be drained at a cost not exceeding $70,000. The recovery of these swamp lands will not only purify a large section from the malaria, which has made it a grave to so many, but add immensely to the resources of the state by that rich soil redeemed for cultivation, the profits of much of which it appears are to go the literary fund. Thus will the ploughman's toil subserve the cause of science and learning, and North Carolina be enriched in pecuniary as in intellectual wealth.

Frank Johnson, colored leader of the quondam Philadelphia brass band, is giving concerts before the English nobility at the Argyle rooms, London. His performances are highly spoken of.

Richard K. Frost, the Thompsonian. The case of this gentleman, whose trial on the charge of manslaughter, for killing his patient Tiberius G. French, by lobelia, excited so much attention some months ago, was brought to a conclusion on Monday last in the New York court of general sessions, by the court adjudging him to pay $150. The fine was paid and Dr. Frost was discharged from custody.

The Northern Bank of Kentucky, under the authority of the act passed by the last legislature, is already issuing notes of one, two, and three dollars. They are signed by the cashier alone. The vignettes are the same as on the larger notes.

Red river raft. New Orleans, April 1st We have been favored with the perusal of a letter from captain Shreve, dated March the 29th at Duby's Bayou. He states that the raft is now cleared away, and the navigation easy and uninterrupted. He ascended the stream through the whole extent of the raft, a distance of 52 miles, in nine hours. There is sufficient depth of water for any steamer that can navigate Red-river. Ten feet is found in the shallowest places—

Loss of steamboat Black Hawk. The steamer Black Hawk, in descending the Red river a few days ago, struck a snag, bilged and sunk. She was laden with cotton, a good portion of which was saved. The vessel is a wreck, being buried in three fathoms water; there is no expectation even of recovering the engine and machinery.

Short passage. The ship Richard Anderson, capt. Lucas, arrived at Liverpool on the 8th March in the remarkably short run of sixteen days from Hampton roads. This fine vessel, it will be recollected, was built in Baltimore for a mercantile house in Petersburg, and is an admirable specimen of naval architecture, both in regard to her strength of construction and rapidity of sailing.

Naval. A letter dated Valparaiso, Dec. 27, from an officer on board the U. S. ship Falmouth, commander McKeever, mentions the safe arrival of that ship at that port, after a passage of fifty three days from Rio Janeiro, eighteen of which were spent in doubling the cape, they having proceeded as far south as lat. 59. The Falmouth off cape Horn picked up a boat containing six men, belonging to an American sealing ship, who had been left on a desolate island for skins, their provisions all gone, on their way to Port Desire, when the timely appearance of the Falmouth relieved them.

Punishment of death. An act of the New Jersey legislature, approved on the 17th February last, distinguishes all murder hereafter committed in that state into three degrees; the first, when the homicide is perpetrated from a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, or of any other human being; the second, when the homicide is perpetrated by an act eminently dangerous to others, and evincing a depraved mind regardless of human life, although without premeditated design to kill; and the third, when the homicide is perpetrated by a person engaged in the commission of any felony, without any design to effect death. Every person convicted of murder in the first degree, is to be punished with death, those convicted of the second degree, are to suffer solitary imprisonment for life at hard labor, and to be considered and esteemed civilly dead from the moment sentence is pronounced against them, while those convicted of the third degree, are doomed to imprisonment at hard labor for any term not exceeding twenty years, at the discretion of the court, and according to the nature and aggravation of their offence.

Isaac H. Bronson, esq. of Jefferson county, New York, a member of congress, has been appointed judge of the fifth judicial district of that state.

Consuls. George Dobson has been appointed consul of the republic of Texas for the port of Mobile, in the state of Alabama, and has been recognised as such by the president of the United States.

George A. Trenholm has been appointed vice consul of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies for the port of Charleston, South Carolina, and has been recognised as such by the president of the United States.

The governor of Tennessee has subscribed stock to the amount of $650,000 in the Cincinnati and Charleston railroad company, in pursuance of the bank and internal improvement act of the late general assembly of that state.

Marine disasters. The New York Journal of Commerce states, on the authority of a friend who has kept an account of disasters at sea, that from the 1st of January, 1837, to the 1st of April, 1838, news was received of the loss of 119 ships, 161 brigs, 270 schooners, most of which, though not all, were American vessels.

The Bank of West Florida has been reorganised, and is about to recommence operations in Apalachicola. The old bills have been called in, and will be paid off at sight. The stock is said to be in the hands of substantial capitalists, who are making arrangements to place the affairs of the bank on the most respectable footing. At a meeting of the stockholders held in Apalachicola, on the 2d instant, the following gentlemen were elected directors for the present year, viz: H. Stevenson, A. G. Semmes, E. Wood, John Locke, John T. Myrick, P. W. Gautier, jr., and A. K. Allison.

Michigan, with only 173,600 inhabitants, already contains fifty-two banks, while in Pennsylvania, one of the oldest states in the union, with a population of 1,500,000, there are but fifty banks.

Black Hawk and his son at a ball. A ball was given at fort Madison, Wisconsin territory, on the 22d February, in honor of the day. The Patriot of that place says, that "general Black Hawk, and Nashe-as-kuik, his eldest son, with their wives, were present on this occasion. The former had on his full court dress. The bride of Black Hawk's first born is said to be a very modest and pretty young woman of the Sauk tribe."

The board of aldermen of the city of St. Louis, have balloted one hundred and forty-five times for a president, without effecting a choice.

Never before done. The Lockport Balance records the feat of a dog which a couple of weeks since went over the falls of Niagara, and came out of the boiling abyss below, landing on terra firma alive, and not much the worse for his terrific adventure.

Last of the buffaloes. The Missouri Watchman states that a dead buffalo, on a long tour from the head waters of Missouri, was discovered floating on the river, one day last week, and towed into the mouth of Wier's creek. Numbers were attracted to the spot by the novelty of the spectacle. Like the Indians, whose melancholy fate they had been doomed to share, these exiles of the prairie are strangers in the land which was, but a few short years ago, their undisturbed home. [St. Louis Bulletin.]

From Fort Towson. Little Rock, (Arkansas,) April 11. We learn, by a letter from an officer of the United States army, at fort Towson, that captain De Hart reached that post on the morning of the 31st ultimo, with one hundred and eighty recruits for the companies of the 3d U. S. infantry, stationed at that post. They left New York on the 9th February, and came around by New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi to the mouth of Red river, and up the latter river, through the great raft, (which has just been opened under the superintendence of captain Shreeve,) to their place of destination; having performed the distance, no doubt, in less than half the time that it ever was performed before, by a similar body of men.

The same letter adds, that captain Bonneville would leave, in a day or two, with his company, for Fort Gibson. [Arkansas Gazette.]

Imports and exports of specie. We stated last week the sums in specie recently imported. To-day we give the exact amount of imports and exports for the past week.

There was entered at the custom house the last week,	$3,062,500
Exports for the same period	8,000
	$3,054,500
Arrived yesterday in the George Washington, about	1,000,000
Total for the past eight days	$4,054,500

Touching the present importation of specie from England, the Express of Monday says—

We have no very satisfactory accounts of the ways and means by which the ten millions of specie are raised for the United States, though it is now certain, that the Bank of England has entered heartily into the exportation for the purpose of righting the exchange on New York, which was from 5 to 6 per cent. against England, as well as for the purpose of re-instating trade and confidence in this country, so as once more to create a demand for British manufactures, and thus impart something of activity to the manufacturing towns. Mr. Jaudon, we see it stated, is active in remitting gold and silver to the United States Bank,—and it is also stated, that the directors of the Bank of England have sent orders to their agent here, Mr. Cowell, to purchase first rate bills, and to remit specie to a considerable amount for such an operation. The Bank of England will make a good profit by this business, but it is subjected to severe attacks in many of the British presses for entering upon such a trading character in the precious metals.

Steam-ships for London and Bristol. The British steam-ship Sirius is advertised to sail from New York for London on the 1st day of next month; and the steam-ship Great Western for Bristol on the 7th day of May. Cabin passage in each $140, including provisions and usual fare of packet-ships.

Sir Andrew Hay, has been appointed governor of Bermuda, with a salary of 6000*l*. per annum. Shiel, the "patriot" has been appointed one of the commissioners of the Greenwich hospital, with a salary of about 1500*l*. a sinecure for life.

DISTRESSING CALAMITIES. We have published on the last page accounts of two most distressing calamities, involving the loss of more than one hundred lives, by the bursting of the boiler of the steamboat Moselle, near Cincinnati, Ohio, and the destruction of a large portion of the city of Charleston, South Carolina, by fire, causing a loss of property estimated at nearly three millions of dollars, and several valuable lives. The particulars are, indeed, most heart-rending, and appeal warmly to our sympathies.

We learn from the Cincinnati Express, that the committee appointed to inquire into the facts concerning the loss of the Moselle, state that there were on board nearly two hundred and fifty-five passengers. Of this number, it is known that there are

56 missing,
16 wounded,
103 saved,

In addition to the 238 here enumerated, there were seventeen passengers not registered, who are known to have been on board, making up the total of two hundred and fifty-five. The probability is that they are among the dead.

VIRGINIA. The election for members of the legislature has resulted in the choice of a majority of whigs. We cannot, from the accounts before us, state the result correctly; but the latest, seemingly prepared with care, give the whigs 58 members, the friends of the administration 27, and the conservatives 7. The same counties last year elected 37 whigs and 56 friends of the administration. We will give the details in our next.

From the congressional district recently represented by Mr. Patton, we have contradictory reports. One party contends that Mr. Slaughter (w.) has been elected by a majority of 14 votes; the other, that Mr. Lynn Banks (ad.) has succeeded by a majority estimated at 28 votes. The contest has been a close one, and the result cannot be ascertained until the official returns are received. They shall also have a place in the next "REGISTER."

THE ALBANY CHARTER ELECTION was held on Tuesday last, and resulted in an aggregate whig majority of 597 votes.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 1, 1838.

The treasury notes issued up to this date, under the provisions of the act of congress of the 12th of October, 1837, amount to $9,524,751 47

It appears by the returns made up to the same period, that there has been received for duties and lands, and in payment of debts due to the United States, about

5,175,000 00

This leaves outstanding only $4,349,751 47
LEVI WOOBBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

FORGED TREASURY NOTES. A person by the name of John B. Henderson was yesterday arrested by Mr. constable Beck, of this city, and fully committed for trial by justice Morsell for having issued and passed forged treasury notes. In his possession were found several impressions of those notes, some of them filled up and some blank. All the impressions are from the original plates, and are what are usually known as proof impressions, and, of course, must have been stolen from the engravers, (Messrs. Rawdon, Wright and Hatch,) in New York, who have the plates in their possession.

There is reason to believe that he may have passed others of these notes, and, as all found in his possession were of India paper, it is to be hoped that none of the forged ones were of the paper used for the genuine notes. If such be the case, it is very easy to detect the counterfeits, as the India paper, on which they are impressed, is rather thinner and softer than that of the genuine, and on being wetted, nearly dissolves, being easily torn, almost with breathing strongly on it, whilst the paper of the genuine notes is of the strongest material. The signatures also, of the forged notes, although well executed, can be readily detected.—The signature of the acting treasurer, Wm. B. Randolph, appears as if written Wm. B. Randolph. That of the register, also, T. L. Smith, appears to be written S. T. Smith.

One of the notes passed by Henderson purported to be for $4,000, the sum being filled up by the pen on the impression used for the fractional sums between $50 and $100. No note of that amount has ever been issued, the issues as yet being only notes of $1,000, $500, $100, $50, and the fractional issues of sums between $50 and $100, the amount and figures being filled up with the pen.

We hasten to give this information, in order to protect the community from being imposed on, in case any of the forged notes should be offered.

[Globe of Tuesday.]

The N. Intelligencer says that "the prisoner, on Friday, 27th ult., presented two papers, purporting to be treasury notes of the U. S., of the value of $4,000 and $50, at the Farmers' and Planters' bank of Baltimore, for which he received their notes and a premium. It was soon afterwards ascertained that these notes were forgeries, and the prisoner was traced to this city. He afterwards, before he left Baltimore, exchanged the Baltimore notes for Virginia bank notes."

FROM FLORIDA. From the Globe of Wednesday night. We understand reports have been received at the war department, stating that Alligator, one of the most active and warlike of the hostiles, had surrendered at Fort Basinger on the 4th of April. He was found with 88 of his people, among whom was John Cowaya and 27 blacks, to the southwest of Okeechobee. Alligator was to return to his party, and, by means of runners, collect all the scattered Indians, and concentrate them at Peace creek. It is confidently expected that Coachnochee, with a small party, can be prevailed on by Alligator to come in also.

In addition to the above, it is also learned that 45 Indians, 17 of whom are warriors, were recently captured by a detachment of regular troops and Tennessee volunteers, under lieutenant R. Anderson, 3d artillery, and are now at Fort Lauderdale. General Jesup at the last advices, (18th April,) was at Tampa Bay.

MAIL CARRIER MURDERED.—A letter from the postmaster at Tampa, (Florida,) dated Feb. 13, says: "The mail which left here on Tuesday, the 3d inst. is lost. The carrier was brutally murdered about sixteen miles this side of Fort King. He was shot from his horse by Indians, his scalp taken off, his eyes dug out, his ears and nose cut off, and other horrid atrocities and torments inflicted upon him. The horse and mail bags have not since been found."

FRANCE. In relation to the publications below, which have been transferred to the journals of this country, the Intelligencer of Saturday contains the following paragraph:

"We inserted in our yesterday's paper a letter from the Paris correspondent of the New York American, stating that despatches had been received by the French government, from the United States, in relation to the commercial crisis in this country, which they depict in the darkest colors; and adding that the French minister at Washington, and the consul general at New York, concurred in giving the intelligence. We have particular reasons to know, since the appearance of that article in our columns, that this statement is entirely incorrect as far as regards the former, and it is supposed equally so as regards the latter of these functionaries."

It is but an act of justice to the French minister near the United States, and to the French consul at

New York, to confirm the truth of the denial. We understand that by despatches received at the department of state from France, it appears that our minister at Paris has ascertained, by an application to count Mole, that the offensive matters in the letters were forgeries, interpolated for the double purpose of doing injury to the administrations of France and that of the United States. The financial information was sent by the consul at New York without any allusion whatever to this government.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. Bank dividends. The following dividends have been declared by institutions of New York.

The bank of the state of New York six per cent. for the year ending the 1st inst, payable on the 10th inst.

The Leather Manufacturer's bank has declared a dividend of eight per cent. for the year ending the 1st of February last, payable on the 7th inst.

The Merchants' Exchange bank, eight per cent., for the year ending December 31st, payable on the 10th inst.

The bank of New York, a dividend of eight per cent. payable on the 10th instant.

The Atlantic bank of Brooklyn has declared a dividend of eight per cent., payable on the 15th inst.

Exchange. For the European packet which left here yesterday, the demand was quite limited for bills on England, and the amount offered being considerable, the rates receded about 1-2 per cent., being for good current bills chiefly, 6 1-4 a 6 3-4 premium; on France, bills were in better request, and 5f. 33 a 5f. 37 1-2 were the rates obtained; but little was done on other places, and mostly at 89 cts. on Holland, 84 7-8 on Hamburg and 77 1-2 cts. No sales of treasury notes were made yesterday, the quotations are 99 5-8 a 99 3-4 cts per dollar.

[Price Current.]

100 shares American Life and Trust Company, Baltimore, 99 1-2.

Treasury notes.—Some sales were made this morning, but not of large amount—fives are noted at 99 3-4 a 99 7-8, and sixes at 99 7-8 a 100.

Money and exchanges at New Orleans bore the following rates on the 26th April.

Eagle dollars	-	7 a 8 per cent. premium.

Kentucky	-	1 a 2 per cent. prem.
Illinois	-	1 a 1 1-2 per cent. prem.
Indiana	-	1 a 2 per cent. prem.
Ohio	-	1 a 2 per cent. prem.
Arkansas	-	20 a 25 per cent. dis.
Texas bank notes	-	30 a 35 per cent. dis.
Treasury notes	-	7 a 8 per cent. prem.

Exchange.—Demand continues limited for sterling. We give the rate at 10 a 10 1-2 for good bills. Principal sales at the former quotation. On New York, 60 days sight, 6 1-2 a 7 per cent. premium; 30 days, 7 1-2 a 8 1-2; sight to 10 days, 9 a 11.

Freights.—Demand for vessels of every class continues brisk at the following rates:

Cotton to Liverpool	1 1-4d.
Cotton to Havre	2 1-4 a 2 1-2c.
Cotton to northern ports	1 1-4 a 1 1-2c.
Flour to northern ports	$1 25c a $1 50 per bbl.
Tobacco, $14 a $15 per hhd.	demanded for northern ports.

The Philadelphia Inquirer of Monday says, it is believed that most of the Philadelphia banks will, in the course of a day or two, pay specie for all demands upon them under a dollar. It is understood that the city councils have determined to call in all their certificates now in circulation of a smaller denomination than one dollar. The loan companies and savings' institutions that are anxious to possess the confidence of the public, will no doubt imitate this laudable example; and thus, in the course of a short time, we shall have silver for all business transactions, where the sum does not exceed a dollar. This is the only true and practicable mode of commencing a permanent resumption of specie payments.

The above statement shows a diminution of loans and discounts for the last month of $353,489; an increase of specie of $755,097; a diminished circulation of $149,785; an increase of canal fund deposits of $61,004; of individual deposits $66,263; a diminution of the state treasurer's deposits of $22,725; and of the U. S. deposits $97,941.

The "Argus" accompanied the publication of governor Marcy's special message, recommending the loan to the banks, with the following remarks:

"This recommendation is made under circumstances of the highest interest and importance. The banks of this state, under a just appreciation of their obligations to the community, and in compliance with the public will and expectation, have announced their determination to resume the payment of specie on the 10th of the next month. In the discharge of this great duty, it is apparent that they will not only in all probability stand alone, but that they will encounter the active hostility of a powerful moneyed institution, and such as it can control. All doubt on this subject is removed by the published letter of Mr. Biddle, by his unblushing avowal of a determination to persist in subjecting the people of this country to the evils of an irredeemable and depreciated currency, and by the undisguised threat, that the vast moneyed power subject to his control, will be brought in, with all the strength of interest, of passion, and of fear that he can combine with it, to arrest the efforts of the sound banking institutions to stand once more before the world in the full discharge of their obligations. The advantages which a successful return to specie payments on the part of the banks of this state would confer upon our great commercial emporium—and its reflection of indelible disgrace upon the arrogant institution, which in contradiction of all its past assumptions, and regardless of every obligation of morality and of sound banking, shrinks from the fulfilment of all its high assurances to the public—leave no room to doubt that that institution will pursue its purpose, with the recklessness of faith and duty, which has, on too many occasions, marked its course of assault upon the best interests of the American people.

Under these circumstances it becomes the duty, not less than the pride of our state, to interpose "the use of its credit and the sanction of its name, to shield its institutions and its citizens from harm;" and in assuming the responsibilities demanded by the occasion, governor Marcy will be cheered, we do not doubt, by the approval of the people, and the unqualified thanks of all the friends of a sound currency. Of the manner in which this executive duty has been discharged, the message speaks for itself in terms that place the measure upon an impregnable basis.

The benign effect of the measure, however, if carried out by the legislature, will be preventive. It will hold out the assurance of an all-sufficient aid, if the emergency shall demand it; and this assurance, teaching the futility of hostile attacks from abroad, and inspiring confidence at home, will, in all probability, render a resort to it unnecessary. So that by its direct application, if need be, or through its influence, it will serve, in the language of the message, "to sustain our state institutions against hostile attacks from whatever quarter they may come, and to enable them to grant such assistance as will invigorate all branches of industry, call forth the energies of the state, and give an onward movement to its business concerns."

Statement of the condition of the Bank of England, 6th March, 1838.

Circulation 18,600,000	Securities 22,792,000
Deposite 11,635,000	Bullion 10,015,000

They who estimate the gold and silver in this country at $80,000,000, or $60,000,000 even, can see that they are wild, if the bullion in the Bank of England be a proper basis for a comparative estimate.

We copy from the Express of Saturday, the following details touching the condition of the banks in the city of New York:

We subjoin the following statement by which it appears that the liabilities of our banks are $19,856,049

Their specie on hand is $4,028,769

Other securities 34,579,154

The amount of deposits due individuals is $11,862,273. A large portion of which belongs to banks out of the city. Our banks are strong in securities, and if other banks paid specie would be doubly fortified. There is, however, a greater difference in the condition of a man who is obliged to pay his own debts, when others do not pay him, than there is when he can receive from those indebted more than he is required to pay. This is to a great extent the position of our banks.

The committee of banks in the Massachusetts legislature have reported in favor of a suspension of the law which subjects the banks to 24 per cent. on protest of their bills, on condition that the Boston banks pay specie for bills of and under five dollars, and country banks for bills under five dollars.

The associated banks of Boston in the week ending Saturday, April 14th, increased their specie $4,000, decreased their circulation $39,000, and their loans $456,000.

From the Albany Evening Journal of the 15th. vii. THE RELIEF BILL DEFEATED.

We doubt whether, in the annals of executive and legislative profligacy, a parallel can be found for the infamy and corruption which marks the course of the state administration upon the question of relief to the banks and the people, in anticipation of the resumption of specie payments.

Some time since, in view of the crisis which approaches, the bank committee of the assembly reported a bill authorising the banks to issue notes and to subscribe for the state stocks. In these measures there was aid to the banks and relief to the people.

The governor, ever ready to make political capital out of the distresses of the country, sent a special message to the legislature proposing an eight million loan to the banks, for the alleged purpose of sustaining them against the imaginary hostility of Mr. Biddle.

This message was referred in the assembly to a committee whose able and eloquent report, already published, places the whole question in its true light before the people.

In the meantime the assembly passed its bill, which authorized the banks to take the state stocks in the same manner that they received $2,700,000 under a law of the last legislature. The same bill permitted the country banks to issue once and a half the amount of their capital, a measure of indispensable importance to the people. It further authorized an issue of post notes, a proper measure of protection to the banks and the people in the event of another pecuniary revulsion.

This bill, liberal of relief and protection, and wise and guarded in its provisions was sent to the senate. That body, "true to its instincts," struck out both the post note section, and the section which enlarged the issues of the country banks. The senate then, instead of allowing the banks to subscribe for the state stocks, provided for a loan of those stocks to the banks by the state officers, upon the following abject, degrading, and infamous terms, contained in the 6th section of the bill sent from the senate:—

"Before the commissioners of the canal fund shall loan any portion of the stock authorized to be issued by this act, or the avails thereof, to any such bank or banks, the said commissioners shall be satisfied by proof in writing to be furnished them that such loan is necessary to sustain such bank or banks against the hostile operations of any non-specie paying bank or banks of any other state or country—such proof shall be placed in the comptroller's office.

This vile and corrupt proposition, from a party which has made itself hoarse for an entire year in shouting for "separation" and a "divorce" of the government from the banks, must fill the public mind with amazement! What is this proposition, stripped of its verbage and exposed in its naked deformity to the world? Why it is to place eight millions of dollars in the hands of Messrs. Flag, Dix & Co. as a political corruption fund! It is a foul use of the money of the people, to lure the banks into the service of the regency. It is a prostitution of the treasures of the state. It is a bribe offered to the cupidity and avarice of banks—a bribe, too, upon terms so infamous and degrading, that no bank, not utterly insolvent and abandoned in circumstances and character, would ever consent to take.

It is scarcely necessary to add that this proposition—a proposition so foul in its design, so corrupting in its tendency, so dishonorable to the banks, so unworthy of the character and dignity of legislation, was promptly and indignantly rejected by the assembly.

The senate, utterly regardless of the common welfare, and intent only upon their grovelling party schemes, adhered to their own corrupt bill.

The house proposed a committee of conference. That committee met. The result of their conference will be found in another column. It will be seen that the committee from the assembly proposed to yield all the provisions of their bill except that one which authorized the banks to take the state stocks; and it will also be seen that the senate's committee refused to take that section without coupling with it their own 6th section, which required the banks to furnish written evidence of their insolvency, and put on the regency collar, before they could receive any portion of the corruption fund.

The assembly adopted the report of its committee and insisted on its non-concurrence with the foul and corrupt proposition of the senate. The senate adhered to its profligate bill, and is left in its infamy.

The question is before the people, to whom their representatives are responsible. The course of each house will be scrutinized. That scrutiny will exhibit on the part of the assembly, an ardent and faithful devotion to the general welfare; while on the part of the senate, nothing will appear but a sordid, base, corrupt adherence to the views and purposes of a sinking, desparate party.

REPORT

IN THE CASE OF SENATOR RUGGLES.

In senate, April 12. Mr. White submitted the following report:

The select committee appointed in pursuance of a resolution adopted on the 21st of February last, by the senate, ask leave to submit the following report, in part discharge of the duties assigned to them:

As soon after their appointment as they conveniently could, to wit, on the 23d of February, the committee met and organized themselves. Their first object was to ascertain what were the duties assigned them by the senate. To do this they had recourse to the resolution under which they had been appointed. That resolution contains nothing on its face which is specific, but refers to a letter written by the honorable John Ruggles, one of the senators from Maine, and addressed to another member of the senate.

By recurring to that letter, it was found that a charge of corruption had been made against Mr. Ruggles, in one of the newspapers published in New York. The resolution and letter, taken in connection, made it the duty of the committee to inquire into the truth of this and other similar charges against the said senator from Maine.

Upon inquiry, the committee ascertained that the substance of this charge consisted in the supposed corrupt conduct of Mr. Ruggles, while a senator of the United States, in endeavoring to acquire an interest for himself for corruptly assisting Henry C. Jones, a citizen of Newark, in the state of New Jersey, to obtain from the patent office of the United States a patent for a lock, and aiding him to procure a contract with the post office department, by which his patent locks and mail pouches or bags to which they might be attached, should be used to secure the mail of the United States in its transportation from one post office to another.

The committee having thus ascertained the specific charge made, directed their chairman to notify Mr. Ruggles that they were ready to receive any written answer he might choose to make thereto. This duty the chairman performed, and a copy of his letter to Mr. Ruggles is herewith presented. Mr. Ruggles furnished to the committee his answer, which is herewith presented.

The committee caused a subpoena to be issued for the said Henry C. Jones and such other persons as they had reason to believe could give any evidence tending to establish the truth of the said charge; and also caused subpoenas to be issued for all such witnesses as Mr. Ruggles alleged could give any useful evidence in his behalf.

The several witnesses thus summoned appeared before the committee, were sworn, carefully examined and cross-examined, their testimony reduced to writing and severally subscribed by them, and the testimony thus procured is herewith presented, in eighteen depositions.

These depositions, and the papers referred to in and attached to them, appeared to the committee to furnish the only evidence which it was in their power to procure. Mr. Henry C. Jones, with whom this charge appears to have originated, was permitted by the committee to be constantly present at the examination of the several witnesses, and to suggest all such questions as the committee believed had any relation to the matters under investigation.

After all the witnesses had been examined, except general Wall, whom Mr. Ruggles stated would be the last he should call, Mr. Jones informed the committee that he wished to be discharged, that he might return home, where his business required his presence. He was informed that he could be discharged, if such was his wish, but that if he chose to remain, he would be permitted by the committee, after the evidence was closed, to make any additional statement or explanations he might think proper. He, however, preferred being discharged, and, as the committee suppose, went home.

When the taking the testimony of the witnesses was closed, Mr. Ruggles informed the committee he was then willing to submit himself to an examination, on oath, touching any of the matters alleged against him, if the committee wished such an examination. No member of the committee desiring to put any questions, Mr. Ruggles was not sworn. He was informed the committee would receive any observations or defence he might choose to submit to them in writing. He submitted the documents herewith presented, being a synopsis of the evidence, and his remarks upon the merits of the case.

The committee have carefully considered all the evidence produced in relation to the charge which grew out of the transaction between Mr. Ruggles and Mr. Jones, relative to the lock, and the uses to which it was to be applied, and have unanimously come to the conclusion expressed in the following resolution, which they recommend to the senate for adoption:

Resolved, That there is no satisfactory evidence to sustain the charge made by Henry C. Jones against the hon. John Ruggles, and that it is inexpedient for the senate to take any further measures in relation thereto.

From the Globe of Saturday night.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

We present below the correspondence between the secretary of state, and the minister plenipotentiary of Mexico, in relation to a proposed reference to an arbiter of the complaints of the United States against the Mexican government.

MR. MARTINEZ TO MR. FORSYTH.

[TRANSLATION.]

Mexican legation, New Orleans, April 7, 1838.

SIR: By the note which I had the honor to address to your department on the 23d of December, 1837, I communicated to you information of the law passed by the general congress of Mexico, on the 20th of May of the same year, fully authorizing the executive to propose the arbitration mentioned in the first article.

His excellency the president, being convinced that this is the most effectual means of terminating at once the evils to which Mexico and the United States are now subjected, and of re-establishing upon solid bases, the relations of friendship and good neighborhood between the two countries, has ordered me to propose it.

Therefore, in virtue of such order, and feeling certain that the United States are animated by the same sentiments with Mexico, I have the honorable satisfaction to address you, and to assure you that my government will with pleasure, and with the utmost good faith, submit to the decision of the power which may be chosen by common accord. It is always disposed to a definitive and formal settlement, by means of which new difficulties between the two nations may be avoided, and the differences which have disturbed their harmony may be eradicated.

If the government of the United States should agree to adopt this arbitration, and should think proper to give assurances that it will continue to take effective measures for the preservation of the most strict neutrality during the Texan war, as well as for preventing, by all possible means, the supply of such aid as may be projected in these states; in such case, I will have the honor, agreeably to my instructions, to name to you, sir, the power to the judgment of which Mexico is ready to submit the decision of the differences now unfortunately subsisting.

There can be no doubt that the president will admit without hesitation, the philanthropic means now proposed for restoring the relations between two nations which should be on friendly terms; or that he will refuse to give the guarantee to which my government is justly entitled, of rigorous neutrality with regard to Texas. But, as I have express orders to demand a prompt and categorical answer upon both points, you will permit me, sir, to request, earnestly, that you will immediately submit this note to the president, and that you will entreat him to be so kind as to let me know the result as speedily as possible.

I avail myself of this opportunity to have the honor to repeat to you, sir, the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

FRANCISCO PIZARRO MARTINEZ.

To the hon. JOHN FORSYTH,
Secretary of state of the United States.

MR. FORSYTH TO MR. MARTINEZ.

Department of state, Washington, April 21, 1838.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive, and have laid before the president, your note of the 7th instant, proposing a reference to a third power of the reclamations of the government of the United States on the Mexican republic. I am directed to acquaint you, in reply, that whatever may be the anxiety of this government, to obtain satisfaction for wrongs inflicted upon its citizens, it appreciates too highly those principles of philanthropy to which you allude, to be desirous of proceeding to extremities when they can be honorably avoided, and without doing injustice to those whose interests it is bound to protect.

Your proposition, which you state is based on the first article of the law of the Mexican congress of the 20th of May, a copy of which was communicated with your note to this department of the 23d of December last, which is in these words: "Se autoriza al Gobierno para que pueda transigir en la reclamaciones que haya hecho, o hiciere el de los Estados Unidos del Norte, y para que en aquellas en que no puedan convenirse, sugite la decision al juicio de una potencia amiga, conveniendole en esto los mismos Estados Unidos," is consequently accepted, and I will be ready to enter with you into the negotiation of a convention upon the basis of that article, for the purpose of arranging the particulars of the arbitration, whenever you shall present yourself clothed with competent powers.

The posture of the relations between the two countries makes it proper that this should be done immediately, as the president will not feel himself authorized to recommend any suspension of the action of congress, to whom this whole subject has been referred, before a convention of arbitration has been concluded between the two governments.

The president has seen, with surprise, that in the absence of any new inducements to change the cardinal policy of this government, assurances appear to be expected of continued neutrality by the United States, in the war between Mexico and Texas. He directs me to refer your government for the security it desires in this respect to those principles of rigid impartiality between foreign powers at war which the United States have always avowed, and which the executive has endeavored to enforce by all the power which the laws confer for that purpose.

I embrace this opportunity to offer to you renewed assurances of my great consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

SEÑOR DON FRANCISCO PIZARRO MARTINEZ, &c.

MINORITY REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. Sergeant, from the committee of ways and means, submitted the following report, as the views of the minority of that committee upon the subjects to which it relates.

REPORT.

The minority of the committee of ways and means, dissenting from the report of that committee upon "various memorials relating to the currency and a national bank, and the report of the secretary of the treasury on the finances, recommending further provisions for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public money," submit the following report:

The measure proposed by the committee, in accordance with the views of the executive, contemplates a radical change in the system heretofore in use for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the money raised from the people. Its alleged necessity is founded entirely upon the suspension of specie payments by the banks in May last. Its end and object are, professedly, to separate the government from the banks; but, really and substantially, to separate the government from the people; so that the disorder and embarrassment in the currency, which are so disastrously felt in all the branches of industry and business, may be removed from the treasury and the officers of the government, leaving them to operate, without check or relief, and even increasing the intensity of their mischievous operations upon the community; and to provide for a like exemption of the treasury in all the future from any the least liability to the influence of similar contingencies, however severely they may press upon our fellow-citizens.

The ground upon which this unequal and startling proposal is rested by the president in his message to congress at the opening of the special session, is, that the government has nothing to do with the currency and exchanges. Interpreted by the measures, he then recommended, and still persists in recommending, this exclusion of the obligation of duty must be taken with an important limitation.—The government, we are obliged to understand, has nothing to do with currency and exchanges for the people. It is only to provide for itself, and, of course, to provide the best. The people are to provide for themselves, and to get what they can, without any aid from the government. They are to have an inferior currency, and to manage their exchanges as they now do, or worse; with the possible chance, when this new scheme shall have attained maturity, of being able to buy a part from the government.

Before entering further into the examination of this new, and, we must say, extraordinary and portentous scheme, a consideration forces itself irresistibly upon our attention, deeply connected with the most vital principles of our government, and inseparable from a just regard for the welfare of the union. Is it, we are impelled to inquire, consistent with the purposes for which our government is established—is it reconcilable with the terms and spirit of the constitution, to suffer a great link to be thus broken, which connects the interests of the government with those of the people—to destroy the sympathy which, by its means, is established between them, so that a shock to the one is promptly and sensibly felt by the other, and the instinct of selfishness is brought in aid of the suggestions of duty, to quicken them into action? Is it expedient to establish such an "independent treasury," or whatever else it may be denominated, as will make the government independent of the people, and disinclined to aid them in those matters in which its aid is essential and indispensable? If we look into the constitution, we there find a duty enjoined, (for a grant of power is an injunction of duty,) to regulate commerce; and every one acquainted with the history of that instrument knows that the want of such a power was among the chief inducements for assembling the convention which framed it. No man of sound mind can suppose that commerce can be carried on without currency and exchanges, nor that commerce "between the states" can be well regulated by a government which takes no care of currency or exchanges; and deems itself absolved from all obligation to aid in establishing and maintaining them. If we regard the practice under that constitution; if we will receive instruction from the concurrent conduct and opinions of all the statesmen of the United States, from the time of its adoption to the commencement of the last session of congress; if we are willing to be taught by the acts, the thoughts and opinions of fifty years, and abide by the construction they have established, we shall be compelled to reject, as a manifest political heresy, and doctrine which teaches that indifference to these great interests is allowable in the government of the United States, and, still more, any doctrine which inculcates disregard to them as a duty. No! From the establishment of the constitution to the present day, the sympathy between the people and the government has always been regarded and maintained; and the duty it inculcates, and at the same time invigorates, of supporting, by all the means within the limits of the constitution, the medium of circulation, so as to foster commerce and industry, has been acknowledged and obeyed as one of the first, if not the very first and plainest requirement of an American statesman. When the currency became deranged during the war with England, no one doubted that it was the part of the government of the union to provide a remedy. President Madison, whose thorough acquaintance with the constitution, and whose implicit obedience to its dictates, must be conceded by every one who knows any thing of the character of that eminent citizen, of the power he exerted in bringing about the convention, the large share he had in its proceedings, and the distinguished stations he afterwards held—President Madison felt so deeply the reality and importance of this duty, that he yielded to it a scruple he had long entertained about the power of congress, and gave the sanction of his high authority to the establishment of a national bank. The late Bank of the United States was recommended, by the then secretary of the treasury, (Mr. Dallas,) as the remedy for a deranged currency; the bill for its establishment was reported by a committee on the currency; and the chief argument in its behalf was, that it would regulate the currency accomplished this purpose, it would also be beneficial to the government, was, in those days, believed and accepted as a self-evident consequence, too grateful to be contemned for its simplicity, or to be rejected, because it did not require a dangerous refinement of argument to solicit its adoption. Common sense perceived, at once, that a method of proceeding in which the great interests of the people were first consulted, could not be otherwise than practically conformable to the injunctions of a constitution which bars in its front the declaration that it is established by the people of the United States "in order to form a more perfect union and promote the general welfare;" words which plainly import that all the powers therein conferred were for the benefit of the people, and not for the ease, convenience, or benefit of the government. In a more recent, and, perhaps, it may be termed a more memorable instance, the same object, of improving the currency and the exchanges, was made the ground of action by the government. The removal of the deposits, and the overthrow of the Bank of the United States, were to give us a better currency. The connexion with state banks was justified by the assurance that it would be efficacious to this intent. It is not necessary here to inquire how far this purpose has been achieved. The object now is simply to note the fact, that, throughout the whole period from the removal of the deposits to the close of the year 1836, the currency and the exchanges were uniformly held forth as legitimate objects of the care, concern, and action of the government. In the eventful act of the specie circular, the duty and power of the government guardianship over the affairs of individuals were carried much further, and, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, to a most unwarrantable length, as it professed to be intended to check speculation. Of the same nature, and founded upon the same concession, were the efforts of the executive government to encourage, and even to force, the importation of specie, beyond the natural demands of trade. However mistaken these measures may have been, and whatever untoward effects they may have produced, they still carry with them the acknowledgment of a constitutional duty to care for the currency and exchanges, as well for the people as for the government—or, rather, as it ought to be said, for the people first, and then for the government.

By a singular concurrence, it thus happens that the Bank of the United States has been twice made the witness of the settled construction of the constitution. Its establishment, and its overthrow have both been accompanied by the same assertion of duty and of power, in the particular now under consideration. To be sure, there is a striking distinction between the circumstances of the two periods of assertion. In the first, there was admitted disorder in the currency and exchanges, calling for a remedy. A remedy was accordingly applied, to relieve from palpable and dangerous disease, according to its indications. In the last, the currency and exchanges were in health. Being so, they could not indicate a remedy. Any application, therefore, could only be an experiment; and that, not in corpore vili, but upon the whole circulation, trade, industry, and interests of the country. Up to the end of the year 1836, it was alleged that the experiment had succeeded. No one thinks so now.—The proofs to the contrary are unfortunately too numerous and authentic. They are everywhere present; not requiring to be sought after, but obtruding themselves upon us. If it were possible to get back to the position of 1833, effacing all that has since occurred, and restoring all that has been lost, it is believed that one great acclamation would instantly break forth. "As you were," would be its simple but emphatic import.

Upon this new principle, thus for the first time propounded, the new system, by whatever name it may be called, is manifestly founded. Its aim and end are to give to this principle an active existence and a living power in the affairs of our country. If the principle itself be false and destructive, then it must follow that the system which is to give to it organic and enduring life, a capacity for action, and overbearing power, so that it may work by itself, and for itself, is also objectionable in the same degree, and ought to be condemned. Those, for example, who are of opinion that a separation of the government from the people in the concerns of business and money, so that the government may have a currency of gold and silver, and the people only a depreciated paper—that is, one currency for the government, and another and an inferior one for the people—is repugnant to the genius of our institutions, and will be mischievous in its operation upon the public interests, must of course be opposed to every system, to all legislation, and to all machinery provided by legislation, which has in view to create and maintain such a separation. Thus simplified, the question is easily understood, in the aspect in which it is now presented. Is this portentous novelty worthy to be embodied in the forms and clothed with the powers of law, or is it not? That is the first question. A great question it certainly is; one which ought to be long and deeply pondered by the people before they consent to surrender to the government the control of their interests and welfare, to such an extent as the concession demanded would imply.

This, then, constitutes the first objection to the new scheme proposed. It is to introduce a false and dangerous, and, as the minority of the committee think, very odious principle. They do not mean, at present, to discuss the nature of that principle. Still less do they intend to examine the character of the machinery to be employed, or how it will work upon the interests and welfare of the people. These may be considered hereafter. Their object, now, is to say that all the machinery is avowedly designed to work to one end; and that end is, to give life and energy to a principle which they deem to be false and destructive. Whether it be called a sub-treasury, as it heretofore has been, or be designated by the more significant appellation of an independent treasury, as it now is; whether its authors set it forth with a title importing only a new train of dependents upon the existing treasury, or more boldly and truly proclaim it as an original and independent creation; there can be no doubt that independence is its most striking and cherished attribute in the estimation of those with whom it has originated: independence of the people, and, if we mistake not its nature, independence by elevation above them.—This, it is confidently believed, is an insuperable objection, and, as such, the minority submit it.

Another, and, in the opinion of the committee, most decisive objection to the measure, at the present time, is, that the people of the United States, who are deeply interested in its fate, have not had an opportunity allowed them to act upon it. If the argument of the president in his message at the beginning of this session of congress be correct, they have not even been allowed an opportunity effectually to deliberate or to express an opinion. In his judgment, as there expressed, it would seem that the will of the people cannot be so pronounced as to be entitled to respectful attention, unless it be by "an election held for the federal government." He proceeds to say that but one such election has been held; and, to weaken or to destroy the force of the conclusion universally believed to be deducible from its issue, he adds, that "the early day at which it [the election] took place, deprived the measure under consideration of much of the support it might otherwise have derived from the result." Local elections, he intimates, may have been influenced mainly by local interest, to use his own language, "far deeper and more immediate than the fiscal plans of the national treasury." In particular, he suggests that their interests in banks "may have exercised a far greater influence over the result," than a question in the administration of the general government; "more remote and far less important in its bearing upon that interest."

In this summary it will be seen, is comprehended every authentic mode of expressing the opinions or will of the people, by organic, constitutional means; and each and every of them is evidently, not to say studiously, disparaged, in a manner calculated, if not intended, to destroy its claim to attention or respect. The minority of the committee by no means concur in the view thus taken by the president of the demonstrations of the public opinion and the public will. To the common apprehension, they have been plain and significant, beyond doubt or question, and every where received as such. The same understanding still continues, and there is a daily accumulation of evidence to prove that it is correct.

The minority of the committee might have doubted the propriety of entering into this inquiry, and still more of proceeding further in it, but for the example offered by the president in his message. Fortified by that authority, and instructed by him, from the careful attention he has bestowed upon this point, and the space he has allowed to it in such a paper, that, in his opinion, these demonstrations are of great value, if their force be not counteracted by the objections he has made to them, we deem it right to dwell a moment longer on the subject. We hold it to be certain that, in forming their opinions and expressing their will, the people had a due regard to their interests. We hold it to be equally certain that this was a lawful and constitutional regard, which cannot justly expose them or their decisions to reproach or disparagement, nor lessen their claim to respect. We are satisfied, also, and we have never heard it doubted, that at the time of the elections alluded to, they felt and believed that their interests had already been injuriously affected by the acts of the general government; and that this specific project of a sub-treasury, then recently for the first time propounded, if carried into an act, would work their ruin. Their attention was, therefore, closely drawn to this deeply interesting plan, with unusual anxiety. The elections turned upon it. Every other question was absorbed by it. Whole states, including the greatest state in the Union, were almost simultaneously revolutionized, (no other term will express the meaning,) with a rapidity, and to an extent, and with a harmony of purpose, which disclosed, beyond a doubt, the agency of a great and general cause, far surpassing in power, and actually overcoming, all local causes, and even breaking down the habitual combinations of party. A common feeling of danger from this very measure; a determined opposition to it, as threatening destruction to their interests and rights, and tending unduly to aggrandize the executive, by the union in his hands of the purse and the sword; a clear and deep objection to the theory of a currency of gold and silver for the government, and of depreciated paper for the people; a sure foreboding that a government bank, administered by the government officers, would ultimately grow out of this scheme, however it might now be hid under the humble drapery of a few sub-treasuries, with safes and vaults; a conviction that the system of credits, under which they had prospered, was aimed at—these, with a sense of insecurity, and other like feelings and convictions, raised that spirit which pervaded whole states, and sent their free citizens, in irresistible masses, to the first ballot-boxes that were open to them, there to make known their will. If they could then have elected representatives in congress, no one can doubt how this house would now have been constituted on the question of a sub-treasury.

In point of fact it is certainly true, as stated by the president, that "for one state only has an election been held for the federal government." The demonstration in that state was coincident and concurrent with that of the states before referred to. Supposing, as seems to be admitted, that such an election is a correct exposition of the views of the state as to federal acts, and is the unquestionable result of a general cause, then it must be obvious that such coincidence and concurrence become a new and powerful proof of the interpretation of the elections in the other states. How far the force of that election is weakened, if at all, by the suggestion, that "the early day at which it took place deprived the measure under consideration of much of the support it might otherwise have derived from the result"—meaning, it is supposed, that if the people had thought longer they would have voted differently—it is not, perhaps, easy to say. On one side there is a fact, and on the other an hypothesis. If the latter can outweigh the former, then there can, in no case, be a certain conclusion; for, in every case, ingenuity may devise an hypothesis to raise a doubt. The election in question was more than two months after the sub-treasury message to congress at its special session. Whether the judgment of the people of that state is so matured as to be worthy of reliance at the end of such a period, or how much longer they require to attain a maturity to be relied upon, are questions which, for obvious reasons, it is not desirable to discuss, and which, therefore, are passed over. Their will requires no time to ripen; it is mature, and exacts obedience whenever it is lawfully expressed.

But were it admitted that all that is said in the message is correct, still the fact remains, and would be even strengthened by the admission, that the people of the United States have not been allowed an opportunity to act upon this question. By action, is meant election to congress; an election which will give them an opportunity, constitutionally and effectually, to express their will, and to have that will obeyed. As yet, they have had no such opportunity; and if this act be passed, they may not have one. Let us see if this allegation be not true to the letter.

The measure in question was first propounded in the message already referred to, in the month of September last. Before that time, it may be admitted that, among the projects which were afloat in an atmosphere disturbed and darkened by severe distress, something of the sort was dimly discerned.—But it was not heeded; it passed as the scheme of some visionary, not entitled to notice. In so regarding it, there may have been error; possibly, its value ought to have been more highly appreciated, and the dignity of its source better understood. Still the fact undoubtedly is, that, until its announcement by the president, the public mind was never seriously turned to it; and from that time to this, the people, except in a single state, have had no elections "for the federal government." If it be true, as seems to be indistinctly intimated, that it is only through such elections the opinions of the people can be so conveyed as to be entitled to respect, (which is by no means admitted,) then it will follow that they have not since had the power even to express their opinions.

If this were a matter in which the people had no very obvious and direct interest, so that its decision one way or the other would not be perceptibly felt by them, such a course of proceeding would be like that which is followed in the ordinary measures of government. But such are not the characteristics of this measure. The alarm it has caused, the anxiety it has produced, the loud and determined opposition it has encountered—among classes, too, who do not generally take part in political contests; the earthquake force with which it has shivered party alliances, setting free individual opinion and feeling, and making them paramount to every other consideration; all these are proofs that the people feel, believe, and know, that their interests are deeply involved. And surely they are not wrong. Surely it must be conceded that such a change in the currency and circulation (to say nothing of its other evils) must come home to every individual, as if the air they breathed were withheld or were loaded with pestilence, or the waters were dried up or poisoned. Starvation is the poor man's lot, if he cannot be employed and paid. Employed and paid he cannot be, if trade and industry be palsied or paralyzed; and so they will be (as unhappily, we too well know from experience) if the circulation be withdrawn, or forced into unnatural distribution, or driven into cavities where it contributes nothing to general health and vigor. A rapid increase is eventually dangerous. A rapid diminution works at once violently and destructively. Property and produce fall, money rises, debtors are ruined, enterprise is checked, business and industry are prostrated, and labor is without employment. Capitalists, and those who have fixed salaries, are the only gainers—the latter especially. If money be doubled in value, their income is doubled. But, to effect this, taxes also are doubled; the same amount expressing twice the value. The creditor receives two-fold; but the debtor pays two-fold. An estate that was mortgaged for half its worth, will not pay the mortgage. Stocks, accumulated from the produce of labor, will not pay the cost of production. Where, then, the circulation is confessedly redundant, no one can deny that it is worthy of the care and concern of a wise government, and, above all, of a republican government, to aid in guarding against the violence of reduction, and the extensive derangement, ruin, and misery, it would occasion. This can be done by a cordial co-operation between the government and the business of the country; and it cannot otherwise be done. The government has an interest in the circulation, by reason of the large revenue it now collects and disburses. The people have an interest in it, by reason of its connexion with their business. These interests are common, and they ought to be one. They are still more intimately and kindly connected. The government has an interest in the circulation of the people; because it is essential to the general welfare, which is an interest of patriotism; and because it is necessary to enable them to pay their dues, which is a treasury interest. The government has a power over the circulation, by the large amount which comes under its control. What it rejects, must be depreciated. What it receives, is thereby increased in value. Its own inconvertible paper, even its dishonored paper, (protested treasury drafts,) is maintained by this single circumstance. The people, individually or in the aggregate, have no such power. Hence the necessity of co-operation, sincere and cordial co-operation, on the part of the government, for the sake of the people as well as for the sake of the government. There must be a common circulation, in sufficient abundance for both, or things will not go well with either. As long as the door of the treasury is the limit between two distinct currencies, there will inevitably be disorder and embarrassment.

In this community of interest, it must be evident that the people, though they have the least power, have by far the largest stake. Their business, and the circulation it requires, in the aggregate, are infinitely beyond those of the treasury. But this is not all. The government itself is theirs, and the treasury is theirs. Both are established for their benefit, and support by their contributions, from the products of their property and their industry. Such being the incontrovertible construction of the constitution, it would be very strange, indeed, if the interests and welfare of the people, the encouragement and support of their lawful pursuits, could, by any perversion whatever, be deemed subordinate or secondary. How much more inadmissible is it to suggest that they are to be quite disregarded, and that the government and the treasury are only to take care of themselves! Such a proposal would at any time be unconstitutional and unsocial. What, then, is to be thought of it, when it is still further aggravated by the fact, that the proposition thus to dissolve the fellowship of long standing between the people and the government, in the concern of circulation and currency, is made when calamity and distress are every where among the people, inviting sympathy and calling for exertion, on the part of the government, to administer relief? What is this, but to say that it was only a sunshine connexion? When the storm comes, there is a shelter for the government, but the people must abide its peltings. Such a proposition, at such a time, is susceptible of but one further aggravation; and that is not wanting. It is brought forward and urged to a decision, before the people can act upon it by their elections. As they have so deep an interest in the question, a due respect for their rights demands that a decision should not be precipitated till their opinions can be authoritatively expressed, so as to enforce obedience.

Perhaps it may be urged, in reply to this course of remarks, that if the people are dissatisfied with the measure, they can hereafter rid themselves of it. In an ordinary case, such a reply would not, perhaps, be without some weight. But the minority of the committee are of opinion that the measure in question is of no ordinary description. They have already referred to its probable (as they think, certain) effects upon the interests and concerns of the people, as giving to it an extraordinary character. They might insist, also upon the change it is destined to effect in the relation between the people and their government, by aggrandizing the latter, and clothing it with new power and patronage, at the expense and to the detriment of the former, as entitling it to the same distinction. Whatever, indeed, they have hitherto submitted, or may hereafter submit, will be found to concur to the same end; that is, to establish that what is now termed "an independent treasury" ought not to be set up in the land, until the people's assent is first fairly obtained.—Desirous as they are to avoid recurring to topics which may seem in any degree, to revive the irritation of past conflicts, they are, nevertheless, obliged, in justice to the subject, to say, that all the measures of the executive government for the last four or five years, touching the currency and circulation, have been in advance of the people, or contrary to their opinions and wishes. More distinctly—they hope inoffensively—they would be understood to mean that, if the people had been previously consulted, they would have been (and where they were consulted, they actually were) opposed to those measures. Both houses of congress passed a law to re-charter the Bank of the United States. The president vetoed it. Here, the executive annulled the act of the people's representatives. The deposits were removed. This was the act of the executive alone. A connexion was formed with state banks, and the public treasure confided to them, under the sole authority of the executive. A new function was next assumed by the treasury, of directing the management of the banks; telling them when they were to grant facilities, and when they were to strengthen themselves with gold and silver; both of which have proved disastrous to the banks and to the country. Then came the specie circular, professing to have for its object to check speculation in public lands, since confessed to have been inadequate to its purpose; but, unhappily, too sufficient in producing public mischiefs, which were not intended. A bill passed both houses which repealed the circular. That bill was not returned by the president, and the circular still remains in force. Along with these measures came an increase of state banks, an increase of loans, an increase of circulation, and a general expansion of their business. And after them, came the general disorder in our commerce and currency; and, finally, the suspension of specie payments by the banks in May, 1837 which still continues. Whether these acts of the government did or did not produce, or aid in producing, the catastrophe, (and the minority of the committee firmly believe they did,) has been matter of controversy. It is quite certain that, during the whole period, the executive power of the government was actively, and in a most unusual manner, bearing upon, disturbing, and agitating the business and circulation of the country, with a view to produce some results: it was not meant to be inoperative.—Such a power, applied with great energy to a subject so sensitive and delicate as credit and currency, could not be unproductive. If it did not work to the end intended, it would be sure to work to some other end. It might fail to accomplish what was desired, but it could not fail to leave traces where it had passed. What, then, are the monuments of its existence, if they be not the wreck and ruin we have witnessed? Where is the work, if this be not?

It is quite certain, too, that every step in the proceeding, the consequences were predicted exactly as they have occurred. These predictions were unheeded; but now they serve to lead those who have seen the issue, to the causes which have produced it, and to confirm the conclusion drawn from the retrospect. Looking forward, and looking back, it is the same line of events; and the judgment upon them, from both points of view, is the same.

But let it be taken for debateable whether these have been the results, in part or in whole, of the measures of the government: no one, it is believed, has ever been extravagant enough to assert that, as far as concerns currency and circulation, and a wholesome state of business, those measures have done any good. They have not checked, nor had any tendency to check, the growth of disorder, nor to retard the approach of disaster and distress. The utmost efforts to defend them has not gone beyond the denial that they had caused the disorder and distress. A very large portion of our fellow-citizens sincerely believe that they have been the sole cause, a much larger portion are convinced that they have contributed to these effects. All would be satisfied, and a vast number of our fellow-citizens most ardently desire that no more such experiments should be made.

In this state of things, the plan of an independent treasury is propounded, and pressed to a decision before the people can have an opportunity to act upon it. Is it substantially true, that it is equally in their power after its adoption as before? Let the experience of the past years answer. When a measure has been once adopted, the question of overthrowing it is a very different one from that of its adoption. In the latter case, it is a simple question of the merits of the plan; in the former, it is complicated, connecting itself with many considerations entirely alien, but in their nature powerful to counteract the free course of opinion. There are many obvious reasons for not being more particular; nor is it needful, for they will be readily perceived by every one who has attended to the working of party, or witnessed what has occurred within the last five or six years. Avoiding such topics, however, there is one consideration of a general nature, and, therefore, free from the objections just alluded to, upon which it seems proper to make a remark. When a measure has been adopted, and is found to work badly, one would suppose that it would be laid aside and abandoned. But, no; its want of efficiency is ascribed, not to its own inherent weakness or error, as it ought to be, but to something else which has disturbed its action. Instead of being abandoned, it only gives rise to some new project, equally promising, and equally destined to fail. Thus the past, from which wisdom would seek instruction, is never considered. The present and the immediate future are made to occupy and to agitate the mind, without repose or rest for thought. And so, no doubt, or even worse, would it be with this independent treasury, if unhappily, it should ever become a law. Should it fail to answer a good purpose, (as it assuredly would) it would be said that its basis was too narrow; and then would follow a scheme for enlarging its machinery and increasing its magnificence and expense—more officers, more offices, more safes and vaults, more salaries. Should it be found that the gold and silver imprisoned in these vaults, or supposed to be so, did not supply a currency, the remedy would be an issue, or rather an increase of the issue, of inconvertible government paper. Should exchange be deficient, exchange operations, on a greater scale than was required for the transactions of government, would be the ready contrivance to supply the deficiency. Should the hoards accumulate in the accounts, (for the reality of accumulation would be past finding out) or should there be reason to apprehend that, like the pension agents, the sub-independent treasurers were making profits for themselves and their friends out of the public money, it would be quite natural to say that it would be better to lend the money out at interest, or to buy stock, (as has already been proposed by the secretary of the treasury) or either, as might be most profitable. Thus, the humble chrysalis, an independent treasury, this golden grub of the earth, would pass into a mighty government bank, and even something more; it would be a money-dealer and a stock-jobber, in addition, far beyond what it has ever been deemed wise to permit any bank to be; and so it would continue, expanding and glittering, until some such pressure as the vicissitudes of the world occasionally bring forth, should bury it under heaps of its own irredeemable paper.

In every stage of this progress, speculation and delinquency would be the concomitants of the system, as surely, and to a much greater degree, than they have been in the little sub-independent treasuries of the post office, which afford the only example (a faint and feeble one, indeed) of the operation of the plan.

Besides all that has already been urged upon this point, it must be perceived that the independent treasury, if established, has a dangerous capacity to strengthen itself, and thus to weaken and overcome resistance—not to conciliate public opinion by a manifestation of its usefulness, which would be innocent; but to establish an independent power, formidable from the first by its organization and means, and tending, unavoidably, to become daily more powerful. That power would be wielded entirely by the executive, without control, and subservient to his views. The mere patronage would be dangerous, and even appalling; for no one can tell to what extent it will finally be carried. But the spirit of such a corps, and the weapons placed in its hands, are far more to be dreaded. It will be able both to seduce and to intimidate, by its command over the money of the public; to corrupt and to overawe, and thus to fortify itself in its position, so as to defy all resistance. What prospect will there be of overthrowing it, when once thus established? Its spirit may be discerned already. A newly appointed collector of the port of Philadelphia, who has been in office at Washington for several years, within a fortnight after his appointment, is the first signer of a call for a meeting in favor of the independent treasury. The custom-house officers must obey his summons. Other officers of the government, dependent upon the executive, will do the same thing, from official sympathy, or because it is a service they cannot refuse. The voice of such a meeting will, of course, be in harmony with the voice of the executive. How can it be otherwise, when they are dependent upon his pleasure? Thus will something be manufactured, to be called "public opinion," and sent here to support the executive. If such be the influence now, in the prospect only of official power and independence, what will it be when they shall be realized and consolidated by a connection extending throughout the whole United States? If the problem were to make an independent executive—that is, an executive independent of the people and of congress—we do not see how it could be better solved than by the method proposed.

But, besides all this, does it not require the same concurrence to repeal a law as to enact one? May not the senate, or the house of representatives, or the president, prevent its repeal; whereas all must unite to effect its passage? The passage of the law, therefore, would make a most serious change. The representatives sent here by the people to undo what had been done, would be unable to execute their will. The senate could defeat their purpose, or the president alone could veto it.

These, and many other considerations, seem to the minority of the committee to constitute decisive objections to present action upon a matter of such great moment. They do not perceive how it can be just or right, by a sudden movement, to place the executive in a position of advantage over the people, and by the same act to enfeeble, if not entirely to take away their power to dislodge him.

A further objection to this plan, partly embraced in what has already been said, is, that it proposes nothing for the relief of the people. But this is by no means the whole of its obnoxious character. It goes much further; for it proposes measures which will unavoidably increase their embarrassments, and make them perpetual. Assuming, for the present, that the suspension of specie payments, assumed by the president, the secretary of the treasury, and the majority of the committee, is the great evil in our affairs, then the resumption of specie payments is the point to be attained to bring back order. No one will question that this is desirable, nay, indispensable.

The whole circulation of the United States, as well for the business of individuals as for the concerns of the treasury, consisted, at the time of the suspension, of state bank paper. There was no other medium; that was the only money in use. The small amount of coin employed for change, scarcely deserved to be considered. In the larger concerns of trade, gold and silver, while they formed the standard of value, were no further required in circulation than to liquidate balances. Being costly and inconvenient, the employment of them, even for this limited end, was reduced as low as possible, not by any concert or contrivance, or deliberate design, but by the very nature of the thing, always tending to simplicity and economy in the operations of commerce. The use of gold and silver, it must be remembered, is not for the liquidation only of domestic balances, it performs the same ultimate function in settling balances between different nations, so as to enter into the general circulation.

Up to the month of May last, the United States were able to pay their foreign balances. The banks in the United States were able to pay their balances. Thus, bank paper maintained an equality with gold and silver at home; and the circulation, consisting of bank paper, maintained itself, in comparison with the circulation of other countries, at the same level as if the currency had been entirely of gold and silver.

The circulation, it may be further remarked is also aided by credits in various forms, (not being a currency, properly so called, but performing some of its functions, and by exchanges) which superseded the necessity of actually transmitting bank paper or coin from place to place. These credits and exchanges rest upon the same ultimate basis, namely, the ability to liquidate balances.

The whole of this machinery, it will be seen, is contrived and employed to circulate exchangeable commodities, the product of the soil and industry, which constitute the real wealth of the nation, as they do of individuals. It is true, also, that, upon this foundation of exchangeable values, the whole of it rests for support. Our wealth, in trade with a foreign nation is made up of what we have to sell, and they desire to buy, and are able to pay for. If the whole exports of the United States were of cotton, and its price a fixed one, the quantity we had to sell, at any given time, would determine the amount we were able to buy; and if we exceeded that limit, we must contract a debt for the excess. But as the quantity and the price are both liable to fluctuations, calculations made upon them may fail, and anticipation of their sales by borrowing (one of the allowable modes of credit) may cause embarrassment and loss. Credit, however, if continued under these circumstances, in confidence of final security, will mitigate or finally prevent the mischief. It is when, in this state of things, credit, from any cause, suddenly gives way, or when, by giving way, it produces this state of things, that the whole extremity of disaster is brought about, and for a time is uncontrollable. Its first importunate demand is for gold and silver, in a tone unusually peremptory, and in extraordinary quantities. These metals fly readily to the invitations of trade; they flow gently when they are left free to obey their own law; but they shrink from the hand of force, and hide themselves from its enactments. Such a demand, therefore, when it is sufficient to weaken confidence, causes gold and silver to disappear, and, from the fear of a vacuum which they abhor, they absolutely make a vacuum.

That the suspension of specie payments by the banks was owing to some such cause, no one can question. Indeed, it is susceptible of proof, as a matter of fact. When the drain came upon the banks, which obliged them to stop the issue of specie, according to the repeated statements of the secretary of the treasury, gold and silver was more abundant in the United States than at any former period. They had been continually increasing for several years, under the influence of a policy designed to encourage their importation, which, it was boasted, had fulfilled its purpose. The same high authority assured us that the banks were not imprudent; they had observed a due proportion between their specie and their liabilities—rather better, indeed, than before, and judging from former experience, sufficient to enable them to discharge their balances; they had extended themselves, but only according to the extension of the specie basis.

Avoiding a recurrence to the primary causes of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, and omitting for the present to refer to the action of the government, it seems to the minority of the committee to be very easy to discern the immediate agency which disturbed and disordered our circulation. While the United States were receiving specie, England was parting with it. Finally, the Bank of England discovered that her stock of gold was rapidly being diminished to an alarming extent, and, for her own protection from a continuance of the drain, sought to discover, and of course, to stop, the channel through which it was made. It was found to have been opened by means of credits of the United States upon England, ordered to be remitted in gold. The fact, as stated by the secretary of the treasury, is, that the stock of gold in the United States had, within a short time, been increased fifteen millions of dollars—the greater part of it, beyond a doubt, coming from England, and much of it (how much cannot probably be ascertained) borrowed; that is, obtained by means of credits. The Bank of England, to stop this drain, frowned upon and discredited the bills drawn in the United States upon credits. They could no longer be discounted. Hence, the revulsion; the failure of some of the American houses (as they were termed) in England, and the excessive pressure upon all of them; the dishonor and return of bills, with all their consequences; and the sudden demand for a large balance, not expected to be called for. Exchange rose, specie became a better remittance, and specie began to rush out.

At the same time our great staple fell in England. The secretary of the treasury computes the loss to the United States upon the half of the crop then undisposed of at no less a sum than twenty millions of dollars. He computes the commercial debt from the United States at thirty millions of dollars. If these estimates be correct, then the cotton, had it not fallen, would have paid two-thirds of the debt; and the balance, reduced to ten millions of dollars, would not have been sufficient to cause any very serious embarrassment. It further appears from the statements of the secretary of the treasury (especially from his report in December, 1836,) that while we were getting in debt to England, we were importing specie, and that the amount added to our stock of gold and silver was more than the amount of the debt just mentioned. It follows, that the gold and silver must be considered, to that amount, as having been bought upon credit and not paid for. Coming into the banks, nevertheless, with nothing upon them to show this infirmity, it would be dealt with as any other money in its vaults, and deemed to justify an expansion of credit.

Such is a brief, but, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, an accurate sketch of the times immediately preceding the suspension, in which are to be sought its causes. They do not concur with the secretary of the treasury in the suggestion that the over-production of cotton was among them. It could not have operated so suddenly and violently. But there is now evidence to the contrary; the production has gone on increasing since, and the demand in England has kept pace with the increase. There is no reason to fear that a scarcity of this great staple will become desirable.

But, whatever may have been the cause of the suspension, the fact unquestionably is, that as before we had a circulation of bank paper, with only coin for change and for the liquidation of balances, so after the suspension we had nothing but bank paper. If the whole of the bank paper had been withdrawn or discredited, there would have been no circulation at all. If it were now to be withdrawn or discredited, there would be no circulation. But the people of the United States were not so blind as to reduce themselves to this condition. They believed that these institutions, though unable to pay specie, or unwilling to adopt harsh and ruinous measures towards their debtors, to the injury of the community, were solvent and secure. With the few exceptions of some banks too much pampered by the government, they have justified the public confidence. The people of the United States, therefore, did not discredit the banks. At the same time, they desire the resumption of specie payments as soon as it may be reasonably practicable. It is a just desire. Their permanent interests require it. But can this great object be accomplished as soon and as well as it ought to be, without the co-operation of the government? Can it be accomplished in the face of government measures bearing to the contrary? Are not the measures of the government, and, especially, is not this measure, of that description? Let us for a moment examine.

The message of the president of the United States, at the special session in September, presented four principal measures for the consideration of congress. One was, to withhold the fourth instalment of the deposits from the states; another, an issue of government paper denominated treasury notes, to the amount of ten millions of dollars; the third, was the sub-treasury; and the last, was a bankrupt law for the banks.

The aim of the last of these measures was direct enough, and as fatal as direct. If the suspension of specie payments was to be an act of bankruptcy, (and the banks had done no other act to be complained of,) then the whole banks of the United States would have been liable to be brought under the power of commissioners of the United States. The capitals of these banks are between three and four hundred millions of dollars. In some instances, they are owned wholly by states. In many others, the states are large shareholders. The debts and credits of these banks are beyond the amount of their capitals—probably twice as much. Here, then, would be three or four hundred millions of property of the states and their citizens, and double that amount of debts and credits, exposed to be placed in commission to wind up their affairs. When bankruptcy began, banking would instantly cease. There would be no circulation. Banks have their evils; but who can measure the extent of the calamity that such a system of bankruptcy would produce, if fairly carried out? The commissions would only strike the banks, but the bankruptcy would be universal; no one could hope to escape. Such a recommendation, it will be seen, could give no relief to the people, and no aid to the banks. There was nothing in it to help forward the resumption of specie payments, but the contrary. Fortunately, it received no countenance from either house of congress, and has not been renewed.

The act for withholding the fourth instalment from the states, was a measure purely for the relief of the government, and adverse to the states and the banks. In the distressed condition of the country, this money would have been useful to both. Especially, it would have gone into the state banks, and helped them in their struggle, which would have been beneficial to the citizens. Even modified, as it finally was, it gave no relief to the states or the people, but disappointed the hopes of both.

The issue of treasury notes (to say no more of it) swelled the stream of inconvertible paper, and increased the confusion of various paper, of unequal and fluctuating value, already too great. By employing it in the purchase of specie, or even by offering it, the demand for that article was increased, its value raised, and the tendency it might otherwise have had to return to the circulation was counteracted. The operation does not entirely terminate here. Being receivable in dues to the government, and bank paper excluded, it so far tended to depreciate bank paper. There has been a contest between them. Specie has been above both, but they have fluctuated in comparison with each other; bank paper in New York generally having the preference. However necessary this issue of treasury notes may have been for the government, it has given no help towards the resumption of specie payments. Thus, there has been more than a want of co-operation on the part of the government towards this desirable result.

The remaining measure was the sub-treasury bill, now again presented, and the immediate occasion of the present report. This is by far the most important of all; for while the other measures are, in their nature, temporary and occasional, this is intended to be permanent and systematic. Being at the same time new, and without example in our former history, it must necessarily be a departure from all the former usages of our government, and all the former habits of the people. It is, therefore, entitled to the most serious consideration, before it is adopted; and in what they have further to say, the minority of the committee will confine themselves to this great topic, not incidentally only, as offering no relief to the people, but substantially, in its principal features and probable operation. And with this view, they proceed to inquire, in the first place, what is the ostensible aim and purpose of this measure? and, in the next place, what are the means and machinery by which the purpose is to be achieved.

To the first of these questions the answer seems to be, that the ostensible purpose is to establish an independent treasury, where nothing shall be received in payment, but gold and silver.

If such a scheme be at all practicable, (as it never yet has been found to be,) it must work in one or two ways: either the whole currency of the country, for all the purposes of circulation, must be of the same description—that is, of gold and silver, without any other medium; or, there must be one currency for business, and another for the treasury; or, as it is commonly expressed, one currency for the people, and another for the government.

The first, namely, an entirely metallic currency, for all the purposes of circulation, has been over and over again demonstrated to be impossible. In this country it never existed, unless it were during the very short and gloomy period which followed the overthrow of the government paper, remembered by the name of "continental money," which ought forever to make the people distrustful of the government paper. All the provinces before the revolution, and all the states from that time till the adoption of the constitution, had a credit system of some sort or other; most commonly it was state paper, not resting altogether upon the faith of the state, but upon the security of individuals, to whom the credit of the state was loaned. The bills of credit in Pennsylvania, which came into use at an early day, and were issued upon the very ground that the supply of gold and silver was not adequate to the wants of society, were thus loaned out to individuals, who gave mortgages, or other satisfactory security, to the government. These issues were, from time to time, increased. The wisest and best men have borne testimony to the value of these credits, as conducive to the support and encouragement of industry. They have agreed that credit, in some form, was indispensable; and even that this plan, objectionable as it was, and liable to abuses, was better than the restriction to gold and silver. The two principal characteristics of this plan, in Pennsylvania cannot escape attention. The credits were lent to individuals for the purpose of circulation—that is, for the wants of society, and not for the wants of the government, though it is true that they were receivable in the payment of public dues; and they were lent, upon individual security, in such amounts only as individuals could give satisfacfactory security for. In these two points they were identical with bank credits, which are secured (besides the bank capital) upon the property of the borrowers. But the principle just mentioned, which formed some check upon issues, and made them a representative of real value, was not everywhere adopted, nor, where adopted, was it adhered to. Such paper was made a lawful tender. Abuses existed and increased, as always has been, and always will be, the case with government paper; but credit was not on that account abandoned, nor the credit system less prized. Congress, in the year 1781, chartered the Bank of North America, which had been established in the preceding year by a few patriotic citizens: that bank afterwards accepted a charter from the state of Pennsylvania. Three other state banks were established, and in existence, before the constitution of the United States was made. The system of government paper was, therefore, condemned and abandoned; but the credit system was cherished and preserved by means of banks, used both by the government and the people.

Under these circumstances, the states relinquished the power to issue bills of credit. They were prohibited by the constitution from issuing bills of credit, or making any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment; but the United States were not expressly prohibited from doing either. One of these powers (issuing treasury notes) they have twice exercised, and it is now in active exercise, with a certainty of some extension. This session of congress is not to go by without an authority to issue new treasury notes, or to re-issue the old ones, or both; the other (of making their paper a lawful tender) they have never employed. As was strongly remarked by Mr. Dallas, when secretary of the treasury, "the extremity of that day cannot be anticipated," when this expedient will be resorted to. But, while they have abstained from making their paper a tender between individuals, such has not, in substance, been the case in all instances with the public creditor. As he cannot sue the government, he has been obliged to take treasury notes, because he could get nothing better.

In giving up the power to issue bills of credit, no one can believe that the states intended to destroy the credit system, or to leave it without the control or guardianship which might be necessary to prevent it from destroying itself. Having nationalized the concerns of commerce, by giving the whole power over it to congress, and having also conferred upon congress a power to raise a revenue directly from the citizens, including a power to levy contributions upon commerce, both of which are intimately and inseparably connected with currency and circulation, it would have been unnatural and unreasonable to suppose that these were to be left to take care of themselves, without any care or concern on the part of the government. Still more unreasonable and unnatural would it be to hold that this government was at all times bound, or even at liberty, to insist upon a currency exclusively of gold and silver, when such a currency was notoriously insufficient to supply the wants of the people, and when it was notorious, too, that the people must have, and would have, a more abundant circulation than metal could furnish.

The duty of congress, in this respect, is still more strikingly evident from the consideration that it is not within the power of the respective states. They cannot regulate or control the currency beyond their respective limits, nor make it uniform, nor provide for the supply of it in sufficient abundance, without excess. Congress can.

But to pursue the remarks upon the construction of the constitution. As soon as the government was organized, a connection was formed by the treasury with the people, by means of banks, for the mutual convenience of both. The first secretary, in his letter of the 22d September, 1789, directed the collectors to receive payment of duties in notes of the banks of North America and New York. In his circular of the 14th October, 1789, he directs them to exchange whatever specie they had received, or might receive, for notes of the same banks. In his letter of the 20th November, 1789, he directs the collectors in Massachusetts to receive the notes of the Boston bank as well as of the two banks just named. The reason given in this letter for the direction, deserves to be particularly noted. It was to avoid drawing specie out of the state. "It is not," as has been well said, "the inconvenience, and trouble, and hazard of making remittances in the precious metals that constitute its principal difficulty; it is because extracting specie from any city where a bank exists, diminishes the circulating capital of the place to many times the amount extracted." This may not appear to be a fiscal reason, as some would now understand the word. And yet it is a good fiscal reason; for it conduces to the advantage of the treasuary, by promoting the welfare of the people. The tributary is better able to pay his tribute.

In 1791, the first Bank of the United States was established, and continued for twenty years. Its paper was a currency, both for the people and the government. When the charter of that bank expired, state bank paper performed the same office. In 1814 the state banks suspended specie payments; their paper continued to be the currency. In 1816 the late Bank of the United States was established. In 1833-'34, the fiscal agency of that bank was determined by the government, the deposits were removed, and a connection was formed with state banks as agents. In May, 1837, (the charter of the Bank of the United States having expired in March, 1836,) the state banks suspended specie payments. Their paper has since been the only currency of the people, and in part, at least, of the government; for though the government has professed to receive nothing but gold and silver, yet it has certainly made payments (to what extent cannot be known) in bank credits, and bank paper, as well as in treasury notes, and protested treasury drafts.

Thus, the whole history of our country, except the very earliest period, is a history of credit and of paper currency, and, along with them, a progressive prosperity and improvement, beyond former example. If, in any highly commercial and civilized nation, it be practicable, at this day, to conduct its affairs well without their aid, (which, it is believed, no reasonable man will affirm,) yet it must be admitted that a sudden or rapid abandonment of them in this nation, and the attempt to substitute gold and silver, and nothing but gold and silver, in circulation, to destroy banks and bank paper, by commissions of bankruptcy or otherwise, would bring on a scene of distress and destruction which would fill the land with anguish. This, surely, cannot be meant.

But if this be not what is intended, then we are driven upon the other alternative; that is to say, that there is to be one currency for the government, of gold and silver, and another, of depreciated paper, for the people. There is no middle course. Such a scheme, rigorously and exactly executed, the minority of the committee believe to be entirely impracticable. Relaxations of it, there would unavoidably be, as there are at the present time, when, as already stated, payments to the creditors of the public are not invariably made in gold and silver. But they would be arbitrary, and according to the will and pleasure of the government officers, they would be unequal and unjust, and they would unavoidably lead to corruption. Examination and detection they would defy; for who can now pretend to ascertain or know whether the gold and silver already received by the government has been paid out in gold and silver, and whether a profit has not been made of it? If a creditor has been paid, no matter how, his receipt is a credit to the officer against an equal nominal amount of gold and silver. Is it unjust or unreasonable to entertain a suspicion that such things may be done? There have been delinquent postmasters; there have been robberies in post offices by persons in the employment of the department. Within a few days past, it has been publicly stated by a member on the floor of the house of representatives, that a certain custom-house officer was in the habit of taking receipts from laborers for more than he paid, and obtaining from the government the whole amount expressed upon the face of these false vouchers. Facts and charges like these are an admonition not to furnish temptations to roguery.

But it is believed, also, to be impracticable; because sooner or later, the people will take the matter into their own hands, and right themselves. They would not submit to the injurious distinction, and they ought not to submit to it, having the power to apply a corrective by election; more especially when they perceive that the distinction exists only because the government will not exert its unquestionable constitutional power, and restore the currency for the people as well as for the government.

* Rigorously executed, however, or relaxed, how has it operated? how does it now operate? and what is to be its future operation? The banks are endeavoring to resume specie payments, to make their notes equal to gold and silver. It is for the interest of the country that they should do so, as promptly as it can be done with safety. It is equally the interest of the country that they should not be precipitate; for, to resume after a suspension, is always a delicate operation, which, if hastily or unskillfully performed, may cause much pain and suffering. Above all, it is important, when they do resume, that they should not be in danger of being again obliged to suspend. The co-operation of the government would enable them to resume. But the government does not co-operate. It does worse. Its attitude is absolutely hostile to the banks, and hostile to the nation. It makes an extraordinary demand for specie, withdraws and withholds it from the general circulation, imparts to it the character of merchandise, and raises its value above the value of bank notes, which is precisely equivalent to depreciating that description of paper. In addition, the government proposes that even should bank paper, in the face of these adverse circumstances, regain an equality with gold and silver, still it shall not be received into the treasury, except for a very limited period, and in decreasing quantities, but be permanently and forever discredited. In this state of things, can there be any assurance that the banks, if they should resume the payment of specie, would be able to maintain it? The doubt (not to speak more strongly) of the issue of such an experiment, must operate most injuriously against the operation of a sound currency. The co-operation of the government, in case of resumption, would enable them to maintain specie payments. But, with the antagonist power of an independent treasury, able to command a large amount of specie, and to withdraw it from general circulation, to prevent it from going into the banks, and to force it out, it appears to the minority of the committee impossible to understand how the banks could re-establish, or, if re-established, could preserve the specie basis.

Should such be the working of the independent treasury, or hard money scheme, as it unavoidably must be, that one of two things will happen: an indefinite suspension by the banks, or a sudden and violent contraction of the circulation. The first of these is entirely inadmissible. An unlimited issue of bank paper, unrestricted by the obligation to keep it equal to specie, and to convert it upon demand into coin, would flood the country with depreciated and depreciating notes, and entail upon it all the evils of a currency constantly tending downwards, and becoming more and more debased, until it should be sunk in value as finally to perish from weakness. This, the laws of the state could perhaps prevent, and probably would prevent.

The other, (a sudden and violent contraction,) as has been already remarked, would be attended with the most grievous consequences. Little is hazarded in saying that it could not, and would not, be borne. But, between this evil and the one just mentioned, (of indefinite suspension,) there is an important distinction. State laws, administered by state courts, may perhaps control the latter. Banks are amenable to the laws, and may be compelled to fulfil their contracts. If their be a forbearance towards them, as there has been for some months past, it must be owing to a general sense of the necessity and justice of their course, and an equally general conviction that the interests of the community require that it should not be disturbed. The law has not lost its virtue or its vigor; but those for whom it was made think fit, each for himself, to waive its application, as he has a right to do.

The evil of a sudden contraction, and an insufficient circulation, caused by a measure of the federal government, on the contrary, is one which the state legislation cannot remedy or relieve. It is beyond the reach of the power of the state legislatures. Congress alone has power in the matter. The legislative authority of the union can repeal the measure; but can it heal the wounds which in the mean time have been inflicted, or repair the damage which has been suffered? Assuredly not. The mischief done must remain. And, besides, the acknowledgment of mischief working error is one hard to make, and likely to encounter a strenuous resistance, protracting and increasing the public agony. Should the resistance be overcome, the sum of the work is much misery and loss, of public and private sacrifice, for no good purpose.

Another expedient would probably be suggested, for public, like private malady, begets restlessness and an inclination to resort to strange remedies: that is to say, the issue of government paper to supply the circulation. Such a paper, as has been remarked before, is inconvertible. The government cannot be compelled to redeem it. For this reason, it cannot be equal to gold and silver, nor in any respect the representative of those metals. Whatever it may promise on its face, it will be depreciated in the beginning, and, according to the quantity issued, will be more and more depreciated. Besides, if it be supplied in quantities equal to the demand for circulation, it will entirely banish specie, not retaining even the quantity which the banks are obliged to keep for their security, because the government would not be liable to demands for payment, as the banks are. There is a strong temptation, too, to over issues, and nothing to restrain them, as the experience of all governments has shown. It is a covert mode of contracting debt, which eludes public observation; and on that account, as well as the facility with which it is managed, is extremely seductive. A resort to it ought never, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, to be allowed, but in cases of strong and overruling necessity. The more open method of borrowing, whereby it is plainly made known that a debt is contracted, and the amount of such debt is at all times ascertainable by congress and the people, is far preferable to an issue of government paper, whether treasury notes, or in any other form, which are a debt in disguise. The one inculcates economy; the other leads to extravagance; as any expenditure can be easily provided for, by a new emission of notes, or a re-issue of those which have been redeemed. At the special session of congress, not long ago than October last, authority was given to issue ten millions of dollars; a further authority is already asked for. One of the arguments in its favor was, that the notes would aid the circulation—a purpose which, by no means, recommends them; for the circulation of government paper, based only on government credit, and having no other limit but the extent of that credit, has everywhere had the same disastrous history. Such a lesson as it furnishes, in the opinion of the minority of the committee, ought to teach us to beware of the beginning of a plan so seductive and dangerous. There is no check upon it; there is an unavoidable tendency in it to excess. Depreciation accompanies it from the outset; a desperate recklessness is generated in its progress; rapid and great fluctuations are its inseparable incidents; and, finally, any new element of disorder supervening, (such as all governments are exposed to,) the public credit fails, and the paper becomes worthless in the hands where it may happen to be. Thus it was with the continental money; that was government paper, based upon the resources of the country, and importing, upon its face, a binding obligation to pay. It became a circulation; yet, in about three years, it ran its whole career, and perished. Who would be willing to run even the smallest risk of re-enacting the scene of continental money?

But why should this view be further insisted upon? It is universally admitted to be correct. Governments, it is true, have not everywhere abandoned the issue of paper. Nor have they everywhere abandoned other practices manifestly destructive to the countries whose interests are in their power. In the east, an energetic individual, in a subordinate and dependent province, is, at this time, making for himself a kingdom and a name. His reputation is already widely spread, and he is enjoying the homage paid to fortune. But how is this effected? According to the statement of travellers, he recruits his armies by forcing all the males of the country to bear arms, and his treasury by exactions which have no reference to the ability of the people to pay. Population is dwindling; the cultivation of the earth is failing from the want of labor, and the insecurity of its fruits; miserable poverty and desolation are extending their gloomy dominion; and a deeper barbarism than prevailed before, will be the final accomplishment of a barbarian, but high-sounding, ambition. The government, in this instance, is separated from the people. The government takes care of itself, and the people are to take care of themselves. The maxim is a bad one. Its application everywhere will be the same in kind, though it may not be in the same degree.

The means and machinery by which the purpose of the executive is proposed to be accomplished, are, in the mind of the minority of the committee, not less objectionable. The whole of the treasure of the United States is to be placed in the custody of officers appointed by the executive, and removable at his pleasure. This is, in the first place, a great scheme of patronage and of power, however it may be intended. If there be any who think that these are not already great enough, they will, of course, on that account, favor the project. Those, on the contrary, who are of opinion that the patronage is already sufficient, if corruptly employed, to interfere with the freedom of the elections, and to endanger the balance of the constitution, will be opposed to the establishment of a new corps of officers, spread over the country in numbers which cannot be defined, with new powers, and especially with the money power, in their hands. Still more will they be opposed to it, when they reflect upon the peculiarly corrupting nature of this power. It is represented that they will be few in number. So they will be at first; but what limit can be assigned for their increase? Besides, whether few or many, the whole power will be lodged with them; and the fewer there are of them, the greater will be each one's portion of that power.

If the plan be rigorously and exactly executed, the surplus in the treasury, to be entirely of gold and silver, will be locked up from circulation. The people will have no benefit from it. They will be injured by it, to the whole extent of the cost of accumulating and keeping such an amount of inactive capital. The expense will be a dead loss, to be borne by them.

But will the treasure be safe? This is another and a very great question. The minority of the committee are fully convinced that it will not. Our own experience, a portion of which has been already alluded to, corroborates this conviction. Other instances might be vouched. A melancholically example occurred within a few years past in one of the states, where a character of established integrity sunk under the strength of the temptation of such a trust as is here proposed. No one can seriously believe that there is security where there is an actual touch of money, with only a distant and contingent accountability. Vaults and safes are no protection against him who has the key. The Dutch are an honest and a frugal people, and, withal, very exact and careful. Yet the gold and silver escaped from the vaults of the bank of Amsterdam, where they had been placed by individuals, to be restored upon demand. Though called a bank, that institution had no function but to safely keep the money intrusted to its charge, and to return it when called for; and that function it did not fulfil. That confidence for a long time maintained the credit of its receipts. That confidence was found to have been misplaced, and the resort has since been to a bank of discount and deposit. No method of security or accountability, in short, has hitherto been devised, which has been found effectual and adequate in such a case; and, as the nature of man is not materially changed, no such method can be relied upon. Is any new accountability proposed, of better promise? An occasional examination is to be made by certain other executive officers. As against the executive, in the aggregate, this is obviously no security at all. It is the executive examining itself. There is no undue jealousy indulged in believing that it would be illusory. Nor can much faith be had in a plan whereby one officer becomes the examiner of the conduct of another officer. If there be not a mutual sympathy, inclining to indulgence, nor a natural confidence, quite inconsistent with a strict scrutiny, yet an artful man will always be able, knowing when and by whom the examination is to be made, so to prepare for it, as to elude its force or soften its rigor. In these remarks there is no harsh imputation of extraordinary turpitude. Self-deception is quite as common, if not much more so, than the practice of deceit upon others. Men begin with deceiving themselves, and then are driven to falsehood and concealment; persuaded all the time that they mean no harm, and that things will come right in the end. In almost all cases of delinquencies in trusts, it will be found that the earliest steps are taken under this sort of delusion. If they are taken with impunity, they lead to others, ending at last in the consummation of wrong not intended; and, only when it is too late, exhibiting the depravity of the first deviation. The scheme now proposed, is full of this kind of temptation; and where is to be found an assurance that it will not work the ordinary results? The losses, it is believed, must be great; the injury to morals not less, and, as a consequence, a rapid degeneracy from the high standard hitherto maintained in the money concerns of the government.

These are some of the objections to the plan of an independent treasury; and, without going into others, which would extend this paper to an inconvenient length, the minority of the committee deem them amply sufficient, if duly considered, to condemn it.

What, then, they would ask, are the urgent motives for its adoption? What are the evils to be avoided? What are the benefits that are promised? Why must the country be precipitated upon a measure to which it has not assented, but has manifested a strong aversion? Why are the people to be outmaneuvered by the government, and a strong position gained against them, from which they may for a long time be disobeyed and defied?

The most extraordinary of all the seeming arguments used in its favor, is, that it is already in operation. Accident does sometimes mock the wit of man by producing or disclosing contrivances which human ingenuity would have been slow to invent, or perhaps would never have invented. It is the part of wisdom to appropriate and employ them, when they thus present themselves. But the proof of their title to be espoused is, not that they are the offspring of accident, but they are adapted to a good useful purpose. It is precisely here that the argument fails. It is true that experiments, intended for a different effect, have terminated in throwing the currency and circulation into disorder, and that, in the confusion, the treasury has found itself where it now is. Is that condition one which recommends itself, by its adaptation to the wants of the people, or by any capacity to give relief? If it be, let it be adopted. If not, let it be rejected.—This is a plain, and, fortunately, an easy test. As this state of the fiscal concerns of the government has existed since May last, there has been time enough for it to manifest its healing virtue, and there has been disease enough to employ all its power to relieve. What relief, then, has it administered? Will any considerate man venture to say that the separation of the government from the people in the time of their distress, and the resort to a hard-money system by the treasury, has done good? Will he call that a happy accident which has led to these effects? To the minority of the committee it appears that opposite conclusion would be much nearer the truth. The position taken by the treasury (whether excusable or not upon the ground of a necessary obedience to law, which they are not disposed to discuss) was such as to aggravate the disorder, and so continues. Had the treasury come nearer to the people, and co-operated with them, instead of raising the value of coin, as has been done, there would have been a better prospect of the resumption of specie payments and of the restoration of credit. While it stands out, and more particularly while it is a buyer of specie, and in open hostility with the banks, no one can see how a resumption is to take place, unless it be by a contraction of issues and withdrawal of bank paper, ruinous to business and to all who are engaged in it; nor how a resumption is to be maintained, if it should take place. What advantage can possibly accrue from legalizing and perpetuating such a system? Had the executive government confined its request to a sanction by congress of the past, such a request might have deserved consideration. But it is too much to ask the adoption, as a system, of what has been any thing but beneficent in its operation.

In speaking of a resumption of specie payments by the banks as a thing to be earnestly desired, the minority of the committee wish to be understood to mean a real and bona fide resumption, and not one that is merely colorable. If a bank issue no paper, or pay the checks upon it in notes of other banks which do not pay specie, such a bank is not a specie-paying bank to any good intent, nor does it contribute towards the restoration of the currency. To illustrate this matter, let us take the instance of the Bank of Washington, commonly understood to be a specie-paying bank, and recognised as such by the government. When a member of congress gets a check upon that bank for his pay, does he receive gold and silver? No. Does he receive treasury notes? No. Does he even receive notes of the Washington Bank? No, he does not. The Washington Bank pays him, in whole or in part, with the notes of the Bank of the Metropolis, or the Patriotic Bank, confessedly non-specie-paying banks.—How is he better off, then, than if he had received a check, in the first instance, upon one of those banks? or what beneficial distinction is there in reality between these banks? It may be that the Bank of Washington charges the treasury with the whole nominal amount paid, as so much specie; in which case, that bank makes a gain of the difference between the value of the specie and of the depreciated paper; but the creditor loses it. He pays just as much as it would cost him to deal with a broker. As far as he is concerned, the only difference is this: a specie-paying bank is one which does not pay specie; a non-specie-paying bank is one which does not profess to pay specie: that is the whole distinction. The extension of such a scheme throughout all the operations of the government, would, upon a much broader scale, come to the same result. The debtor would be required to pay specie; the creditor would be obliged to take what he could get. The profit would fall to the lot of some intermediate person—a bank, or an individual; and what would be gained by the unjust sacrifice? Would it tend to restore the currency? Not at all, but the very reverse. What the country stands in need of, and the treasury too, is a general restoration; one weight and one measure for all; so that every man may have his due without being obliged to pay for it. The plan of an independent treasury is opposed to this; it will not permit a resumption to take place, nor to be maintained if it should.

If it should be said, that what is stated of the Washington Bank occurs but partially, or in some instances, and is owing to particular circumstances, the answer (if true) would only raise a new objection. This very partiality, this inequality in dealing with creditors, is per se an evil, and is an aggravation of all other evils. Besides, if there be a profit to be made from such casualties, (as there will be) does not every one perceive that this profit will be an inducement to multiply them? Spread the scheme over the whole United States, and at every station plant along with it this motive for irregularity, partiality, and abuse; and it is impossible to avoid believing that the growth will everywhere be the same. The administrators of the revenue will have an interest in keeping up the disorder in the currency, as a source of profit; and they will have the power of promoting their interest. Their harvest would be from disorder. Restore the currency—that is, the general currency—and there is no such motive.

The minority of the committee feel that they have already transcended the limits of discussion. The subject is one of great scope and of vast importance, and admits of much more to be said; but, having already occupied so much time, they will hasten to a conclusion, only noticing two or three of the most prominent arguments advanced in behalf of the "independent treasury."

The first and the greatest argument, repeated in every variety of form by the president, by the secretary of the treasury, and by the committee of ways and means, is, that there has been an undue multiplication of state banks, an undue increase of bank capital and bank issues, a redundant circulation, and, as a consequence, unlimited speculation, terminating in commercial revulsions, and exposing us to violent fluctuations.

In this general statement there are two parts, entitled to separate consideration. The first of them, namely, the undue increase of banks, of bank capital and bank issues, is one the minority of the committee are not inclined, as a matter of fact, to discuss. Let it be conceded, for the sake of the argument, that the statement is correct; then comes the inquiry, (which is most material.) Is this an inherent vice of the banking system, which cannot, by any constitutional means, be checked or restrained; or has it been occasioned by withholding or withdrawing a practicable regulation, and, at the same time, administering undue stimulants?

If the answer be that it is an inherent and inseparable vice of the banking system, which can neither be controlled nor regulated, it seems to countenance the conclusion, that the cure is in the destruction of the banks. But, however positively this conclusion may by some have been adopted as a ground of recommendation and action, the public mind has always resisted it, and never more decidedly and unanimously than at this moment. It was perceived at once, that the final question, involving so much misery, was happily not yet reached. There was a prior one to be considered: namely, whether, even with this inherent evil tendency, (if such there be,) the banking system is not better than any thing yet proposed in its place? Banks and banking have been much discussed and considered, and so has been the scheme of a hard money currency and an independent treasury. The people have not inclined to give up the former, nor to espouse the latter.

But it is very material further to consider, whether the excesses of state banks have not been occasioned by acts of the government destroying or refusing an adequate regulation, and, simultaneously, applying stimulants. As long as there remains a doubt upon this question, the time has not arrived for considering the dreadful alternative of destroying the state banks. There is much more than doubt. Within the last four or five years, a very great change has been wrought by the executive, of a nature to remove all check and control, and at the same time to stimulate; a plethora (be it admitted) has ensued. The bones, and the muscle, and the nerves, and the sinews, are there, but the vessels are overloaded; and the circulation, first quickened into unwholesome activity, is obstructed, or bursts from its proper channels. The cause is sufficient for the effect, and the effect is such as the cause would produce: sound philosophy would teach us that they are connected.

But, further; it is now nearly fifty years since the government went into operation under the present constitution. During forty years there was a national bank; between the first and the last bank, there was an interval of about five years; and since the last of them ceased to be employed by the government, there have passed less than five years. During the whole term of forty years, there was no suspension of specie payments: in each of the periods of five years there was; and in each of these periods the suspension followed in about three years. Here is a striking fact, throwing the light of experience upon our money affairs, to establish that there is a practicable and attainable regulation, which never has failed, and which never has been dispensed with, even for a short period, without a failure ensuing.

The report of the majority assumes, with confidence, that if the Bank of the United States ha been continued as the agent of the government, and exposed to the same trial as the deposit banks were, the shock to commerce would have been more violent, and the suspension of specie payments would have occurred at an earlier period. There would be great difficulty in discussing a question as to what would or would not have happened in a given state of things, which has not existed. It is, at best, but conjecture; and the minority of the committee can only answer it by the fact, that a suspension never did take place during the existence of such an agent. But the hypothesis of the majority, to which the minority by no means agree, does not present the true question. We are not now to inquire whether the Bank of the United States, if brought into the circumstances which obliged the state banks to suspend in May, 1837, could have avoided the catastrophe. The correct inquiry, and the material one to be answered, is, whether that state of circumstances could have occurred if the agency of the Bank of the United States had been continued without interruption. No one can believe that the history of the event is concentrated in the day or the month when it occurred, so that we need look no further. There was a long train of preparatory occurrences, a mixing of the ingredients, a combination of the elements, before the final explosion; and at last the spark fell, as if by accident, but really, though undesignedly, generated in the process.—Now, it must be very evident, in the first place, that if the agency of the Bank of the United States had been continued, the laboratory itself, in which the preparation was made, would never have had a being; neither would the materials. In that case, the deposits would have remained where they were, and would not have gone into the deposit banks.—There would have been no inducement unreasonably to multiply state banks, or to increase their loans and issues; and if a tendency to such things had appeared, it would have been effectually but kindly checked by a strong and friendly hand. There would have been no occasion for the treasury to direct the banks to give facilities, or to strengthen themselves, or otherwise to interfere with them.—There would have been no such accumulation of public treasure in the state banks as was afterwards found there. There would have been no such transfer, as it may be admitted, by the way of managing it by the treasury, produced very great disturbance. There would have been no undue efforts to bring coin into the country, and make it the basis of a still further increase of circulation. If, from expansion by the banks, there grew up (as has been alleged) over-trading, over-action, over-importation, and over-production of cotton, as its natural fruits—in a word, a scene of wild speculation—it must be clear that, if this expansion had not taken place, these consequences would not have ensued. But, further; if the root of this expansion itself had not been planted, and nourished, too, by the government, there would have been none of its mischievous growth. It may be said, in addition, that there would have been no such speculation in public lands as to call forth a specie circular to check it. There would then have been none of those preparatory steps which finally led to the suspension; and is it not reasonable to believe that there would have been no suspension? A strong institution, well administered, with its finger upon the pulse of currency and exchanges, foreign and domestic, would have discerned the approach of danger, and guarded against it. The great crisis in England, in 1825, was thus averted from the United States. The exertions, at that time, of the president of the bank, have been several times referred to, as evidence of the imminent peril the institution was in, with an intimation that a little more pressure, and the bank must have yielded. This is not doing justice either to the bank or its president. They did turn off the fury of the storm from the United States, and, therefore, their measures were sufficient for the purpose. That they had not others, and stronger ones, in reserve, if the occasion had called for them, is an inference that is quite gratuitous, and seems to be unjust. The president had scarcely been long enough in command of the fine vessel intrusted to his care, even to understand her trim, and still less to know all the shoals, and currents, and storms of the difficult navigation through which he was to conduct her. And yet, with a gallantry and mastery worthy of all admiration, he not only carried her safely through, but, with her, the whole fleet of state institutions. Not a spar was sprung, nor a rope-yarn strained. The crisis of 1836-'7, if the minority of the committee be right, could not have occurred, if the measures already referred to had not been adopted; and it is therefore impossible to answer whether the late Bank of the United States, in its former strength, could have lived through it. There is a remark, however, in the report of the majority, which throws some light upon the question. The hope of a resumption of specie payments, if not destroyed, is, in their estimation, weakened by the unavoidable want of harmony among the state banks. This is no new remark. Great efforts were made by the treasury, in the former suspension, to bring the banks to a common concerted action; but they were made in vain. The necessary unity could only be effected by the establishment of the Bank of the United States, and the concurrent operation of the government and the bank. Is not the same want of harmony perceptible in other exigencies requiring the union of counsel and of action?

The remaining part of the proposition we have been considering deserves also some attention. It supposes that the banking system unavoidably leads to speculation, to fluctuations, and to violent revulsions. This sounds very plausibly, but, when closely examined, will be found to have little weight.—To begin with the first of these magic words—magic, in the hold they take upon the feelings—is it in the power of the government, let it be asked, to prevent speculation, except by the exercise of an authority incompatible with individual freedom? Every man must be the judge in his own concerns, and will be so, in spite of all governmental exertions to restrain him, as the fate of the specie circular proves. After he is twenty-one years of age, it is his privilege to ruin himself, if he will, and to injure others, if they think fit to trust him. He may be advised and counselled, but he cannot be controlled. He has a right to speculate, if he so incline. To enterprise there is no restraint, but rather encouragement; and unfortunate enterprise is usually called speculation. There is a further very serious difficulty in the matter. The spring of enterprise and speculation is not within the knowledge, and not within the power, of governments. If it were, would they venture to lay their hands upon it? Many a poor inventor spends his last dollar at the patent office, to buy a patent which will not save him from starving; yet who ever thought of discouraging inventive ingenuity? Every lawful employment of the human faculties is of the same nature, and, pursued with the same view, tending to excess, from the influence of feelings, which are, nevertheless, the necessary spur to exertion. Take them away, and industry is at an end.

Again, as far as rash speculation is supposed to be owing to a redundant circulation, has government the power, or ought it to have the power, to check it? In other words, if the problem be, what amount of circulation is necessary to carry on the business of society, and to give suitable encouragement to enterprise and industry, without beguiling rash speculation, is government able to solve it, or ought government to be intrusted with its solution? It is just as easy to decide upon the distribution—how much is required for a state, a county, a town, or an individual.

But much is said about revulsions and fluctuations, as being aggravated, if not entirely caused, by the banking system, or credit system. This is a hasty and erroneous conclusion. A currency of gold and silver will no more protect against over-trading, speculation, failures, fluctuations, and revulsions, than a circulation of paper or credit. Let the south sea scheme and the Mississippi scheme be recollected—the one in a nation where there was no bank, and the other in a nation where a bank had been but recently established—and the allegation just made must be at once assented to. So with respect to individual failures; there were instances which, in amount and extent, quite equal, if they do not surpass, any in more modern times. In Canton, too, where the currency is silver, and there is no bank, the failure of a Hong merchant has been no unusual thing.

As to fluctuations in price, they were far greater in former times, when there was nothing deserving the name of commerce, no credit, and a currency entirely of gold and silver, than they now are. And they were infinitely more distressing; for they fell directly, and with all their weight, upon the necessities of life. From a table compiled by Mr. Jacob, in his "inquiry into the production and consumption of the precious metals," it appears that the variations in England were such as to produce intense suffering. In the 12th century, the price of wheat varied from 2s. a quarter (money of that time) to 18s. 2d. In the 18th century, it varied from 1s. 6d. in 1213, to 1l. 4s. in 1237. In 1258 it rose to 2l; "a great famine," Jacob says, "when many people were starved." It 1270 it rose to 4l. 16s.; "a famine," it is added, "when provisions were so scarce that parents did eat their own children," and sometimes was sold at 6l. 8s. In 1285 it was down to 1s. 6d.; and in 1289 to 1s. 4d., to 1s., and to 8d. In 1317 it was at 2l 4s. before harvest, and after harvest at 14s. In 1557, before harvest, the price was 2l. 13s. 4d., and after harvest 5s. Mr. Jacob very well remarks, that "the instances of the variation in prices which are recorded in former times, will excite surprise in those readers who have not paid attention to the subject, and ought to make us all grateful to that providence which has brought us into life in a period much less exposed to suffering than that in which our forefathers lived."

As commerce and credit have grown, the comforts of mankind have been, in the same proportion, increased. Crime and disorder have diminished, and the condition of all classes of society has been improved, but especially of the laboring classes. And hence, also, the average duration of life is greater than it was, by some years. A summary comparison, collected from various authors, may be found in McCulloch's statistics of the British empire.

To suppose, then, that credit is an evil, and to suppose that a currency entirely of gold and silver will be security against fluctuations, is a great mistake. To propose to legislate and to act upon such a supposition, is to advise a retrograde movement towards barbarism and its hideous calamities. It cannot be necessary to argue against it. We ought rather to feel grateful, as Mr. Jacob suggests, that we have come into life in so good a period, and endeavor to preserve the blessings of civilization, commerce, and credit.

The minority think there are some inaccuracies in details in the majority report, especially as to the comparison of domestic exchanges in 1825 and 1837, and the alleged losses of the government by the agency of the banks, which they intended particularly to notice. But they have already been carried to a length beyond what they intended, and feel it necessary to come to a close. As to the first of these points, they will content themselves with annexing a table made up from the best authorities they could find. As to the other, (the $1,254,424 lost by state banks,) it may suffice to remark, that the loss (whatever it was) was incurred before the late Bank of the United States came into existence.

In conclusion, the minority of the committee have only to add that they are opposed to the whole scheme of a sub-treasury, or independent treasury, whichever name it may be called by, as fraught, in their best judgment, with incalculable mischief to the free institutions of our country, and the prosperity of the people.

JOHN SERGEANT.
JOHN POPE.

I do not concur in all the views expressed in the above report; but I concur, generally, in opinion with the other members of the minority of the committee; and I concur entirely with them, that the proposed measure of an independent treasury is fraught with incalculable mischief to the free institutions of our country, and the prosperity of the people.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

April 28. Mr. Clay, of Ala., presented a remonstrance signed by a delegation of Cherokee and Choctaw Indians from the west of the Mississippi, against the establishment of a territorial government west of the Mississippi, for which a bill now in progress in the senate provides, which bill, Mr. Clay gave notice, he should move, when it should come up, to lay on the table at least till the next session of congress.

The remonstrance having been read, a debate ensued between Messrs. Tipton, Clay, of Alabama, White, and Sevier; after which it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

[The remonstrance and debate shall have a place hereafter.]

The following, among other business of minor importance was next disposed of.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the committee on finance were discharged from the further consideration of the senate resolution in relation to a general remission of duties on railroad iron.

Also, of two memorials from the chamber of commerce in New York, in favor of a warehousing system, inasmuch as the plan proposed by that chamber did not accord with the views of the committee.

Also, of a senate resolution, in regard to repaying to merchants of Mobile the extravagant fees paid by them for renewing their duty bonds, the committee believing that they could not recommend the passage of a law on this subject, unless it should be general.

On motion of Mr. Williams, the committee on naval affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying the act of March, 1837, in relation to the navy pension fund.

Mr. Benton, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to pay certain volunteers of Missouri. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States.

The discussion, mainly on the general merits of the bill, was continued by Messrs. Prentiss, Bayard, Linn, Hubbard, Tipton, and Buchanan, in favor of it; and by Messrs. Norvell, Calhoun, Wright, and Morris, in opposition.

On motion of Mr. Bayard, the bill was amended so as to require the commissioners to reside at the seat of government, and also to give them authority to punish contempt to preserve order in their sittings.

Mr. Tipton moved to reduce the salary of each commissioner from $3,000 to $2,500, which was briefly debated and negatived, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, of Ken., Lumpkin, Norvell, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, White, Young

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Spence, Trotter, Williams, Wright—23.

On the suggestion, or motion of Mr. Wright, an apparent inconsistency in the bill was so altered as to make the provision authorizing the summoning of witnesses general, instead of its being contingent on the application of claimants.

Two or three other small amendments were made to make the parts of the bill correspond with preceding amendments.

Mr. Benton moved to amend the bill by requiring that no member of congress, or delegate of a territory, should appear before the board as agent, attorney, or advocate, in presenting any claim, nor act as such in any way whatever.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, all persons holding office under the government were added; and the amendment, so amended, was agreed to.

Mr. Ruggles moved that no case should be referred to this board which had already been favorably reported on in congress. Negatived.

After a few remarks by Mr. Morris, against the bill, and by Mr. Hubbard in favor, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Williams—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Lumpkin, Morris, Norvell, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, White, Wright, Young—15.

Mr. White, chairman of the special committee on the case of Mr. Ruggles, made a supplemental report, relating to charges made against him by an individual (a Dr. Graham) in North Carolina. The report was read, from which it appeared that the accuser was confined in North Carolina for debt, and unable, therefore, to obey the summons of the committee.

A resolution was appended to the report, discharging the committee from the farther consideration of all matters of investigation on which they had not been before reported.

Mr. White said he should not move for the printing of the report, as he deemed it improper, or inexpedient under the circumstances.

The resolution was agreed to without dissent.

The senate then adjourned.

April 27. After the presentation of a number of petitions, &c. the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the United States, was read a third time, passed, and sent to the other house for concurrence.

On motion of Mr. White, the senate took up the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of Missouri and Arkansas, [to establish an Indian territorial government.]

Mr. White said he should not make any additional remarks to those he made yesterday, unless the bill should be opposed; but in that case he should feel himself called on to say something more. The administration had recommended this measure in strong terms, and he hoped it would be finally acted on now, as the session was far advanced. He would now hear with pleasure any objection that might be advanced against it.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said he had not yet examined the bill as fully as he desired, and he hoped the senate would consent to let it lie till to-morrow.

Mr. White said he was naturally disposed to comply with this request, but he did not feel that it was properly a matter for his discretion. Mr. W. went into a brief history of the events which had at last led to this measure, and he urged it as one of great importance, both for the benefit of the Indians, several tribes of whom were urgent that it should be carried into effect; and also for the protection of the white people in the neighborhood of those Indians. If the senate thought proper to postpone it till to-morrow he should now make no further objections.

Mr. Norvell said he hoped never to see the day when an Indian or a negro would be admitted on the floor of congress. He therefore moved to strike from the bill the provision for a delegate from the proposed Indian territory.

Mr. Linn said he thought the senator had mistaken the nature of that provision; the delegate would not be entitled to a seat in congress.

Mr. Norvell said he understood it; but this would be the entering wedge to something more.

Mr. Linn remarked that it was one great object of the bill to make the Indians think the privilege offered by the bill a matter of consequence. It was really the most effectual measure that could be devised for the protection of Missouri, Arkansas, and Wisconsin, against any hostility on the part of these Indians; and it was also the best if not the only measure to civilize the Indians, and save them from destruction. Mr. L. thought it would be an important incidental benefit of the bill to give the Indians the hope of honorable office; it would hold out to ambitious men the inducement to elevate their characters, and would, in some measure, take the place of their warlike propensities. Represented here by a delegate or agent would also be a means of holding them the more strongly to the United States. In confirmation of these views, Mr. Linn read a portion of the memorial on this subject from the legislature of Missouri. Mr. L. also urged, that these Indians had now got to the jumping-off place, and now, if ever, was the time to save them.

Mr. Lumpkin gave a succinct history of the progress of events and proceedings touching the relations of the Indians and the United States, and he urged with much earnestness the adoption of the measure proposed.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said he had now looked at the bill, and he was happy to perceive that, in regard to the obnoxious point, it was peculiarly guarded, so that the remonstrants had no right to object to it. Mr. C. here read from the bill the provision that it should not be binding on any Indians, unless they consented to it by their tribe in council, or by their delegates. Mr. C. was not aware of any other objection to the bill. As to the objection of the senator from Michigan, Mr. C. differed from him, and argued that it was better in point, both of economy and of attaining the requisite information, to have a single delegate instead of the delegations, whose expenses were now usually borne by the government. The expectation of having such a delegate had also been heretofore held out by the government to the Indian tribes.

Mr. Norvell now modified his amendment, so as to strike out "delegate" to receive the same pay as members of congress; and insert agent, and also to strike out that portion of the bill (the preamble) which assigns as reasons for the passage of the bill that it would tend to civilize and otherwise benefit the Indians, and bind them more closely to the government and the country.

Mr. Allen spoke at considerable length in favor of this amendment, and against the whole bill, especially as a measure designed and calculated to raise up and strengthen a people who are our natural enemies, and thus to work mischief to ourselves, and still more to our descendants.

Mr. White advocated the bill at considerable length as a measure salutary and highly important.

Mr. Smith, of Ia., also spoke at length in favor of the bill, and in reply to Mr. Allen.

Mr. Swift briefly urged the propriety of retaining the name of delegate, inasmuch as the difference was only in name, and the government had stipulated with the Indians for a delegate; and he also thought it better to leave the compensation to be fixed hereafter.

Mr. Davis spoke in favor of the bill, and urged the propriety and obligation resting on us of treating the Indians with courtesy, liberality, and humanity.

Mr. Niles spoke in opposition to the bill, and earnestly advocated the principle of letting the Indians alone to take care of themselves, affording them only protection.

Mr. Norvell's amendment was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Smith, of Conn., Trotter, Wright, Young—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Monton, Nicholas, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, White, Williams—24.

Mr. Hubbard renewed a portion of Mr. Norvell's motion, namely, to strike out the preamble assigning the reasons for passing the bill. Negatived without a division.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the name of "Ncoshoh" was given to the proposed territory.

Mr. Linn spoke in reply to Mr. Allen, and strongly in favor of the bill.

Mr. Crittenden moved to provide for a compensation of $2 a day to the members of the Indian councils, in addition to their expenses; and he spoke briefly in favor of the bill.

After a sharp opposition from Mr. Niles, and a suggestion by Mr. White, that it might disaffect the neighboring Indians, this amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. King moved to amend the bill by setting apart all the country east of the Rocky mountains, north of Missouri river, and north and west of the state of Missouri, as Indian territory, to be secured to them forever.

After a few remarks by Messrs. King and Sevier, in favor of this amendment, and by Messrs. Tipton and Linn, adverse to it, without taking any question, the senate adjourned till Monday.

April 30. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose and said he had received and had been requested to present a petition signed by a number of benevolent individuals, and printed by them, petitions similar to which, and signed by a vast number, had been received by the other house, praying that, in the adjustment of our difficulties with Mexico, an amicable arbitration might be employed.

The petition also recommended earnestly the propriety of the establishment of an international congress; or tribunal for the settlement of the difficulties which arise between nations, thus avoiding the calamities of war. The petitioners had for a long time held this object in view, and had addressed several legislative bodies on the subject; and Mr. C. understood that the respectable Massachusetts legislature had given countenance and encouragement to the object.

Mr. C. was glad to find by the morning papers that one of the objects of these petitioners, namely, the reference of our difficulties with Mexico to an arbitration, had been lately accomplished. With respect to the other and greater and more comprehensive object of the petitioners, all must admire and share in the philanthropy which suggested such a measure, and must wish it to be finally accomplished, if it be practicable. The petitioners were desirous that this country should take the initiative in adopting it; and whether it should be done or not, all must do justice to the motives of the petitioners; and Mr. C. had no doubt that a great portion of the difficulties between nations might be found capable of a satisfactory adjustment without a resort to war.

The improvements in the use of steam, by bringing together nations that were distant from each other, by means of railroads and other intercommunications, would soon render it impossible that one nation should go to war with another without injuring the business, and detracting from the prosperity of all; this at no distant period would lessen if not entirely prevent the recurrence of war. But whether it was possible or not that such a tribunal as was now asked for should be established, remained yet to be seen. It had been suggested or proposed by some philosophers, among whom was our own Franklin, and also by some enlightened monarchs: Henry the fourth of France suggested the same idea; and at all events the senate would concur with Mr. C. in sharing in the feelings and approving the motives with which this proposition was presented.

On motion of Mr. Clay, the memorial was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Clay said, while he was up, he wished to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee on finance. Mr. C. said he had no doubt of the concurrence of the honorable chairman of that committee that we had now arrived at a very important moment in the monetary affairs of the country. Some of the banks in Boston and New York had resumed specie payments, and others would probably follow this good example in the course of a few days; and Mr. C. hoped that it would be generally done, at least as far as the banks were able; though he was aware that some of them were not prepared. Mr. C. wished, therefore, to ascertain of the chairman of the committee of finance whether there was before that committee, or whether the executive had any intention to bring forward any measure of any description other than that which now lay on the table in the other house, with a view to aid, strengthen, and encourage the banks in the resumption and continuance of specie payments. If there was no intention in the committee or the executive branch of the government to do any thing on this subject, thus leaving the banks to go on unaided in this operation, it might be the duty of others to suggest some measure for this desirable purpose.

Mr. Wright said there was nothing on the subject before the committee which had not been referred to them by the senate, and of that there was nothing on which they had not already reported. As to what the executive was doing, or intended to do, Mr. W. was as ignorant as the senator from Kentucky, and he had nothing to say on that subject.

Mr. Clay said, that being the state of the case, that, as far as the honorable chairman knew on the subject, neither the committee on finance nor the executive design to bring forward any measure, he would now offer the following joint resolution:

"Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, That no discrimination shall be made as to the currency or medium of payment in the several branches of the public revenue, or in debts or dues to the government; and that, until otherwise ordered by congress, the notes of sound banks which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, under suitable restrictions, to be forthwith prescribed and promulgated by the secretary of the treasury, shall be received in payment of the revenue and of debts and dues to the government, and shall be subsequently disbursed, in a course of public expenditure, to all public creditors who are willing to receive them."

Mr. Grundy said he wished to draw the attention of the senator from Kentucky to a single point, namely, whether the resolution ought not to be restricted in its operation to banks in the vicinity of the places where the revenue was to be received.

Mr. Clay said he did not enter into details in drawing the resolution; this point would come up when they should consider it. But if the senator had more fully attended to the reading of the resolution, he would have seen that it provided that the notes were not required by it to be received without limitation, but under such suitable regulations as should be published and promulgated by the secretary of the treasury. This discretion in the secretary of the treasury would be amply sufficient to meet all cases; but this subject would of course come up when they should consider the resolution.

Mr. Grundy was understood to say that he had merely desired to call the attention of the senator to this point, that he might consider whether the resolution should not be so worded as to give the secretary of the treasury express power on this point.

The resolution was now read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Davis presented a petition from citizens of Candor, New York, in which they expressed their belief that the late treaty with the Cherokee Indians was unauthorized, and that it would be oppressive for the government to enforce it. Laid on the table.

Mr. Wall presented a remonstrance from 134 men and 77 women against the admission of any new state into the union. Also, from 130 men and 84 women, against slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. Motions to receive, severally laid on the table.

Mr. Wright presented a petition against slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, from citizens of Litchfield, N. Y. Motion to receive laid on the table.

Mr. King presented a petition from Joshua Kennedy; and Mr. Rives from another individual. Referred.

On motion of Mr. Prentiss, the committee on public lands was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the trustees of Allegheny college, Pennsylvania, praying for the grant of a township of land; the petition of the trustees of the Kentucky Baptist Education society, praying for a grant of land to each of the colleges in the United States; and the petition of the corporation of South Hanover college, Indiana, praying for the donation of a tract of land in aid of that institution.

The senate took up the bill to grant to the states and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals the right of way through the public lands of the United States.

Mr. Lyon moved to amend the bill by giving states and companies the pre-emption right to the sections of the public lands through which their roads and canals might run, at $1 25 per acre.

After a sharp opposition to this amendment by Messrs. Davis, Linn, King, Tipton, and Clay, of Alabama, chiefly on the ground of its embarrassing a very important measure, it was withdrawn by the mover. Mr. King moved to allow a width of 200 feet for the roads, &c. authorized by the bill. Mr. Davis said experience at the north had shown that 80 feet was amply sufficient, and if more were allowed, it would remain covered with brush and rubbish, and disfigure, rather than add any ornament to the country. Mr. King stated that some southern trees were 80 feet below the limbs, and that therefore the fall of a single tree across a road of that width might obstruct it entirely. The width of 200 feet was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the provisions of the bill were extended to companies incorporated by the territories, as well as by the states.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of Missouri and Arkansas.

The question being on Mr. King's amendment. To set apart as Indian territory, to be secured to them forever, all the public lands to which the Indian title had not already been extinguished, east of the Rocky mountains, north of Missouri river, north and west of the state of Missouri, and west of the Mississippi river—

Mr. Lumpkin spoke at length in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. King expressed his regret at the prospect that the amendment would not prevail, and argued at some length in its favor, chiefly on the ground of maintaining a suitable balance between the north and the south.

The debate (to be given hereafter) was continued by Messrs. Sevier, Calhoun, and King, in favor of the amendment, and by Messrs. Tipton, Linn, Swift, Davis, Southard, Young, and White, in opposition to the amendment, and in favor of the bill.

The objection to the amendment most insisted on was that it would embarrass and weaken a general measure of very great importance.

The amendment was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Preston, Roane, Sevier, Spence—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—33.

After some remarks by Mr. Calhoun, expressive of much doubt in regard to this measure, and of a preference that it should be postponed to the next session, and by Messrs. Lumpkin and White in favor of its immediate adoption,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young,—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Niles, Norvell—6.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, expressed his desire that, by the unanimous consent of the senate, the resolution introduced by him this morning, for the reception of bank notes in payment of revenue, should be made the special order for day after to-morrow. Mr. Wright and Mr. King objecting, this object was not attained.

The senate adjourned.

May 1. But little business was transacted in the senate to-day, that body having adjourned at an early hour.

May 2. After the reception of some petitions and resolutions, (to be noticed hereafter,) and passing the bills ordered to a third reading on Monday, the senate took up, on his motion, Mr. Clay's currency resolution.

The resolution having been read a second time, Mr. Wright moved that it be referred to the committee on finance. This motion led to an animated debate, which lasted till 4 o'clock. The reference was advocated by Messrs. Wright, Calhoun, Benton, Niles, Buchanan, and King, on the ground of usage in regard to all propositions of importance originating with individual members, and also for the purpose of ascertaining how far it might or might not conflict with existing laws, &c.; and it was opposed by Messrs. Clay, Davis, Preston, and Tipton, on the ground that the resolution, being free from details, did not require a reference; that the reference proposed was to a committee hostile to the resolution; that it would produce delay; and that the object, as disclosed by the debate, was only to give the committee an opportunity to make an argument against it in the shape of a report, &c. &c. [The debate will be given hereafter.] The question on the reference being at length taken, was carried in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Trotter, Wall, Williams, Wright, Young—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—19.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, April 27. A message was received from the president of the United States, in partial compliance with a resolution of the house of the 21st ultimo, transmitting copies of all correspondence between the government of the United States and the government of Mexico, and of all instructions given to our minister at the court of Mexico, since the late Mexican treaty.

A communication was received from the commissioner of public buildings, in obedience to a resolution of the house, transmitting copies of all the contracts made by him in the year, 1837, with the names of the applicants for said contracts, and the amount of their respective bids.

Also, a communication from the postmaster general, transmitting the information called for by the house on the 16th instant, in relation to a claim against Samuel B. Crockett, late postmaster at Frankfort, Ky., and Anthony Crockett and F. P. Blair, his sureties.

Mr. Sergeant presented resolutions of the corporation of Philadelphia, requesting the delegation of the state of Pennsylvania in congress to aid in obtaining the passage of a law to establish a dry-dock at the navy yard, Philadelphia.

The reports of the committee upon the late duel, being the unfinished business was resumed, and the clerk proceeded in the reading of the testimony taken before, and reported by, the select committee.

After the testimony had been read,

Mr. Wise asked to have the journal of the committee (being a part of the report) read, which was ordered; and the journal was accordingly read by the clerk.

The reading was concluded at half past 2 o'clock.

The reading of the reports, evidence, and journal, having been completed, the debate on the pending motion to print and to postpone was resumed by Mr. Toucey, and continued by Messrs. Grennell, Rariden, Elmore, Wise, Graves, Johnson, of Maryland, and Robertson, who had not concluded his remarks, when, on motion of Mr. Menefee, (to whom he gave way,) the house adjourned.

Saturday, April 28. Mr. Robinson, a member elect from Maine, appeared, was sworn, and took his seat.

Mr. Evans and Mr. Noyes presented certain documents from the government of the state of Maine, in relation to the north eastern boundary; which were referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The senate's bill, establishing a board of commissioners to examine and establish claims against the United States, was read twice, and referred to the committee of claims.

The house then proceeded to the unfinished business, being the consideration of the reports from the duel committee and the question being on the motion of Mr. Toucey, chairman of the select committee to postpone the consideration of the report for two weeks, and, in the mean while, to print it, with the amendment moved by Mr. Robertson, to refer it to a committee of privileges, to report the proper course for the house to pursue,

Mr. Robertson resumed his speech in opposition to the postponement and printing, and in support of the proposition he had moved.

He was succeeded by Mr. Stanley, of North Carolina, on the same side of the question. He opposed the postponement, and advocated Mr. Adams' plan of recommitment of the report, with instructions to state only the facts of the case.

Mr. Naylor, spoke earnestly in condemnation of the course of the committee, as having transcended their powers and violated the constitution, and being worthy of the censure of the house.

Mr. Bronson replied, and vindicated the committee's course.

Mr. Toucey wished to have a correction made in the journal of the committee: and, while up, responded to some of the remarks of Mr. Stanley.

Mr. Wise warmly remonstrated against the least alteration of the committee's journal or report, as it nearly concerned his reputation, and might not be changed in a letter or a point.

Mr. Stanley rejoined with some severity to the remarks of Mr. Toucey.

Mr. Boon made some remarks, saying, among other things, that the Pottowattomie psalm book might as well be quoted to him as Jefferson's manual, when it was against all truth and justice.

Mr. W. Cost Johnson went at large into an examination of the committee's report, on which he passed very decided censure. During his speech several explanatory statements and brief replies were made by Mr. Toucey and Mr. Grantland, and he was several times checked by the chair for touching on the merits of the report.

Mr. Cambreleng made an appeal to both sides of the house on the delay of the public business, which he said must be sacrificed if this trial should proceed.

Mr. Menefee commenced a speech of much animation, warmly remonstrating against the idea of after having collected testimony, and published to the world, the members implicated were to be denied a fair and open trial by the house. He had proceeded some time, when he yielded to a motion of Mr. Bell for an adjournment.

On this motion Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays; and the motion was negative: Yeas 76, nays 96. Mr. Mallory then moved a call of the house; and on this motion Mr. Jenifer demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; whereupon, Mr. Potts renewed the motion to adjourn; which prevailing, the house adjourned about half-past three o'clock.

Monday, April 30. John P. Kennedy, member elect from Maryland, was announced by his colleague, Mr. Jenifer, appeared, was sworn, and took his seat.

By leave several petitions were presented, and the following resolutions offered and adopted:

On motion of Mr. Glascock,

Resolved, That the committee on accounts be instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the appointment of librarian in this house, and of uniting the office with that of keeper of public documents.

On motion of Mr. Russell,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house copies of all correspondence and communications which have passed between this and any foreign government, and the officers or agents thereof, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States; also, what steps, if any, have been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States; provided such communications are not incompatible with the interest of the United States.

Messrs. Hunter, of Ohio, Prentiss, of New York, Davee, and Johnson, of Louisiana, successively asked leave to present resolutions and petitions. Refused.

Messrs. Birdsall and Maury had leave to present memorials.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, made an effort to take up, as in committee of the whole, the bill to prevent the explosion of steam-boilers.

Mr. Cambreleng objected.

The motion to suspend the rules for the purpose (requiring a vote of two-thirds) was lost.

The reports on the duel subject.

This subject, being the special order, came up, and was further discussed by Mr. Meneffe.

As soon as Mr. M. had finished his remarks, Mr. Pickens rose, and said he had voted for the resolution of Mr. Fairfield, under which this investigation had proceeded, as a matter of courtesy to the mover, who was the friend and classmate of the deceased; and he should do the same on the request of any gentleman. But, considering the pressing state of public affairs, the important questions impending over this house, the extent to which this discussion has been and may be carried, and his own decided opposition to any resolutions of censure or expulsion, he should move to lay the whole subject on the table, nor should any solicitations, from any quarter, induce him to withdraw his proposition. And on this motion Mr. P. demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. Graves rose, and expressed the earnest hope that the member from South Carolina would not thus interpose to prevent his being heard on this question before it was disposed of.

Mr. Wise followed with the same request, appealing to the friendship of Mr. Pickens, and to his justice as a member of that house, to withdraw his motion. Mr. Pickens said he was very sorry that he could not comply with these requests. He would do it with much pleasure, but he could not, conscientiously.

The Yeas and nays were then ordered. Mr. Cushing asked a call of the house; which was ordered unanimously. The call proceeded, and 197 members were ascertained to be present.

Mr. Legare moved to suspend further proceedings under the call. Ordered. Mr. Garland, of La., asked if, provided this motion prevail, the reports, &c. would appear among the printed documents, or on the printed journal of the house? The Speaker responded in the negative. Mr. M. Morris desired to know whether the senate bill referred to that committee would be included in this motion? The Speaker responded in the negative. Messrs. Robinson, of Maine, and Kennedy, of Maryland, (new members,) were, upon request, excused from voting on this question. Mr. Elmore asked leave to be excused also. Refused. Mr. Jones, of Wisconsin, begged the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his motion. Mr. Wise said it would be useless to lay this question on the table. He should demand it, as his privilege, to be tried at the bar upon this accusation. The motion of Mr. Pickens was lost by the following vote: yeas 28, nays 187.

The debate was resumed, and was still going on at a late hour; which we shall notice hereafter.

Tuesday, May 1. The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of war, transmitting information in obedience to the resolution of the 16th inst. relating to the selection of sites for military posts on the western frontier of Arkansas and Missouri.

Mr. Cambreleng presented a communication from the secretary of the treasury, stating the condition of the treasury on the 30th ult. by which it appears that the amount of available means was about 900,000 dollars, being, as Mr. C. stated, about 600,000 less than the amount stated in a previous communication from the secretary, of the 28d ult. Mr. C.'s object in submitting the communication, was to show the house the urgent necessity of a speedy action on the financial measure which had been reported by the committee of ways and means. The reduction of the revenue was owing exclusively to the premature redemption of the treasury notes authorized to be issued under the act of October last.

I transmit for the information of the committee of ways and means, the enclosed statement, marked A., showing the condition of the treasury on this day, as to its available resources.

I remain, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. C. C. Cambreleng,

A number of resolutions of enquiry were offered, after which the house resumed the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of a motion to recommit the consideration of the report of the select committee on the late duel, with instructions to report only the facts of the case, and discharging them from the consideration of the question of a breach of privilege, and from the various petitions in relation to the subject.

The immediate question was on a motion of Mr. Duncan to amend the instructions by striking out the words "a paper purporting to be the," [report of the committee,] which he considered as reflecting on the committee.

Mr. Adams, (who had moved the instructions,) after some explanations justifying the use of those words, consented to withdraw them, and modified his motion accordingly. Mr. Reed complained of misrepresentation in the papers as though he had opposed the inquiry at the outset, though he had voted for it, and deprecating a similar misrepresentation of his vote in the present case as evincing a desire to suppress the testimony, which he disclaimed, and, on the contrary, avowed his desire that it should all appear, but at the proper time. Mr. Mercer demanded that the question on the instructions be divided, so as to take it first on the first part of them separately. He was in favor of the first part of the instructions, but opposed to the latter. Mr. Fletcher, of Vermont, moved an amendment to the instructions, which he withdrew on explanations from the chair.

After sundry questions and replies in relation to questions of order, and the effect of the instructions, Mr. Thomas expressed his hope that the house would clearly indicate its wish as to what the committee should do before it sent the report back, and, as a test of the opinion of the house on this head, moved to strike out the latter part of the instructions, which propose to discharge the committee from the question of a breach of privilege, &c. Mr. Elmore, expressed great satisfaction at this motion, as tending to relieve his mind from embarrassment. Mr. Petrikin demanded the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered. Mr. Adams opposed the motion, as tending rather to perplex the committee than to relieve it from embarrassment. Mr. May moved an adjournment, (on account of the thinness of the house.) On this motion, Mr. Whittlesey of Ohio, demanded the yeas nays. Mr. Rives suggested that, if the house should adjourn, the amendments, instructions, &c. might be printed, so that the house might more clearly understand them. The question was taken on adjournment, and decided in the negative: Yeas 7, nays 156. The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Thomas to strike out the latter part of the instructions, and decided by yeas and nays as follows: Yeas 96, nays 68.

So the house refused, in effect, to discharge the committee from further proceedings on the question of privilege. Mr. Rariden now moved an amendment, by way of substitute for Mr. Adams' proposition of amendment, that the committee re-arrange their journal, so as to show, in a connected series, the questions put, the answers given, and what questions were rejected. On this motion Mr. Toucey demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. Rariden consented to withdraw this amendment for the present, in order to offer it at a subsequent stage, after the question of recommitment should have been settled.

Mr. Mercer suggested to Mr. Rariden to amend his motion, when made, by adding to the instructions that the committee report a bill to prevent duelling in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Elmore stated that the senate bill on that subject had been considered in the committee, and amendments proposed to it, and was ready to be reported. Mr. Toucey said he had the bill on his table for the purpose of reporting it when in order. Mr. Adams commented with severity on the irregularity of the committee's proceedings, in not noticing this bill on their journal; which was the principal thing prayed for in the greater part of the memorials referred to them. Mr. A. then accepted Mr. Rariden's motion instructing the committee to re-arrange their journal, &c., with the addition proposed by Mr. Mercer, to instruct the committee to report a bill against duelling as a modification of his own motion. The question now, therefore, was on adopting this instruction.

Mr. Toucey defended the committee. Their journal applied only to the investigation of the causes and circumstances of the duel. This bill was a separate matter, and there was no propriety in mentioning it upon their journal. Mr. Elmore explained what the committee had done in relation to the senate's bill. Mr. Legare expressed his regret that Mr. Adams should have accepted the suggestion of Mr. Mercer; it only went to complicate the question, and to propose a measure which must be practically inefficient in suppressing the evil it aimed at. Mr. Thomas opposed the instructions as modified.

Mr. Bell then addressed the house, and was desirous of entering on the general subject of the regularity of the proceedings of the committee, and the power of the house in the premises; but, after many explanations touching the question of order, the chair persisted in the opinion that it was not in order in the debate on the motion for instructions, to go into those questions; and Mr. B. reserved his remarks for a future stage of debate.

Mr. Chambers spoke at length in support of the instructions, and in the course of his remarks glanced, with no little severity, at the manner in which evidence had been taken in the committee. The house, however, being nearly empty, (owing, as was understood, to the horse races on the neighboring course,) he moved an adjournment. He withdrew the motion, however, at the request of Mr. Sherrod Williams, who moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the house had rejected the latter branch of Mr. Adams' instructions, discharging the committee from the consideration of the question of breach of privilege, and from the memorials on the subject of the duel.

Mr. Boon suggesting that there was no quorum present: After some confusion, the chair counted the house, and reported that 105 members only were within the bar.

There being, therefore, no quorum—

Mr. Adams moved a call of the house. He observed that as the religious services of the day were probably nearly over, the house might expect those who had been attending upon them soon to return to the public business.

Mr. Chambers moved an adjournment.

On this motion Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, resulted as follows—Yeas 60, nays 68. A quorum thus appearing to be present—

Mr. Adams withdrew his motion; but, understanding that the question on reconsideration must be taken immediately, he renewed it. Mr. McKennan moved an adjournment; but withdrew the moon request of Mr. Toucey, who, by unanimous consent of the house, reported the senate's bill for the suppression of duelling within the District of Columbia, with amendments, and it was referred to committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed. Mr. Cambreleng addressed the house, making some inquiries about the motion to reconsider; when Mr. McKennan renewed his motion to adjourn. Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. McKennan withdrew his motion. Mr. Yell proposed that the present subject should be postponed until to-morrow; and that the house, meanwhile, take up the army bill. Mr. Graham moved an adjournment.

Mr. Yell demanded the yeas and nays; which were thereupon taken, and resulted in the affirmative—Yeas 78, nays 56. So the house, at three o'clock, adjourned.

Wednesday, May 2. By leave, Messrs. Petrikin and Williams, of New Hampshire, presented each a petition, which was, in each case, referred.

The unfinished business was then resumed. The question was that raised by Mr. S. Williams yesterday, to reconsider the vote whereby the instructions moved by Mr. Adams were, on motion of Mr. Thomas, stricken out from the motion to recommit.

Mr. Connor, of North Carolina, moved a call of the house. Ordered. One hundred and forty members answered to their names. The names of the absentees were then called; one hundred and seventy-five members were found to be present. A motion was then made to suspend further proceedings under the call. Mr. Wiss hoped a full bench of judges would be had before deciding this question.

The motion to suspend was lost. The doors were closed, and the names of the absentees were called over.

The members following were excused, for reasons given by gentlemen present:

Messrs. Bruyn, Buchanan, Bynum, Chaney, Evans, Fillmore, Grennell, Clowney, Garland, of Virginia, Jackson, of New York, Lincoln, Marvin, Mason, of Ohio, Maxwell, Palmer, S. W. Morris, Philips, Plummer, Potter, Rives, Sheffer, Snepior, Snyder, Toland, Thompson, Vail, Turney, J. L. Williams, and Whittlesey, of Con.

Pending the call, Mr. Davies, of Pennsylvania, moved to suspend all further proceedings.

Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays. Referred.

The motion of Mr. Davies was lost, and the call of absentees was proceeded in, and was nearly finished, when Mr. Reed moved to excuse all the absentees, as every kind of excuse seemed to be accepted. A successful motion was then made to suspend the call, and one hundred and eighty members were found to be present. The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. Tillinghast said he was opposed to the reconsideration. He believed the vote, striking out the second branch of the instructions, was given without misapprehension as to the effect. He was not himself under any misapprehension. He believed the second branch of the instruction to have been unnecessary, inasmuch as the object which appeared to be intended by it was fully attained by the first branch, which instructs the committee to report the evidence, journal, &c. only. A report, according to and under this instruction, will be a full performance of the duty originally imposed upon the committee as well in relation to the inquiry whether there has been a breach of privileges as to other facts. When they have taken and reported the evidence respecting a breach of privilege, according to the instructions of the house, they will have fulfilled the duty of inquiry as to that. But he also thought that the second branch, if retained, would be inconsistent with the real intention of the house. A part of the evidence which the house intends to instruct the committee to report would be evidence taken with a view to the inquiry as to breach of privilege. By discharging the committee from that branch of the inquiry, the authority for taking and reporting such evidence, and the foundation on which it rested, would be removed. He was against impairing the original resolutions appointing the committee. Therefore he had voted for striking out the second branch of them, and was against a reconsideration.

Mr. Mercer took the ground that the committee were functi officio now that they had reported on all the points referred to them; and would be bound only by any further instructions that might be given them.

Mr. Pope thought not. The report of the committee had not been yet received; and it was proposed to return their report to them. The original resolutions would therefore be in full force unless altered or rescinded.

Mr. McKennan said that it was his intention, when in order to present an amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which he hoped would challenge the approbation of a large majority of the house, and would put a termination to this protracted discussion. He asked that it might be read for information. It was as follows:

1. Resolved, That the report of the committee raised by the resolution of the 28th February, 1838, and the evidence and other papers which accompany said report, be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report nothing more than the evidence by them taken, and such part of the journal as will show the evidence which may have been offered by any party and excluded by the committee.

2. Resolved, That in consideration that this house has not heretofore proceeded against any one concerned in the numerous duels which have occurred on account of words spoken in debate, it may not appear just to pursue the parties implicated in this instance, until notice shall be given that this house designs to maintain its privileges in like cases; and that the omission in this instance to enforce the undoubted rights and duties of this house may not hereafter be considered as a precedent, it is hereby declared that the challenge of a member of this house for words spoken in debate is a violation of its privileges; and whenever hereafter any such breach of privilege shall be brought to the notice of the house by one of its members, it will, in the judgment of this house, be its duty to punish such offence.

3. Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution and memorials to them referred, except as ordered by the first resolution.

Mr. Adams, obtained the floor before the proposition was offered; and, after he closed his remarks, Mr. McKennan said that in giving notice of the amendment he wished to offer he had hoped that the house would be able to meet on some middle ground, and put an end to this unpleasant affair in a satisfactory manner without further discussion, and without doing injustice. He had not the slightest wish to embarrass the proceeding, or to widen the door of discussion. The subject on the preliminary question had been, he thought, discussed long enough in all conscience, and he did not want to protract it. The gentleman from Massachusetts, and others, seemed to think that his proposition, if offered, would open the subject to debate in all its bearings, and its widest range; and, as it was not his wish to embarrass or to delay the action of the house, he would not, at this time, persist in offering his amendment.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. Adams to recommit the report with instructions. The debate was continued by Messrs. Adams, Thomas, and Boon, (whose observations will be given hereafter.) Mr. Murray moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Mr. Polts demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the motion to lay on the table was negatived by the following vote: Yeas 47, nays 124. The question then recurred on Mr. Sherrod Williams' motion to reconsider the vote on striking out part of the proposed instructions; and the debate was further continued by Mr. Elmore, (whose remarks will be given hereafter.) The question on the motion to reconsider was decided as follows: Yeas 82, nays 90.

So, the house refused to reconsider; and the question recurred upon striking out the other part of the instructions, viz. to arrange the journal, and to report without comments or arguments. Which proposition was negatived by the following vote: Yeas 82, nays 93. The question recurred upon the motion to recommit with instructions. Mr. Fletcher, of Vt., renewed his motion of yesterday, as an amendment, with regard to the reference of the petitions and memorials on the subject of the late duel to the select committee; and on this he asked the yeas and nays. Ordered. Mr. F. moved an amendment, referring, also, to the committee all the petitions upon the subject of the late duel, with instructions to report thereon. Mr. Slade moved an amendment to this amendment, which did not prevail. After some remarks in favor of his amendment, and in opposition thereto, by Messrs. Adams and Slade, the amendment was decided as follows—Yeas 89, nays 86. So the amendment of Mr. Fletcher was adopted. Mr. Loomis moved an amendment, the effect of which is to give to the committee instructions to report arguments and comments on the breach of privilege. This motion was discussed by Messrs. Loomis, Naylor, and Legare. Mr. Fairfield called for and obtained the yeas and nays on the amendment.—Mr. Legare, alluding to the thinness of the house, and the attempt now made to reverse its former action, in the known absence of many of its members, moved an adjournment. Mr. Cambreleng demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house refused to adjourn, (at 4 o'clock,) by a vote of 88 yeas to 97 nays.

Mr. Reed moved to amend Mr. L.'s amendment so far as to instruct the committee to report specially, if any member shall prove to be involved, without proceeding against him. This proposition was debated by Mr. Reed, and then Mr. Mallory, moved an adjournment. Mr. Grant demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house refused to adjourn, (at half past 4 o'clock,) by a vote of 88 yeas to 88 nays. The chair voted in the negative. Mr. Sherrod Williams moved a call of the house; and on that motion,

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, moved the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Russell moved that the house adjourn; and on that motion,

Mr. Hoffman demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house refused to adjourn, (at 5 o'clock,) by a vote of 88 yeas to 97 nays.

The vote upon the motion of Mr. Sherrod Williams, that there be a call of the house, was decided in the negative, by a vote of 74 yeas to 99 nays. Mr. Mitchell moved that the house adjourn; which motion (at 20 minutes past 5 o'clock) prevailed.

And the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 3. Mr. Bell asked leave to move that, when the house adjourn to-day it adjourn to Monday, and stated that that space of time would be required to cleanse the hall, take up the carpets, and put the house upon the usual summer establishment.

Objection being made, he moved a suspension of the rules to allow him to make this motion.

Mr. Montgomery demanded the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them, and the rules were suspended by a vote of more than the necessary two-thirds of the members present.

The motion for an adjournment over having been made, Mr. Cambreleng said he was reluctant to oppose it, and would not do so if it should be passed with the express understanding that the house on Monday would take up the public business.

Mr. Wise gave notice to all the house that he would consent to no such pledge, express or implied; and if the house passed from the consideration of the business immediately before it for any purpose whatever, it would be without his consent.

The adjournment over to Monday was agreed to.

Mr. Bell then moved that the house adjourn, but withdrew his motion at the request of

The Speaker who laid before the house the following executive communications:

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the house of representatives a report from the secretary of state, in answer to that part of their resolution of the 19th ultimo requesting the communication of all correspondence with any foreign government in regard to the title or occupation of the territory of the United States beyond the Rocky mountains.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, April 30, 1838.

Mr. Cushing moved that the consideration of this message be postponed until this day week, and that it be printed. Agreed to.

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report and accompanying documents from the acting secretary of war, which contains the information required by the resolution of the 16th ult., respecting the officers of the corps of engineers, the works upon which they were engaged during the last year, and the other matters embraced in the resolution.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, May 1, 1838.

This message was laid on the table.

To the house of representatives of the United States:

The report of the secretary of state, transmitted by me to the house of representatives, in compliance with their resolution of the 16th ultimo, respecting an attack alleged to have been made by a Mexican armed vessel upon an American steamboat, having stated that no information on the subject had at that time reached the department, I now transmit another report from the same officer, communicating a copy of a note from the Mexican minister, with an accompanying document, in reference to the act alluded to, which have been received at the department since the date of the former report.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, May 2, 1838.

MR. MARTINEZ TO MR. FORSYTH.

[TRANSLATION.]

To the hon. JOHN FORSYTH,

Secretary of the state of the United States.

Mexican Legation, New Orleans, April 20, 1838.

SIR: Whilst the notices of an insult pretended to have been committed against the flag of the United States in the waters of Texas, by the Mexican brig of war Inturbide, were confined to the public newspapers, and I had no documents by means of which I could repel the calumny, I abstained from addressing you on the subject. But as, according to the papers, the attention of the honorable chamber of senators of the congress of the union has been directed towards the charges published against Mexico, by the passengers of the steamboat Columbia, and I am in possession of an official statement from the commander of the said brig, relating to the occurrence with the said boat, I have the honor to send you, sir, the annexed extract from that document, with the hope that you will submit it to the notice of his excellency the president. The captain of the Columbia, and the captain of the Iturbide, as will be here seen, provoked the attack to which this note refers, and the former should, therefore, be responsible for the result, whatever it may be.

Permit me, sir, to repeat to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

FRANCISCO PIZARRO MARTINEZ.

[Translation of the enclosure.]

Extract from the official communication of the commander of the Mexican brig of war Iturbide, respecting her encounter with the steamboat Columbia:

To the COMMANDANT GENERAL of the Mexican squadron.

Brig Iturbide, under sail in lat. 29 deg. 6 min., long. 83 deg. 48 min. west of Cadiz, 5 o'clock in the afternoon of this day, March 24, 1838.

At the moment when you, sir, announced, by your signals, that you saw sails in the third quarter, I made out the vessel to be a steamboat, coming from the north; and I discovered that she was not the same to which we had given chase this morning, and which was, apparently on her way to Brazoria, as this boat has two chimneys, and the other only one. As soon as you gave the signal for chase with all speed, and without our closing, (? sin sujecion a formacion.) I endeavored, by a press of sail, to cut her off, steering southeast, clearing away to be ready for action, and taking the other precautions; but, on seeing that she was bearing down on my starboard bow, I ordered all my men to take their proper fire and cutting arms, to be ready for an attempt to board. While we were thus sailing towards each other, as you saw, our distance was necessarily becoming less; and seeing that her stern flag was that of the United States, I hoisted mine with a pendant, and fired a gun without ball. I clewed up my mainsail, in order that she should stop her engine for me to examine her; but this was not done; and as, on the contrary, her movements towards me were very suspicious, I ordered another gun to be fired, with ball, in a direction very wide of the steamboat; which was done as a notice for her to stop. Instead of doing so, however, she continued on her course, as if with a view of getting past me to leeward. When I got within speaking distance, I hailed her three times, with a trumpet, and she did not deign to give any reply to either call. On the fourth call, an individual answered, loading me with abuse, and telling me, that if I wanted to see his papers, I should come on board his boat. All this was spoken without the speaking-trumpet; and, although he was called on to stop, in order that his papers and his boat should be visited, he did not do so; but, on the other hand, continued to insult my political insignia by the grossest obscenities and language.

In consequence of these proceedings, I fired two cannon, and three muskets, not aimed at the steamer, for the purpose of intimidating her, but that she should do as required. She, however, took no notice of it, but continued on her way, letting off her steam, which was very high, so near me that the ashes and some warm water fell on board my vessel.—God and liberty!

This message was referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

The Speaker also laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, transmitting a report from the second auditor of accounts of persons charged with the disbursement of money, goods, &c. for the benefit of the Indians for the year ending September 30, 1837. Laid on the table.

The bill from the senate, to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the states of Arkansas and Missouri, was read twice, and referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

The bill from the senate, to grant to the state and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals the right of way through the public lands of the United States, was twice read, and referred to the committee on public lands.

Mr. J. Q. Adams, from the committee on manufactures, to which was referred the bill from the senate to refund to the Georgia railroad and banking company certain duties paid upon railroad iron, reported the bill to the house without amendment. It was then committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. J. L. Williams presented a petition.

Mr. Bell then renewed his motion; the house refused the yeas and nays, and it was carried, whereupon, the house adjourned to Monday.

AWFUL FIRE IN CHARLESTON!

OFFICE OF THE AUGUSTA CHRONICLE, }
April 28, 6 o'clock, P. M. }

We learn with the deepest regret, by passengers from Charleston, who arrived here this evening by the Carolina railroad, that the city of Charleston has been visited by one of the most awful and destructive fires that has ever visited any city in the United States. One third of the city was laid in ashes at the departure of the cars this morning at six o'clock, and the fire was raging as if it would consume at least one-third more.

The fire broke out last night at a quarter past eight o'clock, in a paint store, on the western side of King street, corner of Beresford street. The wind blowing strongly from the southwest, blew the flames diagonally across King street, and at the time of the departure of the cars the whole section of the city above Beresford street, up to society street, and east of King street, to the bay, was burnt down or burning. From Beresford to Society are four streets—from King street to the bay about as many, or perhaps more. The fire had also extended four or five blocks west of King street, and was still progressing with terrific rapidity up that street in the direction of Boundary street, when the cars left. Our informant believes it impossible to calculate what will be the ultimate extent of the fire, as it seemed in no way checked at 6 o'clock this morning.

Among the buildings consumed are a number of churches, the new theatre, the splendid new hotel recently erected, and the whole market, except the fish market. Nearly all the large merchants, in the centre of business, on King street, were burnt out, among them, Parish, Wiley & Co., G. H. Kelsey & Co., Boream & Co., and all in that neighborhood, and the large storehouse of Miller, Ripley, & Co. on the corner of King and Society streets, was catching the flames when our informant left. The Merchants' hotel, formerly Miot's, had not caught, but it was believed to be impossible to save it. At Norris' hotel, still higher up King street, and on the west side, they had removed all the furniture and bedding, in almost certain anticipation of being burnt out.

A large number of houses had been blown up, to no purpose. All the powder in the city was exhausted, and all the water in the pumps: the people, wearied with a whole night's incessant and unavailing toil, found themselves, this morning, able to make but a feeble resistance to the still raging and devouring flames. A number of persons had been killed by the blowing up of houses and throwing furniture into the streets. The steamboat Neptune, lying in the bay, caught on fire, but it was fortunately extinguished.

The trunks directed to this office and to the constitutionalist office, from the newspaper offices in Charleston, failed to come this evening, as we presume no papers were printed there last night; and as the regular mail was closed last night before the fire broke out, no other information has been received here than that from passengers, which is necessarily limited as to particulars.

This is indeed a mournful catastrophe! A flourishing city laid in ashes, her people burnt out of home and substance, and millions of property destroyed in a single night! The insurance companies of Charleston, we learn, are of small capitals, and will every one, no doubt, be ruined, and still be unable to make good but a small portion of the losses. Hundreds of families must be utterly ruined by this general calamity. Years cannot make Charleston what she was.

P. S. Since the above was written, we have been shown a letter from Charleston, closed a little before 4 o'clock this morning, and brought up by a passenger, which confirms all the important facts stated above. It also states that the rigging of many of the vessels lying at the wharves had been burnt.

LATER. It appears from slips received from the offices of the Charleston Courier and Patriot, which fortunately escaped destruction, that the fire began about nine o'clock on the night of Friday, April 27th, and was not checked until about noon on the next day, having raged with great fury for fifteen hours.

The number of houses burnt is stated in these slips (which come down to 5 o'clock on Saturday) at one thousand. We add a few of the particulars from the necessarily hurried statements which they contain:

"The whole area, with the exception of a few houses from St. Philip street to the waters of Cooper river, bounded by Hasell and Society streets, is swept through, as by an avalanche, leaving nothing but bare and blackened chimneys.

"The fire was arrested in all quarters about 12 o'clock M. having burnt for 15 hours unremittingly."

AWFUL STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT.

It becomes again our painful duty to record one of the most awful and destructive occurrences known in the terrible and fatal catalogue of steamboat disasters.

This afternoon about six o'clock, the new and elegant steamboat Moselle, captain Perkin, left the wharf of this city—full of passengers—for Louisville and St. Louis, with a view of taking a family on board at Fulton, about a mile and a half above the quay, proceeded up the river, and made fast to a lumber raft for that purpose. Here the family was taken on board, and during the whole time of the detention, the captain was holding on to all the steam that he could create, with an intention of showing off to the best advantage the great speed of the boat as she passed down the whole length of the city. The Moselle was a new brag boat, and had recently made several exceedingly quick trips to and from this place.

Soon as the family were taken on board from the raft, the boat shoved off, and at the very moment her wheels made the first revolution, her boilers burst with a most awful and astounding noise equal to the most violent clap of thunder. The explosion was destructive and heart-rending in the extreme, as we are assured by a gentleman, who was sitting on his horse on the shore, waiting to see the boat start. Heads, limbs, bodies and blood, was seen flying through the air in every direction, attended by the most horrible shrieks and groans from the wounded and the dying. The boat, at the moment of the accident, was about thirty feet from the shore, and was rendered a perfect wreck. She seemed to be torn all to flinders as far back as the gentlemen's cabin, and her hurricane deck (the whole length) was entirely swept away. The boat immediately began to sink rapidly and float, with a strong current down the river, at the same time getting farther from the shore.

The captain was thrown by the explosion entirely into the street, and was picked up dead and dreadfully mangled. Another man was thrown entirely through the roof of one of the neighboring houses, and limbs and fragments of bodies scattered about the river and shore in heart-rending profusion. Soon as the boat was discovered to be rapidly sinking, the passengers who remained unhurt in the gentlemen's and ladies' cabins, became panic struck, and with a fatuity unaccountable jumped into the river. Being above the ordinary business parts of the city, there were no boats at hand except a few large and unmanageable wood flats, which were carried to the relief of the sufferers as soon as possible, by the few persons on the shore. Many were drowned, however, before they could be rescued from a watery grave, and many sunk who were not seen afterward.

We are told that one little boy on shore was seen wringing his hands in agony, imploring those present to save his father, mother, and three sisters, all of whom were struggling in the water to gain the shore, but whom the little fellow had the misfortune to see perish one by one almost within his reach. An infant child belonging to this family, was picked up alive, floating down the river on one of the fragments of the hurricane deck.

Dr. Wilson Hughey, of the U. S. army, and brother-in-law to our estimable fellow-citizen, William P. Hughes, of the Pearl street house, is doubtless among the slain, as he was known to have been on board, and some pieces of the military coat he had on were picked up among the fragments.

Mr. Powell, a highly respectable grocery merchant, of Louisville, and brother-in-law of Mr. Wilson McGrew, of this city, is also supposed to be lost, as he was on board, and no tidings have since been heard of him, notwithstanding the active inquiries of his friends.

We are unable, as yet, to particularize any other person lost, as the boat sunk in about fifteen minutes after the accident, leaving nothing to be seen but her chimneys and a small portion of her upper works, and also as a scene of distress and confusion immediately ensued that altogether baffles description. Most of the sufferers are among the hands of the boat, and the steerage passengers.

It is supposed that there were about two hundred persons on board, of which number only from fifty to seventy-five are believed to have escaped, making the estimate loss of lives about one hundred and twenty-five!! O, tale of woe!

The accident unquestionably occurred through sheer imprudence and carelessness. The captain of the boat was desirous of showing off her great speed as she passed the city, and to overtake and pass another boat which had left the wharf for Louisville a short time before him. Dearly has he paid for his silly ambition. The clerk of the boat, we understand, escaped unhurt. These are all the particulars we have yet been able to learn. In to-morrow's Whig we shall no doubt be able to give the names of many others who have been lost or killed.

✱ The Mexican ports have been declared to be under blockade by the commander of the French fleet on that coast, in consequence of the refusal of the Mexican government to pay the indemnity under the late treaty. See page 163.

✱ In page 175 we have inserted a communication from the secretary of the treasury exhibiting the condition of his department, which requires immediate aid to enable it to preserve the public credit.

Mr. ALEXANDRE DE BODISCOE was presented to the president by the secretary of state on Saturday last, the 5th inst., as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the emperor of Russia.

DON ANGEL CALDERON DE LAS BARCA, whose functions as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the queen of Spain to the United States were temporarily interrupted, has returned to discharge the duties of that station at the seat of government.

DEATH OF MR. LAWLER OF ALABAMA. It is our painful duty to notice the death of another member of congress. The hon. JOAB LAWLER, of Ala., died at his lodgings in this city on Monday morning last, after a few days illness, of bilious pleurisy. He was one of the most estimable and amiable men that ever sat within the walls of the capitol, and commanded the respect and esteem of all who knew him. Modest and unassuming, yet conscientious and firm, he discharged his public duties with patriotic devotion and enlightened zeal, and in private life his actions were marked by strict integrity and honor. He richly merited the confidence of his constituents, who, with his associates in congress, will long lament his loss. He was buried on Wednesday last with the usual honors, for an account of which see a subsequent page.

NEW YORK COMMON COUNCIL. The new boards of aldermen were organized on Tuesday. Alderman Benson (whig) was elected president of the board of aldermen, by a vote of 9 to 8, and Caleb S. Woodhull (Whig) president of the board of assistants by a similar vote.

VIRGINIA. There is still some doubt about the result in Mr. Patton's district. It is now reported that Mr. Banks received a majority of votes, but that the certificate was given to Mr. Slaughter in consequence of the informal manner in which the election was held in one of the counties. Mr. Slaughter, it is said, will not take his seat, but refer the matter to the people for another trial.

The most recent intelligence as to the result of the delegate election is contained in the following from the "Richmond Enquirer" of yesterday.

"The whigs have carried 69 delegates, and the friends of the administration 56—and I (the delegate of Morgan) unknown. From the 55 deduct the delegate of King George, who has resigned, and the heat is to be tried over again—and it leaves the republicans 55 delegates.

The following counties are yet to be heard from—which were represented as follows in the last session:

Whig.	Van Buren.
Braxton and Lewis,	Lee,
Fayette and Nicholas,	Logan,
Henry—3	Patrick,
	Prinston,
	Randolph—5.

The whigs may carry Patrick and Randolph—with out these, they will have 72 to 60—12 majority—with them, it will stand 74 to 53—and 2 yet to be ascer tained, viz: the delegate from Morgan, and the election of King George to be run over again.

We have a majority of twelve in the senate. If the whigs gain no more, and if we allow one for Morgan and Stafford to each party, the joint vote will be tied. If they gain both Patrick and Randolph, they will have a majority of four on joint vote."

MISSISSIPPI. Returns from 25 counties, give the following vote: Prentiss, (whig.) 9,973; Word, (whig.) 9,686; Claiborne, (administration) 8,002; Davis, (ad ministration) 7,083. Twenty-one counties remain to be heard from, which will make the whig majority for the state about 2,000.

TEXAS. The following resolution has been reported by the committee on foreign affairs to the senate of Texas. It was ordered to lie on the table, but an opinion is expressed that it will pass that body.

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representa tions of the republic of Texas in congress assembled, That the president be, and he is hereby instructed, to cause the proposition heretofore made by this government to the government of the United States, for the annexa tion of Texas, to be respectfully and unconditionally withdrawn, and thus in the most decisive manner, re fer the people of Texas, for all the future good they may hope to receive or enjoy, of social security, to their own independent and manly energies.

The New Orleans Bulletin of the 1st instant states that despatches had been received by the collector of that port from the American charge d' affaires at Houston, to be forwarded with all haste to Washing ton. An endorsement described them as important documents containing a convention with Texas, which it was presumed was to be submitted for ratification to the government of the United States.

BANKS, CURRENCY &c. The New York Express of Wednesday contains the following, which develops some facts which may interest our readers:

Money market—city news. Tuesday, P. M. The movements in specie in this country and in London, are attracting a good deal of attention,—and so close do the great operators now keep their affairs, that it is difficult to understand the whys and wherefores of all we see. It is very clear, however, that there has been a quarrel between the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States, and the Bank of England, or the Bar ings, who are, as it were, the American agents of that institution. The cause of that quarrel, we have already stated, originated in the jealousy with which Mr. Jaudon's doings in London were watched; secondly, but primarily, in the refusal of the Barings, when pan ic-stricken, as was the Bank of England in September, 1836, to keep their agreements with Mr. Biddle, as to the amount in which he should be permitted to draw upon them. In consequence of this panic, Mr. Biddle fully concluded it was wiser for him to take his Lon don business in his own hands, and for this purpose, the mission of Mr. Jaudon, as we understand it, was created.

Mr. Jaudon, we all know, was very coldly received by the Barings. The Bank of England refused to keep an account with him, and he was tabooed for a while. He very quietly, however, worked his way, and surprised every body, after a while, by a great operation in which he underbid the Bank of England, as before stated in this paper. Backed by the immense cotton batteries Mr. Biddle was sending him, and having principal control over that great staple, he had not much to fear even from the Bank of England, cotton being better than bank paper, and quite as serviceable as specie. In this condition of things, the Barings, for the Bank of England, through a house in this city, contracted to send here some millions sterling in specie, a part of which has come, and only a part, the order for the ex portation of more having been suspended, as we learn by the Wellington packet ship, even at the sacrifice of about $75,000 insurance on one stock.

Inquiry now arises, on what tack are we? "What is in the wind." One million, nine hundred thousand dollars, principally in gold, this morning went to Phila delphia in the 6 o'clock steamboat, to the Pennsylvania U. S. Bank. This is not from our banks, and it may be in part from the consignment, to Prime, Ward and King, the Barings have sent out from the Bank of England. What has caused this movement, and change of policy, it is not so easy to divine, though conjecture is active. The London Morning Chronicle, however, tells us, the Bank of England has made peace with Mr. Biddle, and here we have a clue. The same journal insinuates that the Bank of England was weary of the war.

Rumor says Mr. Jaudon was doing a thirty day business on good paper in London even as low as 2 per cent. per annum; and such were his operations even, that the Bank of England suffered considerably. —Mr. Jaudon's measures even affecting their line of discounts. Rumor again says, Mr. Jaudon was about to make a sweep of specie upon the bank for a very large sum, which the bank did not care to lose after its consignments already to New York. How true may be these rumors we cannot pretend to say, but it is quite certain the belligerent parties are ap parently reconciled, and the consequences of the peace, we probably see, in the new movements of the specie.

In connection with this subject, we see also that the Bank of England has forfeited about $75,000 insurance on specie, rather than export it. The insurance being one per cent., the amount intended to be shipped must have been about seven and a half millions. This change of policy could not have arisen from any fear of a drain of gold and silver, for we learn by the monthly official return of the quarterly average of the weekly liabilities and assets of the bank for the three months ending the 3d of April, that, as compared with the last report, there is an increase in the circulation of 237,000, the difference between 18,600,000, and 18,837,000; a decrease in the deposits of 273,000, the balance between 11,535,000, and 11,262,000; an in crease in the securities of 46,000, the excess of 22,838,000, over 22,792,000; and an increase in the stock of bullion of 111,000, the difference between 10,105,000, and 10,126,000; all this in the face of the exporta tions to New York—the importations from the con tinent filling all the vacuum.

What then caused the change. It probably was in part, that the business was like to turn out less profit ably than was expected—but in fact, that all thinking men must see that if Great Britain was to buy our cotton, rice, and tobacco, and stocks, in gold and sil ver, it was a business poor at best for them, and the staples and the stocks must fail to pay the forfeit there. The cotton market in Liverpool, we have reason to believe, has been sustained alone by the irresistible energies of Mr. Biddle. His stock has been immense, and he would not submit to the sacrifice, and he was not compelled to submit forthwith. However, to sus tain the market forever, specie going out all the while, was a thing impossible. The cotton market began to droop. This effort of his with the Bank of England, this reconciliation, may have been to save it; and it may be that it will be kept stationary, the orders being countermanded for the exportation of specie—for there is no law of political economy more sound than that which compels the products of a country to submit to sacrifices when it demands in exchange for them the precious metals, and not labor and skill.

Of the wisdom of Mr. Biddle's policy in waiting for another crop before the resumption of specie payments, when all the banks of all the states could resume at once, we have never had a doubt. Of the admirable manner in which he has carried through the storm every solvent merchant of his own city, all Philadel phia speaks with pride and exalted satisfaction, as it contrasts its own condition with the mischievous rash ness, by a violent contraction of the currency, has in flicted here. But as New Yorkers, we were compell ed to resume—crop or no crop. The law and the bond were before us—and "the laws of Venice," we were told, must be carried out.

We may brag as much as we please, but none but the capitalist can cry "land ho!" till the south, south west, and west, resume with us. There is no land ho! in this city yet for the laboring man; none for the mas ter mechanic—none for the dry goods merchant, or merchants who deal with distant states; and thus while the capitalist may be on his land, the great mass of the people are yet thrashing about in the bog. They can begin to cry land ho! when the states resume; then, and not till then. But the first real land, the undoubted terra firma, will be when we go back on the back track, just where George Washington and James Madison piloted us, whence the experiment enticed us away.

Among the other curious movements of the times, is a petition now in circulation in this city, soliciting Mr. Biddle to establish a branch of his bank, or a bank, in this city, under a general banking law. Politically and commercially speaking, this is one of the phenomena of the day! To say the least, after all the hard hits he has here, and the way we have legislated him out of our domain, the spectacle of his coming thus back would be a curious one. But mercantile men have the greatest confidence in his foresight and sagacity.—Whatever be the differences of opinion about this po licy as a Pennsylvanian, there is none of his skill as a financier for the section of country he works in. The stock of his bank is lively to-day, as well it may be—for with this last importation of specie, he has about five millions in specie. [New York Express.

New York, May 10. A small improvement in the rates of Domestic exchange, has taken place on the following cities, within the last few days; on other places the rates continue the same. We now quote: drafts on Baltimore, at 3 1-2 a 4; Richmond, 5 a 6; Charleston, 5 a 7; Cincinnati, 8 a 9, and on Michigan generally 10 a 15 per cent. discount. The discount on Philadelphia and United States bills advanced 1-4 per cent yesterday, say to 4 per cent. This advance how ever, will not, it is likely, become established.

Mammoth bank. It is estimated in the New York Commercial Advertiser that since the passage of the general banking law of that state, "the leading capi talists of the city have been engaged in frequent and anxious consultations with a view of constitu ting such a bank as New York wants and must have." The editors state that the preliminaries have been ad justed, and the scheme will go into operation, and they add:

"We shall have a bank of forty or fifty millions—a bank that will take the lead of the union—and which, in the absence of a national bank, will be the next best engine of currency to such an institution.—With such a bank New York will soon again resume her onward career as the commercial queen of the west; the clouds yet hanging over her prosperity will be dis pelled, and her proud pre-eminence will be sustained"

From the New York Journal of Commerce.
THE GREAT WESTERN.

Lieutenant Hoskin, commander of the "Great Western" steam ship, and Richard Irvin, esquire, agent for the company, gave a liberal entertainment yesterday to the corporation, and a great number of other guests on board their floating palace. The ship was anchored in the East river near Judd's wharf, and the guests were again indebted to the courtesy of captain Stringham for the use of the fleet of navy yard barges. The whole ship is an object of admiration; but the two parts which attract particular attention, are the engine room and the cabin. The machinery all works under deck, and is so placed that persons walk in the midst of it, and see its operations most fully. Its massiveness and appearance of herculean strength are the first things which catch the attention, and next the perfection of the workmanship displayed in its construction. The cabin is like the drawing room of a lord, possessing so many objects to notice, that description would be sufficient, of itself, for an article.

But to the collation. After the company had in some degree satisfied their appetites with the provisions around them, alderman Hoxie called their attention while he gave the toast—

"Victoria Regina—the dominion of youth and beauty now extends around the world."

Mr. Buchanan, her Britannic majesty's consul said he felt most grateful and most happy at the cordial manner in which the sentiment had been received, and he knew that the queen herself would be delighted to witness this scene. He gave "The president of the United States, and the country over which he presides."

Lieut. Hoskin gave "The mayor and city of New York;" and he took occasion to express his acknowledgments for the unexpected attentions with which the arrival of his ship had been noticed. He also thanked capt. Stringham, and the officers of the American navy, for their great attentions; and as an officer of the British navy himself, on half pay, he hoped the officers of the two nations might never come into any other than friendly collision.

Captain Stringham said that he trusted American officers would ever be found ready to respond to that friendly sentiment in sincerity and truth.

By president Duer, of Columbia college: "The Great Western, and her junction with the Great Eastern."

The British consul alluded to the very little time which was now necessary to pass from the rivers of England to the sources of the great Mississippi—only three or four weeks. He spoke of Michigan and gave a toast to her and her chief magistrate who was sitting near.

Governor Mason said he did not flatter himself that he could say any thing that would compensate the company for the suspension of their festivities, but he should do injustice to himself and his state, if he failed to reciprocate, most heartily, the kind expressions of the representative, on this occasion, of England's queen. Some circumstances had transpired not long ago, in his neighborhood, which had, for a short time, produced some irritation. But he trusted those events would be found to have produced only a slight ruffle on the surface, and would never disturb the deep current of mutual friendship between the two nations. He gave "Old England—Honor to her just achievements in every field of fame."

The health of Mr. Webster was given by lieut. Hoskins, and was received with great cheering. Mr. Webster expressed his gratitude to lieut. Hoskin for the pleasure of visiting his splendid vessel. It is our fortune, said Mr. W., to live at a new epoch. We behold two continents approaching each other. The skill of your countrymen, sir, and my countrymen, is annihilating space. Born on opposite sides of the earth, we are here together, though you left home but yesterday. We are glad to see you. We are glad of any means by which the intercourse may be facilitated between the country which is the centre of the commercial nations of the earth, and this, which is the commercial country of the west. Mr. Webster made some remarks on the prospective benefits to arise from the developments of the powers of steam, but soon sat down, as he was oppressed by a severe cold.

Mr. Bradish, speaker of the assembly, on his health being drank, made a short, but eloquent speech. So did H. Maxwell, esq. of this city. We are unable, from want of time, to give even a sketch of their remarks.

One of the most interesting circumstances of the occasion, and the only one which produced any feelings but those of congratulation, was the presence of John Ridge, one of the principal chiefs of the Cherokees. While the mutual congratulations, and pledges of friendship were going on between the citizens of two great nations, on opposite sides of the Atlantic, the presence of Ridge must have raised in the minds of all Americans a consciousness that the treatment of our nation towards the defenceless natives on this continent was marked and dishonorable contrast with our professions. Both nations might well indeed stop their professions, and hide their heads, at any occurrence which should bring to remembrance the cruelty with which they have sacrificed all the rights of feeble nations. Mr. Tallmadge, alderman elect for the ninth ward, gave the "health of John Ridge, one of the principal chiefs of the Cherokee nation."

Mr. Ridge then rose and made a speech which occupied ten minutes, and which was certainly one of the most sensible and eloquent speeches of the day. He said there was one way, and but one, to subdue the natives of the forest, and that was by friendship. That, sooner than submit to any other subjugation, his nation would fly to the proudest peaks of the Rocky Mountains, and there breathe the air of liberty.

One of the founders of the original packet lines from the city of New York being mentioned, Mr. Isaac Bell rose and said he was the only survivor of all the men who established either the Liverpool or Havre lines.

The company were on board nearly three hours, and came away highly gratified. To-day the ladies are invited.

Departure of the Great Western. The steam packet Great Western sailed from New York on Monday last. The event created a great sensation in that city, and was witnessed by thousands of citizens who thronged the wharves, steamboats, &c. The following brief, but graphic account, is from the New York American of Tuesday.

Yesterday was a jubilee for New York. After a dreary easterly storm, the waters of our bay, ruffled by a fresh westerly breeze and dancing in the bright sunlight, were animated by one of those striking spectacles which they alone can furnish forth. A fleet of twelve steamboats, numerous sail vessels, and rowboats, assembled to witness the departure of the great trans-Atlantic steamer; while a vast proportion of the population of a great city was poured out upon the battery and the piers, and loaded, absolutely loaded, on board the conveying steamboats.

About one o'clock, Broadway was thronged with carriages and pedestrians, in a steady and unreturning stream towards the battery; and, when two o'clock, the hour of departure of the Great Western, had arrived, there seemed not a foot of ground on or around the battery unoccupied by a human being.

Punctually at the hour, the noble ship dressed out in colours, put off from the pier, and swept up the north river; the Providence, the New York, the Vanderbilt, the Highlander, the American Eagle, the Sun, the Arrow, the Brooklyn, the Hoboken, and several other steamboats, all decorated with colors, and many having on board bands of music, put out from different wharves, and circling around, formed for those on shore a beautiful coup d'œil, while, in turn, the living pyramids at Castle Garden, and the sea of human faces presented by a glance at the receding land, gave back a not less striking picture to those afloat.

When the Great Western turned her head seaward, and put herself seriously to the work, she astonished all by her speed—keeping way with the fastest boats, and putting those not so fast, and very deeply laden with passengers, to their best efforts. It is true they were contending against many difficulties, their unusual freight, and the impossibility of preserving an even keel, the passengers naturally thronging the side toward the Great Western, proved serious obstacles to their rapid progress.

The whole squadron flew down the bay, a New Jersey pilot boat under all sail, with a glorious breeze keeping headway with them, until abreast of the Narrows, when the Great Western stopped her wheels, and the Providence ran along side to take off the returning passengers. While this was in progress, and from the number, it necessarily occupied some time, the other boats all gathered close around her, like a convoy around the admiral; and while thus grouped, a fine ship, the Christopher Colon, from the Havana, came in from sea, all sails set, and added not a little to the picture by rounding to, as she passed, to permit her way-farers to admire the unwonted pageant.

Having surrendered up those who were mere amateurs, the Great Western again got under way, and put forth with buoyant speed and high hope upon her long and pathless voyage, cheered, certainly, by as hearty and unanimous good wishes as ever accompanied adventurous voyagers.

It was a proud day in New York, and duly celebrated. It is the beginning, indeed, of a new era for our whole country, for while for all purposes of safe political, and national isolation, the great ocean yet flows between us and the old world, for all the purposes of social communication, of rapid and civilizing commercial intercourse, of the progress of mind, of strengthening and expanding mutual respect and affection, it may almost be said to be annihilated.

The Great Western carries out more than seventy cabin passengers.

We are informed that the Marine insurance companies have resolved to take risks in the first class steamers at the rates charged for packet ships.

The following addenda are from the Commercial Advertiser:

Among the smaller articles of freight which the Western carries out, is one which will be a novelty in England. It is a beautiful bouquet of flowers, culled from Mr. Thorburn's garden at Hallett's cove, and is intended for the queen. It was enclosed in a tin case, hermetically sealed with a plate glass cover. It was prepared at the suggestion of lieut. Carpenter, and so prepared that it is hoped it will be preserved with freshness to be presented next week to the queen, at Windsor castle. It will be the first nosegay which her majesty ever received from the gardens of her western neighbors.

Thus has ended the first visit of Mr. John Bull in his steamers—and a proud visit it has been. He has shown us specimens of his workmanship in the steaming line, vieing with—nay, surpassing, any machinery of the kind ever seen in this country. A single glance at this ponderous machinery, and the perfection of the workmanship, at once satisfies the beholder of its strength and safety. And the moment the machinery begins to move, the opinion is confirmed. Notwithstanding its power, not a jar is heard; and those accustomed to the clacking of the machinery of American boats, and the jarring of every stroke, would be astonished on board the Great Western, at the silence and stillness of the motion. While at table yesterday, at a speed which kept ahead of our swiftest boats, the passengers supposed the ship had stopped, because of its entire stillness.

It is estimated in the N. Y. Express that the Great Western carried out 20,000 letters. The steamer sailed so late that letters were taken in until nearly 2 P. M. A large amount of bills were purchased in the forenoon and despatched by this vessel. Bills on London sold at 106 1-4 a 106 1-2, which is about the rate they stood at.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The packet ship United States, at New York, sailed from Liverpool on the 9th April, and brings London papers to the 8th inclusive.

We see no confirmation of the statement that the Bank of England had resolved to ship no more bullion to the United States.

Earl Durham and his lady were to leave London April 12, for Portsmouth to embark in the Hastings ship of the line for Canada.

The horrid story is reiterated by the Paris correspondent of the London Times, viz:

"Count Anatole Demidoff has again written to the Journal des Debats, alluding to the transportation of 600 young Polish women to the camp of Woenssenk, and repeating his surprise that any one should continue to disbelieve that statement. Now, on the very highest authority, I reiterate that the wholesale abduction in question did take place, and with your permission I shall re-state that a great number of those unfortunate young persons were carried off from the confiscated estates of prince Czartoryski; that the victims to whom the horrible preference was given were young married women, that they were habited in the Russian costume, and not as Tyrolese (as mentioned in the French paper.) None of them have since returned to their homes."

Much alarm continued to prevail at Paris at the extent to which stock jobbing is carried on in shares of joint stock companies.

On the extraordinary circular letter of M. Martin (du Nord) on the state of our banks, we find the following:

"It appears that this alarming communication was duly appreciated at Havre, and those other ports in France where the merchants being in direct and daily communication with the United States' agents and correspondents, were able to correct the statements and impressions contained in the ministerial circular. According to some information which we find in the Commerce on this head, Lyons does not appear to have been so fortunate owing to her communications with America being less direct than the sea port towns, and being already creditors to a very large amount, the manufacturers of that city, alarmed by the representations of the French minister of commerce, refused to execute some very large orders for silks which had arrived and which consequently have been undertaken in another country, where the Americans enjoy better credit. That paper concludes by asking what is the use of a minister of commerce whose acts are shown by the above facts to be so far from affording protection to manufactures and commerce, that they have only tended to mislead and depress the staples of the kingdom.

Henry Howittson, esq. deceased, of Westmoreland, has left 800,000l., the largest fortune ever accumulated by a private individual in that shire. He was formerly gold lace man to the king.

Over 30 persons have died at Worcester of the small pox. The Metropolitan police of the last year cost 220,000*l*. The deposits in the Savings Bank of England for 1837, were over twenty and a half millions sterling, being 900,000*l*. over 1836. The coronation of Victoria is fixed for June 26th. It is proposed in parliament to abolish altogether the punishment of transportation, substituting a general system of imprisonment.

The king of Hanover has prohibited all Hanoverians from studying at Leipsic.

London, April 7. There is no alteration in the character of the commercial money market, and, though money is to be well employed—bills with good names may be done at 3 per cent. In the foreign exchanges we have had but very little business, and the rates continue rather against the country; although the shipments of manufactured goods have rather increased. This anomaly can only be accounted for by the fact, that lately there have been more dealings in foreign securities and shares.

The increasing disposition to invest in the British securities, to which we referred last evening, has been more strongly manifested this day on the English stock exchange, and, in consequence, consols have advanced in value, although the public revenue has shown strong symptoms of being on the wane.

The Orpheus, the New York packet of the 16th ult., was telegraphed off Holyhead at 1 o'clock yesterday, but she had not reached Liverpool up to midnight.

London, April 7. Money market. The English stock market, which was feeble in the early part of the week, has, during the last two days, evinced a much firmer appearance; and, though the business has not been extensive, prices are all higher. Exchange bills are 64 to 66, and India bonds have been done at 70 pm. Money still continues abundant, and though there has been a considerable exportation of bullion to America, the influx of the precious metals from the continent has been quite sufficient to meet the demand thus occasioned.

Liverpool cotton market, April 7. There has been a considerable extent of business transacted in cotton this week, and in the commencement the demand was not so freely supplied by holders, and full prices were obtained for American; but during the last few days there has been more disposition to effect sales, and the market closes heavily at the quotations of last week. Surat is in good demand without change in price. The sales of the week amount to 23,163 bales, including 3,000 American on speculation, and 900 American, 350 Surat for export. 330 Sea Island, 17 to 33*l*; 8,210 upland, 5*l* 2 to 3*l* 2; 2,040 Mobile, &c. 5 to 9*l* 1-2; 11,530 New Orleans, 5*l* 1-8 to 7*l* 1-2; 1,200 Egyptian, 8 to 12*l* 1-2.

The cotton market is dull and spiritless, and prices rather tending downwards. The sales of to-day are 3,000 bags, including 200 American on speculation.

Liverpool, April 7. Tobacco. The sales amount to 169 hhds., of which 10 hhds. are for Ireland, and the remainder for the home trade.

BLOCKADE OF THE MEXICAN PORTS.

Pensacola bay, April 23, 1838.*

Sir: The Grampus has this moment returned from Vera Cruz, and brings the enclosed papers, being a report from commander Breese, dated the 16th instant, and copy of a letter to him, with circular enclosed, from the French commandant of Vera Cruz, declaring a blockade of all the ports of Mexico. The ultimatum and reply mentioned by commander Breese were not forwarded by him, but I understand they will be found in a package of papers from our consul at Vera Cruz to the secretary of state, which I this day transmit by the regular mail.

The Ontario and Concord are now in the gulf, the first at Vera Cruz, and the latter off Tampico.

The Vandalia sails to-morrow or next day for the coast of Texas and Mexico.

I have honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Hon. MAHLON DICKERSON,
Sec'y of the navy, Washington, D. C.

U. S. ship Ontario, Sacrificios, April 16, 1838.

Sir: I despatch the Grampus to apprise you that the French minister, Baron Deffaudis, received yesterday from Mexico the reply of this government to his ultimatum, which not proving satisfactory, it has been determined to commence immediately the blockade of the ports of the republic. Herewith I send the French commander's circular to that effect.

I have requested our consul to procure a copy of the French ultimatum, and the reply thereto, and hope to obtain them in time to forward by the schooner.

There are no merchant vessels of any nation now in port, and but one American—the Ann Eliza, of New York—expected. The blockade will be rigid as respects merchants vessels, but none others. The French force consists at present of one frigate and five brigs; another frigate daily expected. A gun brig will leave this evening, with despatches for the French minister in the United States, for Pensacola.

The Concord is here, and I shall direct captain Fitzhugh to proceed off Tampico, communicate with our consul there, and proffer any assistance that our countrymen there may require at his hands. I shall remain with this ship here, until the excitement that the blockade may create on shore has subsided; and then, if the presence of a vessel of war be no longer necessary, proceed to the coast of Texas in prosecution of your further orders. Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

SAML. L. BREESE.

Commodore A. J. DALLAS,
Com'd'g U. S. Na. Fo. in W. In. & Gulf of Mexico.

Station of the Gulf of Mexico,

On board his majesty's frigate l'Hermione, at anchor off Sacrificios, April 16, 1838.

The commander of the station of the gulf of Mexico has the honor to inform captain Breese, of the sloop of war Ontario, that he has just made known to the Mexican government the blockade of all the ports of the republic. He sends enclosed a copy of the circular addressed by himself and the minister plenipotentiary of France to the French consuls established in Mexico; and at the same time he begs captain Breese to accept the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

BAZOCHÉ.

Circular agreed upon between the minister plenipotentiary of France, in Mexico, and the commander of the naval station, notifying the French consuls established in Mexico of the declaration of the blockade of all the ports of the republic.

In consequence of the rejection of the ultimatum addressed on the 21st of the last month to the Mexican government, by order of the king's government, it has been determined that the ports of Mexico shall be immediately blockaded, for the purpose of preventing all entry to or departure from them.

In this state of things, the Baron Deffaudis and the commander Bazoche have adopted the following principles for the blockade:

1. No neutral vessel proceeding towards the entrance of the blockaded ports shall be detained or captured, if she has not previously received from one of the vessels of the French division a special notification of the existence of the blockade. This notification shall be, moreover, inserted in writing on the muster roll of the neutral vessel, by the cruiser which meets her; and it shall contain the announcement, together with statements of the day and the latitude in which it was made.

2. Neutral vessels which may be already in one of the ports of the republic before the blockade of such port, will have full liberty to depart, with or without cargo, during fifteen days, dated from that upon which the blockade is established.

3. The ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico will remain entirely free for the entrance and departure of the British post office, military, and non-commercial packet vessels.

4. The ports of the Mexican republic shall remain entirely free for the entrance and departure of Mexican boats exclusively engaged in fishing, unless the French naval division should be hereafter forced, in retaliation, to withdraw this benevolent disposition.

Translation of a note [to Mr. Forsyth] from the minister plenipotentiary of France, accompanied by a document.

Sir: The Mexican government having refused to accept the ultimatum, addressed, with the view of effecting a reconciliation, to it on the 21st of March last, by the French government, the king's minister in Mexico, who is at this moment on board the frigate l'Hermione, has just communicated to me, by means of the armed brig l'Eclipse, sent for the purpose to Pensacola, this refusal, as also the measures which it had induced capt. Bazoche, the commander of the French naval forces, to employ; and I hasten, sir, agreeably to his majesty's orders, to make known to the government of the United States the following official notification.

All the ports of Mexico are declared to be in a state of blockade. This blockade is rendered effective (or to be enforced) with regard to Vera Cruz from and after the 15th of the last month, and has doubtless been since extended to the other ports of the republic.

The orders received by the commander, Bazoche, for the execution of the duty committed to him, are, as you see, sir, from the annexed extract of the despatch sent to me by Baron de Deffaudis, entirely conformable with the liberal principles professed by France on the subject of blockades; and they are drawn up in such a manner as to preserve neutrals, especially the vessels of the United States, from all restraints and vexations (entraves) which are not absolutely indispensable for the attainment of the lawful ends proposed by the king's government.

On addressing you, sir, this communication, I have the honor to request that you would be so kind as to acknowledge the receipt of it as soon as possible, in order that the brig l'Eclipse may not be detained at Pensacola waiting for my answer longer than necessary.

I avail myself, sir, of this occasion to renew to you assurances of my high consideration.

E. DE PONTOIS.

To the hon. J. FORSYTH,
Secretary of state of the United States.

Extract from the despatch of the Baron de Deffaudis, dated April 15, 1838.

"On board his majesty's frigate l'Hermione, at anchor off Sacrificios, near Vera Cruz.

"1. No neutral vessel proceeding towards the entrance of the blockaded ports shall be detained or captured, if she has not previously received from one of the vessels of the French division a special notification of the existence of the blockade. This notification shall be, moreover, inserted in writing on the muster roll of the neutral vessel by the cruiser which meets her; and it shall contain the announcement, together with statements of the day and the latitude in which it was made.

"2. Neutral vessels which may be already in one of the ports of the republic before the blockade of such port, will have full liberty to depart, with or without cargo, during fifteen days, dated from that upon which the blockade is established.

"3. The ports of Vera Cruz and Tampico will remain entirely free for the entrance and departures of the post office, military and non-commercial packet vessels.

"4. The ports of the Mexican republic shall remain entirely free for the entrance and departure of Mexican boats exclusively engaged in fishing, unless the French naval division should be hereafter forced, in retaliation, to withdraw this benevolent disposition."

You see, sir, that M. Bazoche is desirous of confining himself to the employment of the mildest measures of restraint, for the purpose of obtaining the reparation due by the Mexican government to France, unless fresh attacks upon the persons or property of the king's subjects residing in Mexico should require him to adopt means decidedly severe. Now this persistence in the system of moderation, indicated by my ultimatum, is rendered worthy of praise, after the recent conduct of the Mexican government, which, in tolerating (if it did not even provoke, by its official writings,) the publication of the most odious calumnies respecting our intentions to conquer the country, to dismember its territory, etc. did not hesitate to expose to the fury of the populace, with the sole end of maintaining itself in power, not only our countrymen, but likewise all foreigners established in the territory of the republic. This conduct is essentially contrary to the laws of honor, of civilization, and of humanity. You also see, sir, from the principles adopted by M. Bazoche as the rules of his conduct, that it is our desire to preserve neutrals from all the restrictions and difficulties (entraves) which are not absolutely indispensable for the purpose which we are endeavoring lawfully to effect. I am also happy to be able to state to you a circumstance which proves our sincerity upon this point, especially so far as relates to Americans. On this very day, the commander of the sloop of war Ontario called on us on board of the frigate l'Hermione, to speak to us respecting the approaching arrival of the packet Ann Eliza, engaged in commerce, and in carrying letters from New York. We were obliged to express to him our regret at the necessity under which we should be of forbidding this vessel from entering Vera Cruz, as we should also do with regard to our own mail packets from Havre. But we have, at the same time, promised that officer, at his own request, to allow the consignee of the Ann Eliza to communicate with her at sea, to receive her letters, and to give instructions with regard to her future destination.

Accept, sir, etc.

BN. DEFFAUDIS.

The French consul-general has forwarded us, says the New York Sunday News, some documents which we have translated for the benefit of our readers:

[TRANSLATION.]
Office of the French consul general.
New York, May 5, 1838.

MR. EDITOR—You will oblige me, by publishing in your valuable paper, for the benefit of those merchants of New York who are engaged in commerce with France, an official communication which I have just received from his excellency, the minister plenipotentiary of France at Washington, relative to the blockade of the Mexican ports by the French squadron, under the command of admiral Bazoche.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

L. DE LA FOREST, consul-general.
To the editor of the Sunday Morning News.

Copy of an official communication addressed by the minister plenipotentiary from France at Washington, to the consul-general for France at New York.

Washington, May 3, 1838.

SIR—The Mexican government having rejected the ultimatum, which, in the spirit of conciliation, had been proffered to it by the French government under date of the 21st of March last, the king's minister to Mexico, who is now on board the frigate Hermion, has just notified me that all the Mexican ports are declared to be in a state of blockade; that this blockade became effective, with respect to Vera Cruz, from the 16th of last month; and that there would not be any delay in extending it to the other ports of the republic.

I have notified the (U. S.) government of this measure; and have advised it that the orders transmitted to the commander of the French fleet on the Mexican station, for the execution of the duties which have devolved upon him, are entirely in conformity with the liberal principles professed by France on the subject of blockading, and are framed in such a manner as to relieve neutral vessels from all hindrances which are not indispensable to the attainment of the legitimate ends contemplated by the government.

I notify you of this measure, that you may take any steps that may be necessary for the interests of those of our countrymen who may be residents in New York.

Accept, sir, &c.
(Signed) E. DE PONTOIS.

From the Globe of Monday night, 7th inst.

We have received a copy from a recent correspondence between the French minister, the Baron de Delfaudis, and the minister of foreign affairs of Mexico, in relation to the claims of France upon that government, from which we may hereafter publish extracts. In the meantime, we insert a hasty translation of the manifesto of the president of the republic, issued after the correspondence had been brought to a close.

A translated copy of the manifesto of the president of the Mexican republic to the nation.

MEXICANS: If it be the sacred duty of the chiefs of free nations to address their fellow-citizens when an internal danger is about to compromise their interest and happiness, this obligation takes a more august and more national character when an external war is threatened. Then the voice of the chief magistrate is the centre of all opinions, of all parties; and without the odious distinctions of civil war, calls all to defend the dignity, the rights, and the honor of their country.

You are already aware of the deplorable state of our relations with France, and have been able to appreciate the conduct of the government, who have employed every method which their noble and amicable sentiments could inspire, to prevent the hostile measures which at length the French cabinet have adopted. Without hearing our minister, whose mission had for its object to regulate our relations, and found them upon a more firm and solid basis; without knowing the intentions of the republican government, disposed at all times to satisfy just and rational claims; without dates or sufficient information upon the state of the negotiations, orders a naval force upon our coast, and demands, with violence, pecuniary indemnifications, the removal from office of our magistrates, and such concessions as will cause a general alarm in the continent of America. The document published by the minister of foreign affairs will give you every information, and arouse your zeal and your patriotism.

It would be useless to manifest to you the necessity of contesting upon the ultimatum of the French government, in the terms used in the respective communication of the minister of foreign affairs. There is not, I do not a moment doubt, one single Mexican, who does not think as thinks, and feels as feels, the government. The honor of an independent nation is so delicate, that the least fault which might stain it would cover it with infamy.

The blockade of our ports, to deprive the nation of a part of its pecuniary resources, is about to be put in effect by the French naval force. With this it is intended to compel the government to accede to the pretensions of the ultimatum, with assurance that it will be continued until those pretensions are fully complied with.

Nothing ought to intimidate us, because, in similar circumstances, the nation will not be deficient of any auxiliaries that may be necessary; and even should she be deficient, would she, in one solitary difficulty, give up her national patriotism? The Mexicans know how to suffer every class of privation; and these, so far from cooling their enthusiasm, only excites their rage against an unjust aggression.

Mexicans: Let us prepare ourselves for the defence of the choicest blessings enjoyed by a free people—liberty and honor—and confide in the decision of the government and of the congress to obey the national vote. From this moment ought to be extinguished every species of odium and resentment which unfortunately has divided the members of the same family; and, in your name, I declare him a traitor who shall foment disunion or discord.

Manifest to the world that generosity forms your character, and that the world knows nothing of you when it attempts to present you as men who possess but a small portion of hospitality and civilization, that the French citizens who reside in our territory, and under the protection of our laws and authorities, may never have to lament the least aggravation on our part. Treat them with due consideration, and do not stain with the least blemish the character of the Mexican nation.

We feel sensible, we cannot conceal it, that we have for our enemy the government of one the most powerful and flourishing nations; but if the differences which now exist have to be decided by justice, patriotism, and above all, the protection of Providence, we may count on the termination being crowned with success, and exhibit to the world that the abuse of foreign power is not capable of changing the glorious destinies of the republic.

Disposed as much for an honorable peace as decided for an eternal war, your president will omit nothing on his part to prevent any new difficulties that may tend to prolong a state so prejudicial to the interests of both countries. Nor does he lose the hope that, in the end, will be re-established that friendship and harmony which is of so much importance to both governments. If it were not thus, and if the blessings of peace have to be sacrificed in order not to submit to ignominy and infamy, let us all unite in the same spirit of 1821; when, full of confidence in the justice of our cause, we declared to the world to sacrifice our existence, if it be necessary; and the first to do so is your president and friend.

ANASTASIO BUSTAMANTE.
Palacio of the national government, Mexico,

MR. BARNEY'S LETTER.

TO WILLIAM LORMAN, ESQ.

President of the Bank of Baltimore.

SIR: Recognising in you the president of the oldest, most prosperous, and best conducted banking institution of the state—a public and patriotic citizen, whose enlarged and liberal views have contributed more than any other to advance my native city to her present elevated position, an exemplar in private life of all domestic virtues—a gentleman whom from boyhood I have respected and esteemed, I address you at this epoch, teeming with events intimately connected with the future prosperity of our beloved country.

The generous devotion of our banking institutions in sacrificing their high standing in consenting to be proclaimed bankrupt, in order to save the commercial community, has received, as it merited, the approbation of all intelligent men, and the result has proved their sagacity, solvency, and solidity.

Indebted to the general government fifty millions, forty-four of which have been promptly paid, and the balance secured under the provisions of the act of Congress of October last, in a manner so satisfactory as to leave no apprehension of any ultimate loss; thus proving themselves the only safe and appropriate depositories of the public revenues. To entitle them to a continuance, and to ensure a return to one currency for the government and the people, viz. that of the notes of specie-paying banks, it is indispensable that they should promptly resume.

To indicate the means by which this desirable end can be attained, is the object of the present communication.

Confidence, universal and all-pervading, must first be restored. Confidence, in the transactions of life, is a better circulating medium than gold or silver, and it is a mystery how an article, valueless in itself, should have become, by common consent, the representative and uniform standard of values among all the nations of the globe, barbarian and civilized, Turk, Hottentot, Infidel, and Christian.

Commerce, that "wafts a sigh from Indus to the Pole"—commerce, the twin-sister of agriculture, the handmaid of manufactures, (for not a vessel floats the ocean but is freighted with the produce of a fertile soil, the labor and the industry of the loom and of the shuttle,)—commerce, which, by facilitating intercourse, creates an identity of interest that unites man to man, no matter how remote, how varied the clime, or how different his habits and pursuits, has produced this great result, for the convenience of the human race.

A portion of the precious metals has therefore become a necessary ingredient in the happiness of man. Their entire disappearance from circulation may be endured for a limited period, but cannot be submitted to when the causes which led to their being dispensed with have passed away. The period for united action has arrived. New York, being a creditor state, is deeply interested in a return to a sound currency; every dollar received by her from her debtors is a loss on the legitimate profits of her trade to the full amount of the depreciation.

Her councils are regulated by practical, enlightened, and intelligent men. She knows her position, and understands her true interests. Anticipating events, the vaults of her moneyed institutions groan with ample stores of coin; with lavish hand she is prepared and willing to pour them out, and fill every exhausted stream with its joyous presence. The transition from gloom to glory will flash with the rapidity of a sun-beam, the moment assurance is given that other banks will follow suit within a limited time, say sixty days after the 10th May, and why not follow suit? Why, after she has made this sagacious move, permit yourselves to be checkmated in public opinion, and keep shuffling the pack until January, when the game is in your hand, counting honors only, leaving the tricks to your revilers? Our country is in a condition requiring the aid of patriots and statesmen to sustain us through the crisis.

The eternal snows which rest on the crater of Ætna give no indication of the volcanic fires which rage within; neither does our present peaceful attitude indicate the storm which may overtake us. One territory has been scourged by war's desolation. Although the blood and treasure of the nation has been poured on the sands of Florida, a most skillful officer gives his decided opinion that it will require an army of twenty thousand men to extirpate our invisible, and, heretofore, invincible foes, who, springing from the grass like men of Dhu, mow down their adversaries, and retreat in safety to the everglades and swamps of their impenetrable hammocks.

A border war, touching three states, is threatened by the determination of the Cherokees not to remove; and although the department have wisely confided the control of all the military movements to the sagacity and firmness of the most humane and accomplished soldier of the age, (gen. Scott,) yet, as he has found it necessary to call out nine thousand militia, in addition to the volunteers and regulars placed at his command, when our whole southwestern frontier is now the abode of fierce warriors ready and willing to devastate its fertile fields and slumbering population, serious results may be anticipated. I will not allude to the existing difficulties with great and powerful nations, but content myself with the expression of a conviction that a crisis has arrived, requiring the combined efforts of every patriot to aid his country in preserving the blessings of peace and prosperity. Three years yet remain of the unexpired term of this administration. Conversing with a distinguished man, whom the sagacious and discerning Gallatin recently designated as the most accomplished statesman of the age, he remarked, "your suggestions, if carried out, will insure the prosperity of the country, and probably recall the waning popularity of the powers that now control its destinies. Be it so. Let the weal of the republic be our motto; the weal result to us individually. Our country first and last, our individual exaltation weighs not a feather in the scale." The sentiment was godlike—worthy of the man, and worthy of imitation and adoption.

The treasury designs to anticipate the instalment due by the United States Bank in September, 1838, and 1839, of four millions, and the liquidated balances adjusted by the deposit banks of six millions, secured to be paid within the same period. This is not creating a debt, it is precisely realizing an amount due, as merchants practise every day in discounting their bills receivable. Ten millions more, however, will be required ere the year closes to meet the cost of Indian wars, and ordinary expenditures.

On the 31st December, the last instalment of the surplus is payable to the states, and must be discharged. They have appropriated and will enforce its payment. Thus, within eight months, will government securities be afloat to the amount of thirty millions. It should be a subject of rejoicing, rather than lamentation, for thereby we are secured against too rapid a diminution of the protective duties, which are indispensable to the preservation of our home industry, and at the same time it relieves us from the apprehension of a surplus, that apple of interminable discord.

If the proper direction be given to these loans, they become a mine of wealth to our exhausted finances, provided the wants of the treasury be not permitted to absorb the little remaining floating capital left us, but be negotiated abroad, and thus cause the current of gold and silver to flow back from Europe, until it be flood tide in every exhausted stream in our arid and parching land.

A plethora now prevails on the other side of the Atlantic. The required regular specie balance in the Bank of England is five millions sterling; by the latest accounts, they were shaking with an ague of apprehension at the prospect of its swelling to twelve, thus leaving a dead weight of seven millions; and although they have ceased remitting to this country in consequence of the prospect of a rise in exchange rendering it unprofitable, yet, when government securities shall gladden their eyes, most cheerfully will they hasten to supply our wants, knowing that their best customer once at ease, the benedictions of Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Liverpool, and London, will greet them in unmeasured terms for having restored to life, animation, and activity the best customers and consumers of their various fabrics of cotton, wool, and iron. Why has not the period arrived when all our banking institutions north of Georgia may resume simultaneously? (South, their indebtedness for heavy purchases of land and slaves at high prices require that another crop should be permitted to come into market before they are expected to co-operate.)

An uncertainty as to the views of the general government has authorized delay. I feel, myself, fully justified in the assurance that all apprehensions on this score are at an end. I not only believe, but know, that the members of the administration, whose peculiar province it is to regulate and control the finances, are not only sincerely desirous to aid the banks and the community in returning to specie payments, but will co-operate by every means in their power.

That the notes of all sound, specie-paying banks will be received and disbursed by their agents, and no demand made for coin that can embarrass or derange any institution; and that if coin should be required to any amount for the mint, Indian annuities, or other disbursements, they will prefer to procure it abroad to drain the vaults of the banks. Not only this, but other and effectual means will be adopted to prevent government securities which may hereafter be issued absorbing the floating capital of the country, now so much reduced as to be inadequate to supply the commercial demand.

By fire, by losses on cotton, bad debts in the south, decline in value of foreign importations, bank contractions of loans and circulation, the city of New York has had eighty millions entirely annihilated within a few months. It is amazing how she sustains herself; she has bent to the storm, and will rise with an elasticity that will evidence what enterprise, industry, and economy can accomplish.

Her return to prosperity commences with her resumption of specie payments. The experiment has satisfied the nation that banks are but another name for the republic. As stockholders, depositors, borrowers of their capital, or holders and circulators of their notes, every man, woman, and child, is a banker, or interested in banks.

Although the Globe has heretofore shadowed out coming events with unerring accuracy, it was at fault, but is now in position.

Specie is superabundant. The Bank of America, in New York, has twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars in its vaults, and only two hundred thousand in circulation.

The elements of prosperity are rife in our beloved country. We were drunk with prosperity. In New York, men driving their milk carts through the streets were pointed out as worth $300,000; they had refused this sum for their cow pastures: a city twenty miles long had been laid out, capable of accommodating a population of twenty millions, and each lot worth five thousand dollars.

Economy and industry now take the place of extravagance and speculation. We have rebounded, with an elasticity which has astonished the world, from distress and embarrassment unparalleled in the history of any commercial nation—are now at the foot of the ladder; ever step, we take must be in the ascending scale. I confidently anticipate years of uninterrupted prosperity, equal to any we have ever known in the most palmy days of the republic.

I come to the result. The death of the sub-treasury leaves in full force the act of 1816 recognising the notes of specie-paying banks as the currency of the country, receivable for all public dues; and Mr. Webster's amendment, as adopted by the senate, repeals the specie circular in regard to public lands. Let congressional legislation sanction the negotiation abroad of stocks or treasury notes. Then our banking institutions can at once follow the noble example set by New York. Confidence restored, specie will flow into their vaults, as the only safe depository, instead of being hoarded and watched in its hiding places by all the old women and feeble-minded men in town and country.

To consummate and render permanent our onward march to prosperity and happiness, one great measure remains to be achieved; and notwithstanding the unequivocal expressions of hostility by the present chief magistrate, to whose fiat the controlling power is vested by the constitution, I gather courage from despair, and will hope for his signature to a national bank, whenever congress shall enact a charter. He has an illustrious precedent in the immortal Madison. Enjoying the high gratification of a long personal interview at a period when all worldly influences had ceased to operate on his great mind, just before his pure and gentle spirit winged its flight to the mansions of bliss, there to repose forever in the bosom of that God whom he had never offended, but had sought to propitiate by every act which could dignify him as a patriot, adorn him as a statesman, or exalt him as a christian, I treasure his remarks as elegant extracts from a fountain of virtue, wisdom, and knowledge, matured by the practical experience of half a century devoted to politics, literature, and science, as the most cherished recollections of my life, and I can never forget incidents connected with an annual pilgrimage to a patriarch's shrine, where hospitality, intelligence, patriotism, virtue, and wisdom, all combined to gratify, instruct, and delight.

On the subject of a national bank, he said at one period of his life his convictions of its unconstitutionality were firm and uncompromising; but when the supreme court of the United States—the highest judicial authority known to our country, the proudest and most enlightened in christendom—had, after mature deliberation, solemnly pronounced its decision, after the assembled wisdom of the nation had twice called it into existence by congressional legislation, and the people themselves sanctioned it by their voice, the two co-ordinate branches of government thus deciding against his individual opinion, he could not permit himself longer to doubt; and, sir, said he, my mind, after years of intense reflection, has arrived at the conclusion that no commercial nation can prosper without a national bank; it is the great balance-wheel in the fiscal concerns of the country—indispensable to the preservation of a sound and wholesome circulating medium: without it specie payments could not have been resumed in 1817—without it they never can be permanently maintained. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast, it points to brighter days, and bids defiance to despair." The co-operation of the great, the good, and the wise, without party distinction, alone is required to place our country on the apex of prosperity and happiness.

Respectfully, your friend,

JOHN BARNEY.

CANADIAN AFFAIRS.

Speech of Gov. Head on proroguing the legislature of Upper Canada. The legislature being in session on 1st March, sir Francis B. Head, addressed them as follows, omitting the mere formal thanks for their vote of supplies, &c.

Honorable gentlemen, and gentlemen:

I regret to say that there still exists among a portion of the American people so strong a desire to force upon the free inhabitants of this province, republican institutions, that with scarcely an exception every government arsenal from lake Champlain to lake Michigan, has within the last two months been broken open and plundered, to furnish arms for the invasion of this portion of the British empire; and however the circumstance may be explained, it is certainly a remarkable fact, that all these robberies have been effected without the sacrifice of a single life, and without even the imprisonment of the person who is notoriously the instigator of these acts.

The wrong which citizens of the neighboring states have committed, by thus attempting to dictate to the inhabitants of Upper Canada the form of government under which they are henceforward to exist, will, as the assertion of a new theory, be condemned by the civilized world as severely, as in practice it has been repudiated by the people of this province.

What right, it will be calmly asked, have the inhabitants of one country, armed with the artillery and weapons of their government, to interfere with the political institutions of another? What excuse, it will be gravely considered, had citizens of the United States for invading the territory of Upper Canada?

When our colored population were informed that American citizens, sympathising with their sufferings, had taken violent possession of Navy island, for the double object of liberating them from the domination of British rule, and of imparting to them the blessings of republican institutions, based upon the principle that all men are born equal, did our colored brethren hail their approach?—No! on the contrary, they hastened as volunteers in wagon loads to the Niagara frontier to beg from me permission, that in the intended attack upon Navy island they might be permitted to form the forlorn hope—in short they supplicated, that they might be allowed to be foremost to defend the glorious institutions of Great Britain.

When the mild aborigines of this continent who live among us uninjured and respected, were informed that citizens of the United States, disregarding the wampum-belt which was sacredly connecting them with Great Britain, had invaded our shores to sympathise with the sufferings of the red tenants of the forest, and to offer them American friendship instead of the enmity of British rule, did our Indian brethren hail their approach? No, their chiefs and warriors instantly painted their faces for battle, and with rides in their hands those free-born defenders of their virgin soil appeared before me with a solitary request, namely, that in case of their death their wives and children might be pensioned. The Six Nations Indians, the Mississaugas, the Chipewas, the Hurons, and the Ottawas, spontaneously competed with each other in a determination to die, if necessary in defending the British government, under whose parental protection they and their fathers had been born.

When the Canadian farmers and yeomen of British origin were informed that citizens of the United States, sympathising with their sufferings, had in three instances taken forcible possession of her majesty's territory, for the purpose of liberating them from the British domination—that, with this object in view, the American leaders had issued proclamations promising to each liberator three hundred acres of the best lands of Upper Canada, with one hundred dollars in silver—that the American self-styled general in command of the liberators had called upon the citizens of Upper Canada "to free their land from tyranny"—"to rally round the standard of liberty"—"to lay down their arms"—in which case, it was beneficially promised to them, that "their persons and property should be protected," and that if they would "cease resistance, all would be well with them,"—did the Canadian inhabitants hail their approach? No, on the contrary, their brave and loyal militia, although totally deprived of the assistance of her majesty's regular troops, rose simultaneously, and regardless of every private consideration, wherever the invaders appeared, thousands of bayonets were seen bristling on our shore, ready to receive them. On the eastern, as well as on the western frontier, but one feeling prevailed,—it was a noble determination on the part of freemen, to conquer or die in defence of their religion—their constitution—their character—their families—and farms,—yet notwithstanding their excited feeling, when the American citizens, who from an armed schooner, had cruelly battered the town of Amherstburgh, fell into the hands of the brave militia of the western district, (in which not a single rebel had been in arms,) did these prisoners fall victims to popular fury, or were they even insulted? No; the instant our invaders surrendered to British power, they experienced that mercy which adorns the British name,—their wounds were healed at our hospitals—and from the western extremity of Upper Canada, they were conducted unharmed through the province, safe under the protectingegis of our laws!

When a band of rebels, defeated in their cruel object to reduce this capital to ashes in the depth of a Canadian winter, were, after the conflict at gallops-hill, brought to me as prisoners on the field—was any distinction made between American born and our other Canadian subjects? No, all were released. Before the assembled militia of Upper Canada all were equally pardoned; and though many of our brave men, smarting under feelings natural at the moment, evidently disapproved of the decision, yet all bowed in obedience to the administration of their laws; and, under the noble influence of monarchical government, they allowed their assailants to pass uninjured through their ranks.

When the gallant inhabitants of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, received intelligence that American citizens had commenced an attempt to free the British North American colonies "from the tyranny of British rule," did they rejoice at the event? No; a burst of loyalty, resounded through their lands, and a general desire to assist us was evinced.

If Upper Canada was merely a young, healthy province, with no protection on the continent of America, but its character, its industry, and the agricultural difficulties it has to contend with—its filial attachment to the government—the bravery it has shown in its defence—and the mercy it has extended to its captured assailants, ought to be sufficient to make its aggressors ashamed of their late attempt to force upon their neighbors, institutions which they conscientiously and unequivocally reject. But when it is considered that Upper Canada is an integral portion of the British empire, and that the two countries are at this moment bound together by a solemn treaty of peace, the faithless attack of citizens of the United States upon the province, after it had completely quelled a slight domestic insurrection, will, if persisted in, excite feelings among the generous nations of Europe, which will add but little to the character of republican institutions; for surely the smile of a nation should not be more dreaded than its frown, or its extended hand be more fatal than its uplifted arm.

When the facts just stated are clearly comprehended by intelligent men, how will the American citizens who have so wantonly attacked the British empire, find it possible to explain that the province of Upper Canada required them to interfere in its concerns?

But it seems now to be admitted, that our invaders have been deceived—that they falsely estimated the Canadian people—and that they have at last learned that the yeoman, farmers, militia, Indians, and colored population of this province, prefer British institutions to democracy; nevertheless, as an ex post facto excuse for the sinful and repeated invasion of the province, it is urged that the crew of the Caroline steamboat, which was captured more than fourteen days after Navy Island had been forcibly taken from us, have been "assassinated," and that "an extraordinary outrage" has been committed upon the Americans by our militia, who so ably and gallantly cut off that pirate vessel.

If Navy Island had been violently taken possession of by Canadian rebels, instead of by a body of Americans, armed, fed, and commanded by American citizens—if these Canadian rebels had then thought proper to invade the United States, to break open half a dozen of their state arsenals—to rob each of many hundred stand of arms—to plunder from the American government twenty-two pieces of cannon—and set the laws and authorities of the republic at defiance,—could any reasonable man declare, that we should offer, or that we could be supposed to intend to offer, any offence to our allies, if in a moment of profound peace, we were to pursue in the Niagara river, the guilty vessel which had transported to the island these American arms, and capture her, whether she were in British waters—in American waters—moored to the British shore—or to the American shore?—would it not be our bounden duty to the American people, to capture this pirate vessel?—and if it were to fail to do so, might not our allies hold us responsible for acts of such unprovoked aggression committed upon them by British subjects, inhabiting a British island.

Again, supposing that the Americans were to co-operate with us (as, under such circumstances, of course they would have done,) in chasing this pirate vessel, could it be supposed for a moment, that each power would only be permitted by the other to capture her, so long only as she continued in their own half of the river: and that if our British boatmen, at the peril of their lives, were to capture the vessel in American waters, or on the American shore, it would be considered by the Americans as a "violent outrage?" There can be no doubt in the mind of any reasonable man, that we should only perform our duty to the Americans, by destroying a vessel belonging to our own islanders, which had so grossly insulted them—which had completely overpowered their government—and which in a moment of peace, had so flagrantly violated the laws of nations. And if we should be justified in capturing the vessel of our islanders, on account of the wrongs they had perpetrated upon the American nation, surely we should have additional right to do so on our own account, if the twenty-two pieces of cannon forcibly wrested from the American government had not only been employed for a fortnight, in firing from the island upon the peaceable subjects of her majesty, but to our certain knowledge, were about to be transported to our main land for the purpose of committing murder, arson and robbery in this province!

It is, however, declared by our allies, that because these lawless possessors of our island turned out to be American citizens, and because their own government was totally unable to restrain them, the capture of their vessel by us became a "violent outrage!"

It would not have been considered by them an outrage, had we by force of arms prevented Canadian islanders from violating American arsenals—from insulting American authorities—and from firing twenty-two pieces of the United States cannon upon British subjects,—but it is considered as an outrage, for us to prevent an American vessel from enabling American citizens to commit these unparalleled aggressions.

In the history of this province, the capture of the Caroline (whoever might have been her crew,) will, I maintain, be respected by future ages as a noble proof of the sincerity of the Canadian people to fulfil their engagements, by crushing a pirate force which in violation of existing treaties, was insulting from a British Island, their American allies, and which general Arcularius, governor Mason, governor Marcy, the president and legislature of the United States, had absolutely found too powerful for the executive force of the republic to control.

The fact that the pirate force was composed of and commanded by American citizens, adds to the aggression committed against the Canadians, but subtracts nothing from the crime of robbery perpetrated upon the United States arsenal, unless, indeed, the American people, or the American authorities, should deem it proper to declare that it was no robbery at all, for that the aggression was approved of, that the state cannon and state muskets were knowingly and willfully lent to the invaders of Navy Island, for the purpose of forcing republican institutions upon the people of Upper Canada, and that under these circumstances which are incredible, the attack of Canadian militia upon the American citizens who were on board the Caroline, was "an extraordinary outrage."

But supposing for a moment this false reasoning to be unanswerable—supposing even that the commission of the outrage were to be admitted by the Canadians—and that it were also to be admitted by them that the capture, by the Canadians, of a small steamboat moored to the American shore was an outrage, equal in magnitude to the capture of Navy Island by American citizens, still to make the Canadian outrage as flagrant as that which had been committed upon us by citizens of the United States, it would have been necessary for the Canadians, after they had taken possession of the Caroline, to have fired from her deck with twenty-two pieces of cannon, for more than a fortnight upon the American shore; and even then, though the outrages would certainly have been rendered apparently equal, still the former would have been an outrage of retaliation upon an enemy, the latter an outrage of unprovoked attack upon a friend.

There are two facts which the American nation have not power to deny.

1st. That it is their interest, as well as their duty to fulfil their treaties.

2d. That if the people be permitted to rob the United States' arsenals in order to invade a friendly power, the lawless body will very soon find out that it is easier to plunder their own wealthy, defenceless citizens, than the poor, brave, well armed people of Upper Canada.

I have felt it to be the especial duty of the legislative station I hold, not only to protest against the unprincipled invasion of this province by its allies, but to vindicate the inhabitants from the unreasonable accusation, which, without due inquiry, was made against them by the federal government of the United States, of having "assassinated" the crew of the Caroline.

The memoir of the attack which has just been made upon us, offers a moral to the mother country which I feel confident will create throughout the empire considerable sensation; for although the old country is not without its share of human misapprehension and prejudice, particularly as regards its transatlantic possessions, yet when facts are clearly submitted to it, its judgment is always sound, and its verdict nobly impartial.

The struggle on this continent between monarchy and democracy, has been a problem which Upper Canada has just solved.

It has been very strongly argued, even in England, that democracy was the only form of Government indigenous to the soil of America, and that monarchy was a power which required here artificial support.

With a view to subvert this theory the whole of the queen's troops were allowed to retire from the province, and the result, as had been anticipated, was that the people of Upper Canada were no sooner left uncontrolled than they proclaimed themselves in favor of monarchical institutions. Surrounded by temptations on almost every side they indignantly rejected them all; in a few hours they successfully put down insurrection in their own land, and when American citizens, astonished as well as disappointed at their loyalty, determined to force them to become republicans, people of all religions and of all politics, rushed to the frontier to die in defence of their glorious constitution.

The conduct of the militia of Upper Canada attracted the attention of the gallant and loyal inhabitants of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, whose legislatures have done themselves, as well as this province, the honor of promptly expressing their unqualified approbation of the attachment which has been evinced here to the British Constitution.

When these facts shall arrive before the English people, and when they shall also have taken into their consideration the devoted and unalterable attachment which the British population of Lower Canada have evinced for our revered institutions, surely they will come to the conclusion, that the concurrent opinions of her majesty's North American colonies, respecting the relative advantages between monarchy and democracy in America, must be sounder than their own can be, inasmuch as eye witnesses judge more correctly than people can possibly do who are living four thousand miles off.

The people of England will, I trust, not fail to admire the calmness, the resolution, the generosity and the honorable subjection to their laws, which have distinguished the inhabitants of Upper Canada; and, on the other hand, they certainly cannot fail to observe, that the republican project of our English reformers, namely, to make the people bit by bit responsible only to themselves, has ended in America by the government of the United States confessing its total inability to restrain the passions of its citizens, to guard the state arsenals, or to maintain its treaties with its oldest and most natural ally.

Lastly—the British people will, I trust, observe with considerable alarm, that the leading advocates for organic changes in our institutions, are either at this moment lying in our jails as traitors, or from having absconded, are self-banished from the province; in short, that their pretended efforts to obtain in Upper Canada, what they called "liberty for the people," has ended in a most infamous and self-interested attempt to plunder private property, rob the banks, and burn to ashes the rising capital of their country!

With this experience before our eyes, I must confess I join with the legislature and people of Upper Canada, in shuddering at the abused name of "reform," just as we now recoil with abhorrence, when we hear suddenly pronounced the word "sympathy."

As my successor is hourly expected here, I return to the mother country as I left it, totally unconnected with party or with politics; but in retirement I shall remember the lessons which the people of Upper Canada have taught me; and I feel it my duty to declare, that I leave the continent of America with my judgment perfectly convinced, that the inhabitants of Europe, Asia, and Africa, are right in their opinion that all men are not by nature equal—that the assertion of the contrary in America is a fallacy—and that talent, industry and character, must elevate individuals, as they do nations, in the graduated scale of society.

May the resplendent genius of the British constitution ever continue to illuminate this noble land, and animated by its influence, may its inhabitants continue to be distinguished for humility of demeanor—nobility of mind—fidelity to their allies—courage before their enemy—mercy in victory—integrity in commerce—reverence for their religion—and at all times, and under all circumstances, implicit obedience to their laws.

Honorable gentlemen, and gentlemen:

FAREWELL!

SPEECH OF MR. HALSTED, OF N. J.,

On the bill making an appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government for the year 1838. Delivered in the house of representatives, March 13, 1838.

Mr. Halsted moved to strike from the bill the item of four thousand dollars for the jet d'eau on the south side of the centre footway in the capital grounds, and was about to offer other amendments to reduce other items of appropriation in the bill, when he was reminded by the chairman that the committee had determined to act upon one amendment at a time. Mr. Halsted said he had objections to make to several items of the bill, and should take this opportunity of discussing them all together. He should take a general view of the expenditures of this administration, and contrast them with the expenditures of former administrations.

In regard to the particular item to which, by the decision of the chair, he was to confine his motion, he said, in moving to strike it out, he was actuated by no hostility to works of art or taste; nor would he, on proper occasions, object to liberal appropriations for them. But while the finances of the government were in their present depressed condition; while the public treasury was bankrupt; while the administration was under the necessity of borrowing ten or fifteen millions of dollars for the purpose of defraying the ordinary expenses of the government, which he was well assured they would be compelled to do, either by a direct loan or a new emission of treasury notes; he would not consent to the expenditure of four thousand dollars for a work of mere ornament; no detriment could occur to the public if this work should be deferred until another year, when the state of the public finances might be in a better condition. He was opposed to the principle of borrowing money for the purposes constructing works merely ornamental and having no practical utility. It savoured to him of extravagance. It did not comport with the professions of an administration claiming to be democratic, and to act upon the principles of Jeffersonian democracy. If such an appropriation had been asked for, under like circumstances, during the administration of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, which had been characterized by its opponents as extravagant, what a clamor would have been raised throughout the country. Who does not remember the noise made about a billiard table and the lying letters about the east room, said to have been written by a celebrated individual, "solitary and alone." But it seems as if this pure Jeffersonian democratic administration, as they style themselves, can go to any extent of extravagance without check or restraint, though they have to borrow money to do it with. He would ask the democracy of the country whether this appropriation of $4000 for a jet d'eau, corresponded with their notions of Jeffersonian simplicity and frugality? But lest some of his plain honest constituents, not being French scholars, should not have an accurate idea of a jet d'eau, he would attempt to explain it to them by asking them if they had ever seen little wanton boys, after a summer shower, playing around a puddle of dirty water, filling their little suction pumps, (called, in boyish language, squirts,) made of hollow reed or elder stalk, and through them spouting the water into the air, crying out to their comrades to stand from under; this, he said, was a jet d'eau. The difference between these jet d'eaus and the one under consideration was, that in the former the moving or propelling power was natural, in the latter artificial; or, to describe it as it really was, a reservoir of water is made on the top of the capitol hill, which is connected by a metallic pipe or tube of some kind with a small reservoir below the hill, in the middle of which reservoir is a brass or copper ornamented column or pillar rising about twelve or fifteen feet above the bottom of the reservoir, and 6 or 8 feet above the surface of the ground and resembling very much an iron lamp post, through which the water, by the gravitating force of the fluid in the reservoir on the top of the hill, is projected some ten or fifteen feet into the air, and falls into the reservoir below, which is in depth about six feet, and diameter about thirty feet, and lined with cut stone, surmounted with an iron railing about four feet high. Such was the description of a jet d'eau, for the construction of which four thousand dollars was asked by this self-styled democratic administration. And while speaking of the name which the administration party had assumed to itself, he would take the liberty of making some reply to the honorable member from Ohio, who, in a speech made in this house on the 18th of December last, charged the whig party with changing their name, and with "assuming the name of whig for political effect, when, in his opinion, they did not possess the political principles which that name indicated in '76." With regard to the change of names, the predominant party in this house had changed twice to their once. He would state and add up the account for the honorable member, so that he might see on which side the balance was. In the first political campaign between Mr. Adams and general Jackson, the friends of the former were called Adams men, and of the latter Jackson men. The friends of the former changed their name and called themselves national republicans, and the friends of the latter called themselves Jackson republicans. The friends of general Jackson again changed their name and called themselves Jackson democrats, and the friends of Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay then called themselves whigs. Thus far the account was equally balanced. What changes had taken place since? The next name assumed by the predominant party was that of "the Jackson Van Buren democrats." It was under this name that the last presidential contest was fought—on their placards and tickets the name of Jackson was placed in large capitals, and the name of Van Buren either omitted altogether or put in small type, and in this way Mr. Van Buren was smuggled into the presidential chair under the cloak of general Jackson's great name. Well, after the name of general Jackson had produced the desired effect, what was the next change in the name of the party? Why it was then "the Van Buren Jackson democrats," or, as they have been called, for brevity, by their opponents, the Van Jacks. But they did not hold to this name long, for they soon found there was no hurrah about the name of Van Buren, and that it was necessary, therefore, to sink it as soon as possible, otherwise it might sink them. They then assumed and now claim the name of democrats. Thus it appears, upon footing up the account, they beat the whigs two to one in the change of names. Now, in regard to the motive which induced this number of changes, was it not for political effect? Shakespeare had said:

What's in a name?

A rose by any other name would smell as sweet.

But it was evident that politicians of all ages had differed from the poet, and that, in their opinion, not only the strength and popularity of party, but the acquisition of wealth and honor frequently depended upon a name; and it was doubtless for political effect that the predominant party assumed the name of democrats. They not only call themselves democrats, but they profess to be Jefferson democrats. Now he should undertake to show that this administration did not hold to a single one of the distinctive principles of the Jefferson school of democracy; and, if they did, it was only "from the teeth outwards." That there was no community of feeling, sentiment, action, or practice between this administration and that of Mr. Jefferson; and that they might, with much more propriety, be characterized by the name of dandy democrats than Jefferson democrats. A dandy was a person who wore corsets and dickies; who generally had but little capital, and that borrowed, and whose expenditures exceeded his income. Might not this description be applied to this administration? That this administration traded upon borrowed capital might be proved in more ways than one. On this point, however, the bill for the issue of ten millions of treasury notes, at the extra session of congress, and the bill for the emission of ten millions more, which is about to be introduced into this house this session, would afford sufficient evidence. Then, as to the other characteristic quality of dandyism, did not this administration possess it in an eminent degree? Did it not spend more than its income? He would examine a little into that matter. It appeared, from the treasurers report, that the receipts into the treasury, during the first three-quarters of the year 1837, including four million three hundred thousand dollars in treasury notes, were twenty-three millions four hundred and ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and eighty-one dollars, is

Deduct treasury notes,

4,300,000

And it left as the actual amt received, $19,199,981

The amount of expenditures, during the same period, was, according to the same report, $25,418,916

Deduct amount received,

19,199,981

Leaves as the excess,

$6,218,935

Or, at the same ratio for the whole year,

Making an excess of expenditures, over income, of nearly two-thirds of the whole amount of the expenditures under Mr. Adams, and more than the whole expenditure of the administration of Mr. Jefferson.

If this administration held on in its career as prosperously as it began, we should, at the end of the first, (he trusted its last term,) be burdened with a national debt of thirty-three millions of dollars. During the administration of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) it was made a serious charge against it, that there was expended, in one year, nine thousand dollars more than it received; it was gravely denounced as extravagant; and it was considered as a strong argument against his reelection. Mr. Rives, of Virginia, one of the leaders of the Jackson party, commented strongly on it, and in a speech, which he delivered in this house in the year 1828, made use of the following language: "I have a deep and settled conviction that economy is a cardinal virtue in every republican government. It is not merely for the pecuniary saving, and consequent relief to the industry and resources of the people, which it brings with it that I esteem it—it is still more, its political effects. It is not only the close ally, but the surest guarantee of the public liberty. It is the great instrument for restraining that dangerous principle of executive influence which is perpetually undermining and assailing the fabric of free government every where. This influence exists and enlarges itself through the disbursements of public money, ultimately, under one shape or other. Diminish the public expenditures and you will diminish executive influence."

Mr. H. said he heartily concurred in the sentiments here expressed; and if they were applicable to the administration of Mr. Adams, in 1828, they applied with ten fold force to the present administration; for Mr. Adams's administration did not profess to act upon the principles of Jeffersonian democracy and frugality, as this administration or its friends professed to do. He would take the liberty of recurring to the principles of Jefferson democracy, as delivered and practised upon by the author himself, and to compare them with the principles and practices of this administration, and see how they corresponded; and he thought it would be found, on comparison, that the reason why the pure virgin of democracy attracted the admiration, and warmed the hearts of the American people when she was first introduced by Mr. Jefferson into our legislative and executive halls, was, because "a native grace sat fair proportioned on her polished limbs, veiled in a simple robe, their best attire, beyond the pomp of dress." But that the present administration, in bringing forward this damsel of democracy, had decked her off in all the gaudy tinsel finery of a French fille de chambre, had covered her o'er with puffs, powders, paints, patches, false curls, and furbelows; nay, worse, had made her "as common as the stairs that mount the capitol;" and yet had the modest assurance to recommend her to the respect and attention of a virtuous and intelligent community; and attempted, gravely, to palm her off upon the people as the pure virgin of Jefferson democracy. But it would not do; the people were not so ignorant or so depraved as to mistake the meretricious colours of the courtizan for the genuine blush of virgin modesty. For the purpose of showing what were the principles of Jefferson democracy he would take the liberty of reading Mr. Jefferson's confession of political faith, contained in a letter to the honorable Elbridge Gerry, dated 26th January, 1779, in which he said: "I am for a government rigorously frugal and simple; applying all the possible savings of the public revenue to the discharge of the national debt, and not for the multiplication of officers and salaries, merely to make partisans, and for increasing the public debt, on the principle of its being a public blessing. I am for relying, for internal defence, on our militia, solely, till actual invasion; and for such a naval force, only, as may protect our coasts and harbors from such depredations as we have experienced; and not for a standing army, in time of peace, which may overawe the public sentiment; nor for a navy, which, by its own expenses and the eternal wars in which it will implicate us, will grind us with public burthens, and sink us under them. I am for free commerce with all nations; political connection with none; and little or no diplomatic establishment."

Thus it appeared that Mr. Jefferson was for a government rigorously frugal and simple. Was this administration in favor of such a government? The friends of this administration considered, or professed to consider Mr. Adams's administration a very extravagant one. The expenditures of Mr. Adams's administration were, in the year 1825, $11,490,460. The expenses of this administration, which professes to hold to the doctrine of Jefferson frugality, were, in 1837, $35,281,361 57, which was an increase of more than three fold; a very fine exemplification of frugality and simplicity. In the next place, Mr. Jefferson was opposed to a national debt; but one of the first measures of this administration was the creation of a debt of ten millions of dollars, by the issuing of treasury notes.

And not content with that, a bill will soon be presented to this house, by the committee of ways and means, to authorize the issue of ten millions more; thus not only disregarding the Jeffersonian doctrine, but actually departing from the footsteps of his predecessor, in which the executive had promised so faithfully to walk, and thereby creating a national debt faster than general Jackson's administration paid it off. But while this monstrous increase of expenditure and extravagance, which pervades all the departments of this government, prevails, this national debt must continue to increase until a resort to taxes of some kind must be had to pay it. In the celebrated report of General Hamilton, the chairman of the committee on retrenchment and reform, as it was called, Mr. Adams's administration was censured as extravagant; and the amount of the expenditures for the civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous departments of the government, was a particular subject of animadversion. In 1826, the amount of those expenditures was $2,600,179 79; in 1836, $5,388,370 58; in 1837, $5,384,896 93. And the estimated expenditure for these, in 1838, is $5,685,752, or more than two to one.

The naval establishment, in 1826, under Mr. Adams, cost $4,218,902.15. In 1836, under gen. Jackson, it cost $5,800,763 25. In 1837, under Mr. Van Buren, it cost, for three quarters of the year, $5,384,896.93, or at the rate of $6,307,316 46. That is $2,088,414.31 a year more than it cost in the time of Mr. Adams; and yet what is the state of the navy now, compared with what it was then. The military establishment in 1826, under Mr. Adams cost the country $6,243,236 00; in 1836, under gen. Jackson, it cost $18,466,110 63; in 1837, under Mr. Van Buren, it cost $21,214,610 01; that is more than three times as much as it cost under what was called by the present predominant party the extravagant administration of Mr. Adams. But it might be said we are now in a state of war, and then we were at peace; but with whom are we at war? a few poor Indians, not exceeding in the whole one thousand warriors; a war which gen. Jackson told Mr. White, the delegate from Florida, he could put himself at the head of fifty old women and put an end to in one week, and which gen. Jessup, in his letter to Mr. Blair, of the 20th of June, 1836, said there was force enough in Florida then, if properly employed, to put an end to in a week; and this war had already cost the country upwards of $13,000,000, and did not appear to be any nearer a termination now than when it commenced.

But he would pass from these general items of expenditures, to a more detailed examination of the expenditure of the different departments of the government. It appeared that in the year 1828, the pay of the clerks and messengers in the war department amounted to $48,950; in 1837, to $98,765 71, and there was asked to be appropriated by this bill for the same object for the year 1836, $101,050 00.

The committee of which gen. Hamilton was chairman, already referred to, reported that the diplomatic relations of the country under Mr. Adams' administration, were on a scale unnecessarily expensive. What did they amount to in 1829? $207,786 20! But has this unnecessary expense been diminished by these pretenders to frugality and economy? No, it had been greatly increased. The estimates for the year 1838 for the same objects were $235,900 00.

The average contingent expenses of all the departments of the government, as stated by gen. Hamilton in his report, was $77,454, but under gen. Jackson in 1836, it had increased to $95,834, and under this economical administration the appropriation asked for these expenses is $139,207 00. The contingent expenses of all the departments of the government, under Mr. Jefferson, amounted only to $29,000. One of the charges against the administration of Mr. Adams was, "that instead of suppressing unnecessary offices, and curtailing executive patronage, they had rapidly multiplied and increased under his auspices. How much more true was this remark of the last and present administrations: and how much more necessary it was to apply the pruning knife to these excesses of executive folly, extravagance, and corruption, he would now proceed to show. Since the year 1829, when Mr. Adams ceased to be president, and when, according to the creed of the predominant party, the self-styled democracy, there was an unnecessary number of officers, there have been created the following new bureaus, each having its appropriate set of new officers, viz: first, the bureau of the commanding general, with clerks and messengers, and contingent expenses amounting to $1,800 per annum. The topographical bureau $2,800 per annum. Clothing bureau $500 do
Bounty land bureau
Inspector general's bureau 500 do
Solicitor of treasury's bureau for salary of solicitor 3,500 do
For clerks and messengers in do. 8,950 do
Auditor of post office bureau, salary of auditor 3,000 do
Clerks and messengers in do. 55,500 do
Secretary to sign patents for lands 1,500 do

These were the additional bureaus which had been created since 1829, and they must at least satisfy the country of one thing, viz. that the common saying which prevailed about that time that "old hickory was not good for cabinet work," was a great mistake. Nobody, he thought would now deny there was at least one kind of cabinet work that old hickory was capital for, and that was the making of bureaus, and he believed that more officers could be packed into bureaus made of this kind of material than had heretofore been used for the cabinet work of every other administration since the formation of the government.

But these were only a very small part of the new offices created under the late economical and reforming administration. A statement of the new offices created the 2d session of the 24th congress, would be found in the 4th volume of executive documents of that session, document 189, page 40, which shows that the salaries of the new officers created that session amounted to $131,000. And that at the same session, there were additional salaries and allowances made to officers previously appointed, amounting to $160,000 per annum. And it would be found that in two years the patronage of the president had been increased, by giving him the appointment of officers whose salaries amounted in the aggregate to $372,000 per annum. Taking this as the ratio of increase, we might conceive what a vast accession was made to the executive patronage during the last administration. Was the present executive satisfied with this increase of patronage? No, demands were continually made for more. More clerks were wanted in several of the departments, and the president recommends a large increase in the standing army. How did the increase of the army recommended by the president, correspond with the doctrine of Jeffersonian democracy. When Jefferson came into power, the army consisted of 14,421 men. But, by the act of May 14th, 1800, it was reduced to 4,166. And by the act of March, 1802, it was further reduced to 3,287. But this administration, instead of following the example of Jefferson, sets itself to work to increase the army, and the secretary at war, with the approbation of the president, recommends that it should be increased to the number of 15,000 men. Jefferson was opposed to a national debt, but one of the first acts of this administration was to create one. Jefferson denied the power of the general government to make paper money a legal tender; but this administration not only compelled its creditors to take its paper, but has actually, in some instances, refused to take the same paper itself. Jefferson thought men ought not to be turned out of office for a difference of political opinion. But the reverse of that doctrine was held and practiced by this administration. Jefferson was opposed to the interference of public officers in elections, and thought it good cause of removal; now the reverse is the case, and it is thought good cause of removal if a man neglected or refused to interfere and use all his official influence for the support of those in power.

But he would revert again to the consideration of the bill before the committee, and call their attention to another item of the bill, which appeared to him extravagant, and that was the item for alterations and repairs of the presidents house and for superintendence of the grounds around the same $4,815. He found upon examination that this sum included an item of $390 for papering the east room; considering that it had only a few old broken chairs and benches in it during Mr. Adams' administration and some $20,000 had been expended on it since, one would think that the papering might be postponed until the finances of the government were in a better condition. Another part of this item of $4,815 was composed of the sum of $1,000 for painting the wall of the hall and passages. This also appeared to him a large sum for those objects; and in addition to these, there was also required the sum of $800 for painting inside and varnishing the wood work. He recollected that there was once what was called a varnishing or white washing committee, at Nashville, who worked for nothing, and as they were now out of employment, he suggested the propriety of engaging their services for this work. Speaking of the East room in the president's house, reminded him that there was another room in this capitol which had been recently fitted up for the vice president, in a style of very anti-democratic and anti-Jeffersonian splendor. There were in it six chairs which cost thirty dollars a piece; two sofas that cost probably not less than $100 a piece; two marble slab tables that cost at least $200 more; two splendid mahogany book cases. He would have supposed that one large book case would have been enough for so literary a man as the vice president, particularly as there were no books in either case; there were also splendid curtains and a chandelier, looking glass, carpet, &c. &c. A room thus furnished for a vice president under Mr. Adams' administration, would have been considered extravagant in the extreme, although the treasury was then overflowing. But when the government had to resort to the issue of treasury notes to defray its current expenses, it is deemed the height of democratic and Jeffersonian frugality.

It would be recollected what a clamor there was raised in the country about a certain billiard table, which accidentally found its way, without the presidents knowledge, into one of the items of the contingent expenditures, and which, by the way was not paid for out of the public money. The opponents of his administration were horror-stricken, and their moral sensibilities suffered a severe shock, at the bare idea of spending any of the public money for such an object. How will the delicate sensibilities of those gentlemen reconcile themselves to an item of this kind to be found in the contingent expenses of the state department, viz. for the American Turf Register $30. If it was wrong to expend the public money for a billiard table, was it not equally wrong to expend it for a Turf Register? If the secretary of state had a taste for that kind of reading he had no objection to his indulging it, but he did not think it ought to be done at the public expense. He also observed another item in the account of the contingent expenses of the state department, which struck him as improper, and that was $6 00 for "a portrait of Van Buren," and he also observed items of the same character in the contingent account of the office of the comptroller of the treasury and the second auditor's office. These were small items, but it was the principle to which he objected. He thought that the people would have to pay dear enough for the original, without being compelled to pay for the copies also. Besides, where was this practice to end, if it was once sanctioned; if one of the public officers could purchase a portrait of the president and have the expense paid out of the public treasury, why could not all the rest. If public officers wished to play the sycophant, or pay court to the president by buying his portrait, let them do it out of their own pocket. He protested against their taking any of the people's money for that object.

He found also, on examination of the contingent expenses of the treasury department, an item in regard to which he should like to have some explanation. There was paid out of the contingent fund of that department for the article of ice in one year, the sum of $104 16. He should like to know whether this ice was used for cooling wine or mint juleps, or for what other object so large a quantity was required. He had spoken of the expenses of other departments of the government, he would now come nearer home and speak of the extraordinary increase of the expenditures of congress. In the year 1802, under Mr. Jefferson, the contingent expenses of both houses of congress were $17,000; in 1803, $28,000; in 1828, under Mr. Adams, they were $106,203, and in 1838, under Mr. Van Buren, the amount appropriated for them by the bill under consideration, is $300,000. And the incidental and contingent expenses of the senate alone, in the year 1836, amounted to $63,868 17, about three times as much as the annual contingent expenses of both houses of congress under Mr. Jefferson. The printing of the house of representatives in 1828, under Mr. Adams, amounted to $37,602 00; in 1837, under Mr. Van Buren, to $73,532 00. There was paid for stationery for the house of representatives in 1820, $7,189.63; in 1837, $22,979 50; in 1838, it will probably amount to $28,000 00. There was paid for messengers and runners in 1828, $9,231 75; in 1829, $7,861 50. In 1836, there was paid for messengers and runners $25,299 00, and in 1837, $26,266 50. There was paid for draughtsmen and clerks in 1825, $100, and in 1826, $229. In 1835, there was paid for draughtsmen and clerks $6,792 46. In 1836, there was paid $7,859 70, and in 1837, $18,180 48. There was paid for messengers, runners, draughtsmen and clerks of this house, in 1825, under Mr. Adams, $4,987 25, but in 1837, under Mr. Van Buren, there was paid for the same objects $44,446 92, an increase of nearly ten fold. There was paid for pens, inkstands, tape and wax, for the house of representatives in 1836, the sum of $5,249 51, and for pens alone $1,326 57. There was paid for horse hire for the use of the house of representatives in 1837, $2,307. He understood that the door keeper kept ten or twelve horses, which he hired to the government at $1 50 per day the whole time that congress was in session, and that members of congress were some times accommodated with the use of these horses. If a member of congress be too lazy to walk and too stingy to hire, he protested against his indulging either his laziness or penuriousness at the public expense. If they sanctioned the practise of riding on the public horses, and they went on in the career of extravagance as they had gone on for a few years past they would not be satisfied without they had carriages to ride in. He took this opportunity of expressing his disapprobation of this practice, and in doing so he did not wish to be understood as censuring the officers of this house, on the contrary, he wished rather to protect them, and to furnish them with an argument to enable them to resist the importunities of members who might ask a favor of that kind.

He would detain the house a few minutes longer, while he made some remarks on the subject of the public printing. In 1828, it appeared, by the report of Mr. Hamilton, the amount of public printing done for the state department was made an object of examination and reprobation; and the expenditure of $40,708 15 in three years, was deemed extravagant. But in two years, under the reforming administration of general Jackson, the amount paid by the same department, for printing, was $30,210 37, showing an excess of $1,581 per annum over the expenditures of Mr. Adams for the same object. The printing for the war department in three years, under Mr. Adams, amounted to $7,679 50. For two years under general Jackson it amounted to $12,335 65; that was $2,559 83 per annum under the former administration, and $6,138 39 under the latter. The printing for the navy department for three years under Mr. Adams, cost $466 86; and for two years under general Jackson it cost $9,444 60. The printing for the post office for two years under Mr. Adams' administration cost $14,174. But the printing for the post office for one year, from the first of October, 1836, to the 30th of September, 1837, amounted to $60,045 29, more than eight times as much as it was under Mr. Adams. It would be recollected what a clamor was raised against the administration of Mr. Adams on account of some small sums paid for printing. Where Mr. Adams paid hundreds the administration of general Jackson and this administration paid thousands. Thus there was paid to the firm of Blair and Rives, alone for printing done for the several executive departments, in the year 1836 and 1837, the sum of $125,584 17, in addition to which, they received, as printers to the house of representatives, in the year 1836 $73,671 65, and for the year 1837 $62,000 00. There had been much said also against the administration of Mr. Adams on account of the number of newspapers; and the report of general Hamilton, before referred to, made the number taken and the amount expended for them a particular subject of animadversion. Upon looking into the items of contingent expenses of the different departments, he could perceive no reform here. There were taken at the state department nineteen different newspapers, for which there was paid out of the public treasury $234 24 annually, besides the sum of $73 57 annually for reviews, periodicals, and the American Turf Register. If the officers of this department read all these papers and periodicals they must neglect the public business, and if they did not, then so much expense was unnecessary. Again, in the contingent account of the office of Indian affairs it appeared that there was paid $63 37 annually, for six newspapers and one magazine. In the engineer department, there was paid for seven newspapers $103 84. For six newspapers in the ordnance department $67 50. For newspapers in the commanding general's office $34. In the adjutant general's $14 50. In the office of the commissary of subsistence $30. In the quartermaster general's office $48. In the paymaster general's $25; and in the pension office $30. Making an aggregate of $747. Whereas, the expense of newspapers for the same departments under Mr. Adams, was only $388 40.

While upon the subject of printing, he would advert to the great increase in the amount and extent of printing public and executive documents. They had become so voluminous that it was impossible to read them, if even a member devoted all his time, not occupied in this house, to that object. There had been published, since the commencement of this session, ten octavo volumes of eight hundred pages each; and the reports of committees of this house, petitions, &c., would amount to five volumes more. These volumes would therefore, contain twelve thousand pages; or, an average of one hundred pages a day, ever since the commencement of the session. This immense increase in the number and size of the executive documents was not occasioned so much by the increase of business, as by the practice which had recently grown up, of the head of the department sending us all the reports of his sub-officers, instead of taking the trouble to extract the substance of them, and condense them in a report of his own. He could not perceive any correspondent benefit that resulted from this immense increase of public documents. It required the employment of a great number of additional clerks, and thus tended to swell the executive patronage. It involved the whole of the financial and other concerns of the government in such a mass of documents and printed reports, as prevented the people from understanding their real condition; and it tended to throw great sums of money into the pockets of the printers. He was sensibly struck with the vast increase in this kind of printing by examining the reports of the secretary of the treasury during the former periods of the government. He found all the reports and documents relating to the treasury department from the year

1790, to the year 1828, a period of thirty-eight years, comprised in two volumes octavo, of 560 pages each; whereas, the reports from the treasury department alone, since the commencement of the present session, would form three octavo volumes, of 800 pages each. If the number of these public documents continued to increase as rapidly as they had done, members of congress, if they were required to read them all, would not only want the hundred eyes of Argus, but they would want to live the whole period of the Spanish compliment, which was "a thousand years."

Mr. H. concluded by moving to strike out the item of $4,000 for the jet d'eau.

JUDGE WHITE'S SPEECH

On the sub-treasury bill. Delivered in the senate of the United States, March 24, 1838, while the motion of Mr. Cuthbert to strike out the 23d section, was pending.

MR. PRESIDENT: I address you under circumstances of peculiar disadvantage. The subject is one of the greatest importance. It has been long discussed, ably discussed by those of most distinguished talents. Their highest efforts have been made on both sides to present its advantages and disadvantages in every view the human mind can take of it.

The crowded audience has become wearied, and even many senators themselves can hardly give respectful attention to our most interesting debate.

Up to the termination of the last address of the distinguished senator from Massachusetts who sits nearest to me, (Mr. Webster,) I was not satisfied whether it would be my duty to do more than listen respectfully to others, and then say yea or nay to the different questions presented to the senate.

At the close of his animated, able, and interesting speech, he recurred to a scrap of the history of my own state, fifty years ago. Instantly my mind settled down in the conviction that my constituents had a right to expect more of a son of one of the actors in that scene than a bare vote.

I promise those who may favor me with their attention, that if what I say should not be interesting, it shall not be tedious.

The advocates of this bill expect to accomplish two objects by its passage:

1st. To designate the only species of funds which shall be received in payment of any dues to the government.

2d. To designate the persons by whom, and the places where, those moneys shall be kept, between the time of their collection and disbursement.

The provisions, as to the first, are, that after the lapse of six years nothing shall be received but gold and silver, and such paper as shall be issued by or under the authority of the federal government; and, in the mean time, that certain proportions may be received in the notes of specie-paying banks.

1st. My first objection to this plan is, that it sets out with a distinction in favor of those who are in the employment of the federal government, or have any money to receive from it, and those who are in the employment of the state governments, as well as the mass of the people. The distinction is odious, and ought not to be sanctioned.

Senators who support this bill say these are mere catch-words, (one kind of money for the government, and another for the people,) of which all have become ashamed, and that latterly they have been driven out of the senate.

To this, I reply, the gentlemen are mistaken; this distinction is made on the very face of the bill, in terms too plain to be misunderstood.

If all the money mentioned is of equal value, why mention gold and silver, treasury notes, notes of specie-paying banks, &c? The whole argument in favor of the bill rests on the supposition that gold and silver are the best, and that, as far as it goes, is to be used for federal officers and those who have federal contracts, leaving to others to get what they can, and how they can.

2d. the bill itself contemplates a paper medium emanating from the federal government. To this I object. Because we have no power to issue it. As a currency, they are bills of credit, unconstitutional; more clearly so than to incorporate a bank. Because, if we can issue such a medium, we ought never to do it. It will lead to the most wasteful and extravagant expenditures. It will be used moderately at first, until the people become reconciled to it, and then gradually extended in place of borrowing money, so as to meet all the calls of an extravagant administration, and must end in a large national debt, or depreciate like your continental money.

Many, with great reason, have believed that no government can long be economical upon even a system of indirect taxation. That under such a system the people generally are not conscious of the burthen they bear. They pay their taxes when they buy their clothes, or other articles, on which duties are imposed, without reflecting that any part of the money they thus expend comes into the treasury; they therefore cease to be watchful over the manner in which the public moneys are expended; and, whenever they cease to keep strict watch, their agents commence useless and wasteful expenditures. But when the taxes are direct, every man knows how much he pays, and when he pays, and will carefully watch how the moneys are expended; and if the expenditures are wasteful or extravagant, a suitable corrective will be immediately applied. Our whole system of federal taxation is in the general indirect; and, if we once commence a system of supplying deficiencies in the treasury by an issue of paper to be used as currency, the country may be ruined.

At the special session we were obliged to add ten millions of dollars to our means. This we did not do by a direct loan, which every man could understand but by authorizing an issue of treasury notes. When that bill was before the senate, the senator from Missouri, and, if I mistake not, the senator from Pennsylvania, both friends of the administration, placed these notes on the ground of making a loan; that they, as they were to bear an interest, not exceeding five per cent. would be disposed of for money, and with the money thus procured, our creditors could be paid; and in this view I voted for the bill. In the house the amount of the notes was reduced one-half, and I soon perceived that the administration intended to use them, not to procure a loan, but as a currency; and when the bill was returned to us, I took the earliest opportunity to record my vote against it. The notes issued under that bill have in fact been used as a currency, and at various rates of interest, some as low as one mill per year.

This year our revenue is again to be deficient; we will need, in addition to our means in the treasury, ten, fifteen, or twenty millions of dollars; and this addition will be made by new issues. This paper currency seems to cost nothing; and, as our wants increase, the issues will be increased, until the paper depreciates; and then, for the first time, the people will seriously look into the manner in which not only their money, but their credit has been squandered.

The provisions of this bill for treasury notes, bills, or other securities, issued by the federal government, or under its authority, if sanctioned by congress, will settle a principle which, if carried into practice, must seal the fate of this nation. Office-holders and office-hunters can all be accommodated by the executive at the public expense, and the people will not be aware of it until too late. In short, it will take off almost the only restraint which yet remains to our extravagant expenditures.

This view of the subject has alarmed me. Do we not all see and know that those in office are pressing to have their salaries increased? That those who are not, desire the number of offices increased that they may get in? We are teased to increase the number of land districts; and if we do, offices are multiplied. When all the offices among the whites are filled, then we have among our red brethren exploring parties, visiting parties, commissioners and agents, by construction, at executive discretion, and compensated as he pleases.

With the facilities of paper money, to be created for the trouble of making, importunities for offices, jobs, contracts an increase of salary, will be multiplied, and the president will not have the heart to resist them when artfully pressed by noisy and worthless partisans. I have been forcibly struck with some of the remarks made upon the subject of this government paper currency. The honorable senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) thinks it will not depreciate, and if it does, it will not make any difference, as the government must always receive it at par, and therefore sustain the whole loss.

Mr. President, if the honorable senator will take a moment to think upon this subject, I am convinced he will perceive the error. No paper currency, not convertible into specie at the will of the holder, ever did or ever will long retain its nominal value.

If a man has a note of any kind, and has confidence that he can get the amount of it in specie at any time he pleases, most generally he would rather have the note than specie, because more convenient; but the moment he doubts, then he wants the specie presently. In the issue of treasury notes, that moment the amount issued much exceeds the revenue to be paid into the treasury, and the purchase of public lands, they must and will depreciate, unless provision is made that they shall be paid when presented at the treasury. When they do depreciate, the whole loss will not fall on the treasury, but will fall likewise on those through whose hands they have passed. The very case put by the senator proves it. A treasury note issues for fifteen dollars. It depreciates until it can be purchased in market for ten. Some person who owes the treasury fifteen dollars, goes and purchases it at ten, and pays his debt of fifteen dollars. Now does not every one perceive that the profit of five dollars, made by the man who paid the note into the treasury, must have been a loss of the same amount to the man from whom he purchased, or to some other person through whose hands it has passed? In all such cases, profit and loss are correlative terms, and that which is one man's gain must have been a loss to some other.

As you increase expenditures you increase executive power, already too great. The president or those acting under his orders, must necessarily select the recipients, who it will always be understood, can only be those who conform to his wishes in elections. These objections are independent of the consideration whether this bill will establish a bank or not. It will certainly sanction the issuing a paper medium of circulation.—Those who advocate this provision certainly think as I do, that the country must and always will have bank credits, or paper of some kind, to use as a substitute for the precious metals. The business of the country can never be done without it. A support of the state banks is the only shield which can be presented against federal bills of credit, and a federal incorporated bank.

I hold both these last unconstitutional, and the first of them infinitely the most dangerous to the liberties of the people. In 1831, I heard of this plan of separating government from all banks as depositories, and thought well of it. Indeed, I would then have gone for it, if political friends had agreed upon it. Then there was no idea of issuing paper money by government. Then state banks were paying specie, and their notes would have continued a circulating medium. Then I had confidence in the administration, and believed that none would ever dare to interfere with the elective franchise, or to refuse to have the executive patronage limited and curtailed by law. Now all these things are changed. The administration want paper money issued by government, substituted for loans. The state banks are not paying specie, and this bill forbids the receipt of their notes.

The executive is disposed to hunt down any and every man who wishes to limit his power. He openly interferes in elections, both state and federal, and uses all his powers to have them carried according to his will. Under these circumstances, in my judgment, I would be a traitor to civil liberty were I to sanction the idea that we will make federal paper the circulating medium.

What has become of our bills, five or six in number, to limit executive patronage, reported in the days of the younger Adams? They sleep the sleep of death. The honorable chairman of the committee, who originally reported them, felt it his duty to endeavor to revive them under the administration of the late president, and received so little countenance from old friends that he ceased his struggle with them.

The honorable senator from South Carolina, who never thinks any load too heavy, took up one of them, and made one of his most powerful efforts, and it passed this body. But how many old friends voted for it? Sir, all had been whistled or ordered off, except the senator from Missouri, and one or two others.

I have been honored with a seat here for the thirteen or fourteen last sessions, and believe I have never once recurred to the journals to see how any gentleman had voted; but there are some things I find it impossible to forget.

When that bill was before the senate, believing that I could give the senator from South Carolina something more than my vote, I made a speech in its favor; and that speech sealed its fate with the great democratic party. I respectfully ask the senator from Missouri, whether any of the former friends of that measure, the Jackson democrats, voted for it, except he and myself?

It went to the other house, and as they were more fresh from the people than we, better understood what is meant by modern democracy, they put this aristocratic banding to sleep; and we have never heard a cry or even a whimper from it since. Since then, executive power and patronage have put forth their branches in every direction, and no man dare raise his voice against them on pain of political death.

Shall we then put this rich bed of manure to the root of this dangerous power, that the crops of executive influence may be increased in our elections? Nay; God forbid!

I have been zealous for putting down the Bank of the United States, and for maintaining a sound metallic currency, and, to do this, believed we ought to sustain, as far as we could, state banks; prevailing on them, by all incidental means in our power, to cease the use of small notes, and had hoped we could have succeeded; but specie payments have been suspended, and the advocates of this bill say we must try some other experiment.

Divorce, divorce, a vinculo matrimonii is the watchword whenever you find a modern democrat.

That there is a divorce, a mensa et thoro existing, I admit, but am of opinion it has been produced by violent temper, and want of due care on the part of the federal head, and too yielding and complying a disposition on the part of the banks, and that the whole might yet be reconciled, at all events to the advantage of the family.

I have heard of cases where a dashing libertine had married a wife, attached to, and every way worthy of him; that he, upon looking farther into the world, concluded if he were freed from his first love, he could be better suited upon a second experiment; and, with a view to obtain a divorce, threw temptations in his wife's way which she had not stern virtue enough to resist; she sinned, and then he applied for a divorce. And what have courts of conscience said in such cases? Depart hence! you contributed to your wife's transgression, and shall not profit by your own iniquity.

Apply these principles to this case. When the executive wooed and won the state banks, they were pure and unsullied. Their utmost exertions were necessary to aid in prostrating the Bank of the United States; they were coaxed, almost commanded, to extend their loans. They did so, to imprudent lengths. The executive saw and knew this. Were they admonished to diminish their discounts? Never! So far as I know, on the contrary, they were eulogised up to July, 1836; then came the executive denunciations, and they have never since ceased.

The executive is to blame, so are the banks; but on account of their quarrel, the great American family ought not to be sacrificed.

If none were to be injured but themselves, I certainly should feel no inclination to interfere; but I do think it nothing but just that both parties should bear their due proportion of blame, and that a separation ought not to be permitted under circumstances by which an unoffending community must be the sufferers.

But again; I think if it is ever proper to establish this system, and to have this divorce, now is not the proper time.

The banks are state institutions; society have a deep interest in their maintaining a sound currency; this can only be done by resuming specie payments; this they never can do until their credit is re-established; while the whole weight of a popular administration is against them, they never can resume with a hope of continuing specie payments. You separate now, and why? Because, say the whole administration and its friends, and if we pass this bill we join in the cry, they are unworthy of credit! Every man who believes this statement, and has a claim against them, would apply for his money, and they would be compelled immediately to stop again.

Take the weight of the federal government off them, it is now pressing them into the dust, and while it is upon them, you might as well order a man, whose legs had been cut off, to jump to his feet and walk, as to require them to resume, with a hope that they can do so. Let their credit be again restored, and if we must separate, they could better then, than now, sustain the shock.

The federal government obtained the use of them when their credit was good; it should be restored, and then, if ever, they ought to be returned, in equally good credit, to the exclusive use of the states.

Suppose we pass this bill, and then the banks resume, five-sixths of the revenue must be taken in their notes; in a very short time, enough would be received to enable your depositories to withdraw so much of their specie as to compel them to suspend. And if they do not resume, their paper depreciates, and specie becomes an article of merchandise, and thus the federal servant will receive better money than the state officers, or the masters of both—the mass of the people.

The state banks never can resume with a hope of doing a profitable business.

Suppose the system in complete operation. Then all the revenue is received in specie, your average surplus in the treasury will be at least seven or eight millions of dollars. This, if left in the banks, would furnish a specie basis upon which safely to issue three for one. Hence, by this process, you abstract and lock up twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars of the circulating medium, which is of no more use to the government or individuals than if sunk in the ocean.

Banks go to excess occasionally, and there is temporary suffering; so of every thing else—we have nothing good but what produces evil when carried to excess. Banks issue too much paper, but that is no reason they should all be destroyed. Over issues produce individual suffering, but even this is productive of some benefit. It makes roads and canals, and improves plantations. Although all these change owners when a curtailment takes place, yet the improvements remain for the benefit of the people at large.

What do gentlemen mean? Do they mean to put us back to the year eleven hundred, when they say banks commenced? Are we to quit our ordinary business, and commence wading branches in search of golden pebbles, to add to the stock of precious metals. Are we to give up the earnings of our families, our porringers, and our spoons to this Aaron of democracy, that he may melt them, and, with his graving tools, make us our own metallic god to worship? The more free a country is, the more prone are its people to run into excess, and none so much as our own. What was Great Britain before the establishment of her bank? Like other nations, who are destitute of every thing but a specie circulation, poor, unthrifty, anti-commercial. And what is she now?

We need a larger circulation than any country upon earth of the same population, because we are freer than any other. The circulation ought always to bear a due proportion to all saleable or exchangeable commodities. In some of the states every thing is of that description. Estates are destroyed, all property, real and personal, is unfettered, and for sale whenever a man thinks he can better himself by selling in an old, and purchasing in a new, state. In many states so much is land unfettered that it can be sold in fee simple up in a writ of feri facias.

In our country a man's capital, in many instances, is his character for integrity, his capacity for business and his business habits. These give him credit with banks. With the aid of bank accommodations, in many instances he makes himself wealthy in a few years, and every man who adds to his own stock of wealth enriches the whole country.

Give me wealthy people and a poor treasury, and then the country is rich, and its liberty safe.

Destroy banks, and you throw every man again into the hands of capitalists, Jews, money-lenders, where few can borrow who cannot mortgage land to secure payment. Whereas banks always feel it a favor conferred on them when they can get a good customer.

Although I speak this freely of the utility of banks, they never have been favorites of mine, but we must have them. The country cannot, and will not do without them.

We must have a treasury bank, a bank incorporated by congress, or state banks. And I prefer the last. They are the least dangerous, and the states have clearly the power to incorporate them. The states, in granting charters, can, if they choose, guard generally against excesses. If they were to direct all profits over six or eight per cent. per annum to go into the treasury, as a school fund, the temptation to shave and to make excessive loans would be taken away. And if they would prohibit standing accommodations, few bad debts would be contracted.

2d. The other object of the bill is to compel our collectors and receivers to cease depositing money in banks, and to compel them to deposit all moneys in the hands of officers appointed by the president, and removable at his pleasure, there to be kept till needed for disbursement. I think this arrangement much worse than to deposit in the banks.

1st. Because the directors and officers of the banks will be more likely to be faithful than officers appointed by us. The stockholders will always intend to select those who will be most likely not to waste their money. Our officers for some time have been, and I consider the system is to be continued, selected more with a view to influence in elections than to any qualifications for the particular offices they are to fill. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean to say that every officer-holder is a mere party tool. I think there are many who are not. But I do mean to state it as my opinion that now, and for some time past, the principal qualification looked for is political influence; and such men appointed from such motives, I think will generally be unsafe depositories. Supposing these officers equally faithful, they will not generally have places as safe as those provided by banks.

Again: This plan will occasion a great increase of expense. New officers, clerks, visiters, houses, safes, vaults, &c. There will be no effectual checks, either upon those officers or upon disbursing officers. It is said there have been, in modern times, but few losses by default of disbursing officers.

One principal, if not the sole reason of this is, the check upon them, by ordering them, whenever their position will enable them to do so, to keep their moneys in banks, and every week or month an account is furnished the secretary of the treasury by the deposit bank, showing the sums deposited, and by whom. This furnishes strong reasons against using or loaning money; immediate detection would be the consequence.

Under the proposed system this check is entirely removed, and the public money will, in many cases, be misused.

I now have in my drawer a document showing what has been done in one case by an officer in whose integrity I once had unlimited confidence. He collected a large claim from one debtor to the government, and immediately loaned the amount received to some political friends, not only without authority, but contrary to his instructions, and, at this moment, two suits are pending against these new debtors, who have refused to pay their notes as they fall due. If I mistake not, one of the parties to this very transaction has been appointed to, and now holds an office which will make him a sub-treasurer if this bill should pass.

A bank in my own state has been alluded to in a letter read by the senator from Missouri, which he has received from the late chief magistrate.

A brief review of the history of that bank, and matters connected with it, may be of use to us on the subject under consideration.

The act establishing that bank was passed at a called session, in the year 1820. The charter of the United States Bank was passed in 1816, and the bank went into actual operation the 1st of January, 1817.

It was an administration measure, and when the bill was before congress, the representative from my district sent me a copy of it, with a request that I would give him my opinion of its provisions, which I did, in a pretty lengthy letter. That opinion was very decidedly against the bill, and the opinion I then formed and expressed I have ever since entertained, and still entertain. He, alone, from Tennessee, as I believe, voted against the bill. For this vote he was attacked at home, and I felt in duty bound to maintain him as well as I could. This brought me in direct conflict with the friends of the United States Bank as early as 1816.

Soon after the bank went into operation, it established branches in Kentucky, and, before the fall of 1817, many of the loans first made had fallen due, and payment was exacted. To this the people had not been accustomed; and, as is always the case, although the bank had been popular when making loans, it soon became very unpopular when trying to collect its debts.

Stories of the ruinous operations of the bank in Kentucky soon reached us in Tennessee, and, in the autumn of 1817, with a view to save Tennessee from the like oppression, her legislature passed an act, as I believe, unanimously, imposing a very heavy tax, say fifty thousand dollars, upon any persons attempting to bank in Tennessee without authority from the state.

A few years since, while the controversy was going on with the Bank of the United States, the senate created a committee, of which Mr. Tyler, of Virginia, was a member, to examine into its proceedings, and when they made their report, for the first time, I found a letter dated in 1813, now bound up in our documents, soliciting the president of the bank to establish a branch in Nashville, notwithstanding the act of assembly, informing him that the act was passed by congress, illiberal men, and, after furnishing a list of names for directors, assuring him that if a branch was established, and directors appointed from the list, he would see that a good account should be given of those who would attempt to enforce the state law.

Mr. Jones, the then president, answered this letter, and, very properly, refused to send a branch into the state, contrary to the expressed will of the legislature.

Thus the matter rested until 1826, when this same gentleman was a leading member of the Tennessee legislature; and, not having been able to get a branch bank of the United States, he and others determined they would have a paper bank, founded on state funds and the faith of the state. They passed an act creating a bank. There was then in the state a bank in which the state had twenty thousand dollars of the stock. It was called the Bank of the State of Tennessee, and had been so conducted as to give society confidence in it; and, in baptizing this new bank, its authors gave it exactly the same name, and thus we had, at the same time, two banks, having the same name, in the same state. The friends of the old would not have hesitated in charging the leaders who established the new with pilfering their name, that they might derive benefit from their credit, had they been other than members of the assembly.

The plan of this new bank was not to pay specie, and to please the people, it was said it was a bank to relieve the people from pecuniary distress.

At the same session, and to force into circulation paper money not redeemable in specie, laws were passed to prevent levies of execution, unless plaintiffs would agree to receive irredeemable bank paper.

These proceedings met with very decided opposition from the supporters of a sound currency.

They denounced a depreciated paper currency as a curse to the country, and the old state bank would not touch the paper of the new; and, after a long controversy between the directors, under the administration of an enlightened and worthy directory of the new state bank, it was so conducted as to be converted into a specie paying bank, and I believe it has faithfully redeemed whatever notes it put in circulation.

But, then, what became of the capital and profits? Much of them were wasted. There was a branch or agency in each county.

The cashier of the principal bank, a highly worthy, intelligent, and generous man, could not resist the temptation; he permitted importunate and needy friends to draw checks, which he paid when they had no funds in bank. This practice was detected, and exposed, and he retired.

Some of the agents, men of as much integrity as those to be found now, either used, or permitted others to use, the moneys entrusted to their care. Those moneys were in some instances lost, the agents ruined, and the state has been for several years endeavoring to save something from the wreck.

With these examples before me, I cannot, I will not, I dare not, give my sanction to a scheme so demoralizing, and fraught with so many mischiefs.

But, sir, our history stops not here. I think, about the year 1836, a Nashville bank failed, and occasioned much excitement. The legislature, then in session, repealed our act of 1817, imposing the tax of which I have spoken; a branch of the United States Bank was applied for, and established. It went down with the principal and the other branches, and from that time, until July, 1836, we were state bank men, generally; these banks having a safe specie basis, and always paying specie. During the whole of these arduous conflicts, others have had an advantage over me.

They first wanted a United States Bank, that we might have a good currency everywhere. Next they wanted paper money, and creditors forced to receive it, or to get nothing; then United States Bank notes again; and now, when the monster is slain, and we can all venture to measure the length and breadth of its supposed deformities, nothing will do them but the pure, unadulterated hard money.

Mr. President, these politicians ever have the advantage of me. I never can give up an old opinion, until I am sure I have found better reasons for a new one. They have the full benefit of what is called the march of mind. They march and counter-march so that I cannot keep pace with them. I turn slowly, awkwardly, and these politicians give me the dodge, and are sometimes out of sight before I know they intend to change. But this is of no consequence to me. Such wills-with-the-wisp or jacks-with-the-lantern I would not follow, if I could see them. They would only pilot me into some quagmire or swamp, and then leave me, although their dexterity could easily extricate themselves.

For myself, I now am, and ever have been a hard money man, to every reasonable and constitutional extent. Nothing is, with me, money, within the meaning of the constitution, but the precious metals, and they either coined, and their value fixed by acts of congress, or foreign coin, whose value is declared in the same way. No government, either state or federal, can make any thing else a tender in payment of debts. This kind of money, and this only, is the end of the law, where pecuniary compensation is to be made. It is not only the standard by which the value of property is to be fixed, but it is itself property, which can be applied to other useful purposes. The federal government has no power to incorporate individuals, and bestow upon them banking powers and privileges, to be exercised within the states.

The federal government cannot issue, or authorize to be issued, paper to be used as currency.

The constitution takes from the states the power to issue bills of credit.

It does not confer upon congress any such power, and it can exercise no power except that which is expressly given, or is necessary and proper to give effect to a power expressly granted. The framers of the constitution having taken from the states the power to issue bills of credit, and having refused or omitted to confer such a power on congress, believed they had secured the country against the issue of a paper currency by either government, which individuals could have no means by suit to compel the payment of, and which, if tolerated, would be sure to depreciate.

Before the constitution of the United States was framed, the state had the power to incorporate individuals, and give them banking powers and privileges; this power was never taken from them, and, therefore, they still possess it.

I have believed, and now do, that in a country so extensive as ours, so highly commercial, and so free, our business cannot be transacted without paper of some kind, which is not money, but credit, the representative of money. These credits will be highly injurious, unless regulated by law. I therefore have maintained state banks, at the same time wishing to put down, by all means in our power, small notes; to have none less than five, ten, twenty, and even higher than that, if a majority wished, so as to furnish a broad specie basis the better to maintain and support the organized credits, evidenced by bank notes or checks.

It is all idle to tell me that the only mode to have hard money is to put down state banks. Put them down to-morrow, and then we will find it indispensable to have a United States Bank owned by individuals, or a treasury bank owned by the United States, and governed at the will of the executive.

Being opposed to both these, and thinking the country must have credits in some shape, I support state banks as the only means of preventing the establishment of some one of the others. I think them both unconstitutional, and the treasury bank infinitely the most dangerous.

We might as well at once put the whole moneys of the government at the disposition of the executive as to pass this bill; because, although some of the officers who are to have charge of it must have the sanction of the senate in their appointment, yet the president can remove, or have removed at his pleasure, every man of them.

This bill, in truth and in fact, creates a bank with vast powers and extensive capacity.

Suppose congress to incorporate a number of individuals, and confer upon them powers to do exactly the same thing which the officers named in this bill are empowered and required to do, what would gentlemen call their institution? It must and would be a bank; they would have all the usual powers of a bank, except to loan money by discounting notes.

The only use of an act of incorporation is to empower a number of individuals, or some one man, to transact certain business under particular restrictions. Now if we give to our own officers exactly the same powers which, if given to one or more individuals, would denominate the establishment a bank, it is equally so in both cases.

This bill provides places where our whole treasure, hard money, notes of specie-paying banks, treasury notes, or other paper issued under the authority of the government, are to be kept.

It authorizes the transfers and re-transfers of those moneys from point to point, at the discretion of the secretary. There is now a bill before the other house authorizing an issue of ten millions of treasury notes; it will certainly pass for that or a larger sum.

Now let us consider how these powers will be made to operate.

1st. The capital is the whole treasure of the nation, say any sum we please not less than twenty-five, nor more than fifty millions of dollars.

This sum can be concentrated at one place, or dispersed to different places, as the secretary chooses. A merchant of New York owes fifty thousand dollars for duties, and this sum he is to pay to the collector there, who is to deposit it in his vault. He borrows the amount from a specie-paying bank in the notes of the state bank, and pays the debt. Instantly the collector goes to the bank, draws the specie, and returns its notes, and locks the specie up in the vault, where he is to keep it till needed for disbursement; and by pursuing this plan the whole specie may be withdrawn from the banks, or so much of it as to compel the banks to wind up.

Again: a merchant in Nashville owes fifty thousand dollars for goods purchased in New York; he gets that amount in notes of the Nashville banks, by borrowing or otherwise, but they will not answer to pay his debt in New York; he therefore goes to the sub-treasurer, who has his proportion of these treasury notes, and gives him his fifty thousand dollars, and receives a treasury note, or notes, and perhaps allows one per cent. as the difference of exchange, and the sub-treasurer immediately goes to the state bank, returns its notes, takes the specie and locks it up in the vault. When a creditor of the government applies for payment of his salary, or other dues, he may be paid in treasury notes, and thus we find this is a bank of issues.

It is useless to pursue this subject farther. Every practical man must see this in substance a treasury bank, with immense funds as a capital, with unlimited power to draw and redraw, and that it is a bank to issue not hard money alone, but paper money, issued by or under the authority of the United States. That it confers powers and capacities which will enable it to prostrate the state banks, any and every where, at its pleasure.

It will not only control the state banks, and make them subservient to its will, but will also influence all men engaged in commerce, which requires the use of funds at distant places.

Pass this bill, and we put it in the power of the president, through his secretary of the treasury, to control the whole pecuniary, active capital of the country. We are to add this tremendous power to a patronage already dangerous in the extreme, and this at a time when we have a chief magistrate who is not only unwilling to have his power and patronage curtailed and limited, but is desirous to add to them, even to the extent of encouraging armed voluntary associations to stand ready to carry out his views by force of arms.

In the early and pure days of the republic, in 1789, the republican doctrine was, that no president would ever dare to remove an officer who held office at the will of the president, simply on account of his politics; and, if he did, Mr. Madison said it would be a crime for which he should be impeached.

Mr. Jefferson, upon assuming the reins of government, prohibited all inferior officers from interfering in elections, further than to vote, on pain of dismissal.

In the canvass, which brought the late president into office, we all thought the same way, and that this was the sound democratic or republican doctrine.

Do we not all remember the out-cry against Mr. Adams, because we thought, through a Mr. Slade, a clerk in some of the departments, he had signified to the Vermont legislature that he preferred the old senator, Mr. Seymour, to Mr. Van Ness? The newspapers rung with this charge, and if Mr. Adams or his cabinet had avowed that they had a right to endeavor to influence people in elections, it is doubtful how he would have got through even the four years to which he had been elected.

Now the whole course of thinking and acting is changed.

During the last administration it was not only maintained that the president and all under him had a right to interfere, but, for the sake of securing a democratic administration, it was a duty to aid in electing his successor, members to both houses of congress, governors of states, &c.

The present incumbent improves upon this, and countenances what may be called legions of honor, to maintain him by force in carrying out modern democracy.

I have been surprised that in none of our discussions has any gentleman alluded to a correspondence between an association in Philadelphia and the chief magistrate during the past year.

They informed him that they had voluntarily associated together, had armed and equipped themselves, and made a tender of their services to carry out the laws.

In a country as free as ours, where the laws themselves are nothing but the will of a majority of the people, constitutionally expressed, every thing which tends to weaken or diminish our respect for the laws is highly reprehensible. Now what would we reasonably expect as an answer from our chief magistrate to such a tender of services?

I looked for grateful acknowledgments for their good feelings towards him, and a request that, as they regarded him and his fame, they would immediately lay aside their warlike implements and dissolve the association; because, if the country was to remain free, such voluntary associations could never be necessary. Public opinion, and forces, when indispensable, called out under the authority of law, would always be sufficient in the hands of the executive to give effect to the will of the people, expressed through their acts of congress.

But I was sorry to find no such sentiments; on the contrary, sincere thanks, and a manifest willingness to countenance the use of such forces if emergency should require their services.

The good sense of society must check this course of thinking, or there is reason to fear that, at no distant day, we may have, through the agency of such means, anarchy first, and then despotism.

The senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) at the close of his reply to the senator from South Carolina, "for his special benefit," in very good temper, and in a most happy manner, referred to the early history of that portion of my state, now called East Tennessee, once known as the state of Franklin. He read us a part of one of her acts of assembly, which fixed the salaries of some of her officers, and directed the species of currency in which they were to be paid.

I always feel gratified when I know, or hear, that my state has done any thing which benefits any portion of my fellow-men.

"Blessed are the peace-makers," is the language of holy writ. On this occasion the two honorable and distinguished senators had assumed an attitude so beligerent that I really feared it might end in something worse than words. But no sooner were the labors of my state fifty years ago brought to the notice of this grave body, than we all forgot that any of us had ever been out of temper, and so soon as we could recover composure enough to adjourn, we separated like a band of brothers—no two leaving the chamber in better temper with each other than the two honorable senators.

But, sir, the senator knew nothing of the practice under the state law, therefore we have not the full benefit which we ought to derive from his reminiscence. He could have related the whole incidents so much better than I can, that I regret he did not mention this subject to me before he addressed the senate: if he had I would have given him the additional facts, that the whole might have been detailed to the senate in his good tempered and felicitous manner.

It will be remembered that the governor, chief justice, and some other officers, were to be paid in Deer skins, other inferior officers were to be paid in Raccoon skins. Now, at that day, we were all good whigs, although we had some of the notions of the democrats of the present day.

We thought these taxes might safely remain in the hands of the collectors as sub-treasures until wanted for disbursement. The taxes were, therefore, fairly collected in the skins and peltry pointed out in the law. But the collectors, as report says, knew that although Raccoon skins were plenty, Opossum skins were more so, and that they could be procured for little or nothing. They, therefore, procured the requisite numbers of Opossum skins, cut the tails off the Raccoon skins, sewed them to the Opossum skins, paid them into the general or principal treasury, and sold the Raccoon skins to the hatters.

The treasurer had been an unlucky appointment, although a worthy man; he was a foreigner, knew nothing of skins or peltry, and was, therefore, easily deceived by his sub-treasurers. Whenever this imposition was discovered, the whole system went down, and we never have had a great fancy for leaving the taxes in the hands of the sub-treasurers or collectors from that day to this.

But, sir, these old proceedings more clearly developed the true character of my state than almost any thing of the present day.

The territory or tract of country called Franklin was composed of four counties of North Carolina, and separated from the body of the state by the great ledge of mountains, called at different places by different names, and from what is now West Tennessee by the Cumberland mountains, and a wilderness of two hundred miles.

The revolutionary war had terminated with Great Britain in 1783, but it continued with the powerful tribes of Indians who had been in alliance with her. The depredations of these Indians were so serious that aid to arrest their ravages was desired from North Carolina; that state was not in a situation to furnish protection, and instead thereof, from good motives, no doubt, but without due consideration, passed an act ceding us to the United States. Whenever the news was received, the leading men, who were King's mountain men—Sevier, the companion of the gallant Campbell and Shelby, at their head, took fire; the discontent ended in a declaration of independence, and the formation of the state called, to perpetuate our whig principles, "Franklin."

North Carolina discovered her error, and, before congress could act on the subject, repealed her act of cession. But it was too late. We had been disposed of without our consent. Though but a handful, with a powerful savage enemy infesting our whole frontier, and without a dollar to begin with, we set up for ourselves. We would not brook the indignity; we had begun the fight for liberty, and liberty or death we would have. We continued the controversy till 1793, when an accommodation with our parent state took place; and with our own consent, and upon terms thought just, we, with other portions of territory, were ceded, in 1793, to the United States.

In 1796, we became the state of Tennessee, and how we have since conducted, I willingly leave to the judgment of our sister states.

I confess, instead of feeling humbled by, I am proud of, this ancient reminiscence. I feel proud that my ancestor was one of that unyielding band; that I now find myself associated here with a Sevier and a Tipton; and although I sometimes think two generations back those of their name would not have worked so tamely in party gear, yet every once in a while the blood shows itself, and you can see, that if their home concerns are not attended to here, according to what is just, they break party bandages, and walk abroad in that freedom for which their fathers periled every thing.

It is true we are neither whigs, tories, or democrats by inheritance, but there is much in blood, much in education. Early lessons from mothers are apt to have an influence upon us through life. What the father says when he first sends his boy to school is hardly ever forgotten.

When that law was passed, and for years afterward, the first morning the son was to start for school, he was sure to receive the father's advice, in emphatic terms, calculated to make a lasting impression, in language like the following: My son, you are now going to school, you must render a willing obedience to your master; he is in my place, obey him, if you love me. Be kind to all your school-fellows, do nothing offensive or unjust to them. Be careful in all you say, and do not give any of them cause of offence, and, if they will quarrel with and abuse you, take care you never come home whipped by any one of them, if you have the power to prevent it.

Children were taught from infancy the doctrine of equality, that no distinction ought to exist except that which was produced by vice or virtue.

And as to a circulating medium, this old act contains a volume of instruction for me. At that day, the medium of our exchanges was skins and peltry, or furs. They were the currency in which the people were obliged to transact their business, and my father, when voting for that law, thought it just that our officers, from the governor to the constable, should be paid in the same kind of currency which the people were compelled to use in their dealings with each other, and so think I now as to our federal officers. Such, I think, have been the opinions of a majority of my constituents from my youth to this day.

My wish is to carry into effect their will. If I had fortitude enough to venture into an unknown world, I would rather do so now, and upon this spot, than knowingly to give a vote upon a subject so important, which would disappoint the wishes of the companions, of my youth, the associates of my maturer years, and those who have ever sustained me against all attacks, at every stage of life.

What I believe to be their will, corresponds with my own judgment on this subject; and, however much I may and do regret a difference of opinion with enlightened men from other states, yet I acknowledge no responsibility to any human power except to the citizens of my own state who have so long honored me with their confidence.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

May 3. The Vice President presented a report from the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of a senate resolution, communicating information on the subject of the public lands in the mining country of Wisconsin and the northern part of Illinois. Read, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a report from the secretary of war, on the subject of the fortifications of the United States, in pursuance of a resolution of the senate. Read, and ordered to be printed.

The following, among other petitions, were presented. By Mr. Buchanan: Four memorials, signed by a large number of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, urgently requesting congress not to pass the international copy-right bill.

[These memorials, Mr. B. said, state that a capital of $30,000,000 or more is now embarked in the different branches of the manufacture of books, affording employment to thousands of men, women, and children; and that to pass this law would do great injury to the owners of this capital and all whom it employs. The memorialists also state that this law would considerably enhance the price of books to the citizens of our country, who, instead of purchasing them as they now do at a rate so cheap as to place it in the power of every poor man to improve his mind, would then be obliged to pay such large prices as greatly to reduce the number of purchases, and to deprive the poorer class of our citizens altogether from the benefits and enjoyments of foreign literature. They contend that there is no obligation of justice requiring the United States thus to injure its own citizens by enhancing the price of foreign books; and that it is sufficient for each country to grant copy-rights to its own authors. Mr. B. said these were strong views of the subject, and demanded the most grave consideration from congress and the country. He would not now anticipate the debate which must hereafter arise on the question, but he asked senators to keep their minds open until they could hear both sides. If it were generous and liberal to patronize foreign authors, it was our duty to take care that this should not be done by sacrificing the rights of our own citizens.]

The memorials were referred to the committee on patents.

Also, by Mr. B. four memorials from citizens of the county of Philadelphia, against the annexation of Texas to the United States. Laid on the table.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported a bill to authorize the sale of the bonds of the Bank of the United States belonging to the government of the United States. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. Williams, the claim of Richard B. Mason was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Benton, call was made on the secretary of the treasury for a condensed statement of the condition of the state banks, according to the latest returns received at the treasury; also, the returns on which said statement may be founded.

The bill granting the right of way for roads and canals through the public lands, to states and incorporated companies, was read a third time, and, after a short discussion between Messrs. Lyon, Tipton, Clay, of Alabama, and King, growing out of an objection of Mr. Lyon to the bill in its present shape, it was passed, and sent down to the other house for concurrence.

The bill to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of Missouri and Arkansas, (establishing a confederate territorial government of the emigrant tribes) was read a third time, amended by consent, on motion of Mr. Linn, by striking out Neosho (the Osage word for "clear water") and substituting "Indian territory," as the name of the territory, and then passed by the following vote, and sent to the other house for concurrence, viz:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fullton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Niles, Norvell—6.

The senate then took up Mr. Clay's joint resolution, as heretofore stated, which occupied the remainder of the day.

May 4. A message was received from the president of the United States by Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary.

The Vice President presented a communication from the secretary of war, with a report of the second auditor, in pursuance of the act of May, 1827, to regulate the intercourse with the Indian tribes. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Southard presented a remonstrance against carrying into execution the late alleged treaty with the Cherokees. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Swift presented a remonstrance of the same kind, from inhabitants of Dorset, Vermont. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Roane presented a memorial from the friendship fire company of Alexandria, praying aid from congress. Referred. Mr. Linn presented a memorial on the subject of establishing an agricultural and mechanical department of the government. Referred. Mr. Spence presented the petition of Daniel Job, for a pension as a revolutionary soldier.

Also, a petition of Jacob Jeffers, for bounty in land and money as a revolutionary soldier. Severally referred.

Mr. Fulton, from the committee on the public lands, reported a joint resolution in behalf of Verapian Ellis, which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

On motion of Mr. Linn, it was ordered that when the senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday; and then,

On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate adjourned.

May 7. The Vice President presented a communication from the treasury department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of the 2d instant, with a condensed statement of the condition of the state banks employed as depositories of the public money according to the latest returns. Referred and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster rose and said he had particular pleasure in presenting the memorial of certain officers of the army, praying congress to repeal a part of the law which allows whiskey to soldiers on fatigue duty. These persons, most competent certainly to judge, are of opinion that this allowance should be discontinued. They think the substitute provided for other cases would be most usefully applied to this also. So decisive a testimonial in favor of the great cause of temperance ought to have much weight. If ardent spirits may be beneficially and usefully dispensed with by soldiers on fatigue duty, it would be difficult to maintain the necessity of their use by persons in any occupation or employment. Mr. W. said the petition was short, and, in order to give it its proper effect and consideration, he would move that it be printed, and that it be referred to the committee on military affairs. The petition was as follows:

To the honorable senators and representatives of the United States in congress assembled: The undersigned, officers of the United States army, beg leave respectfully to represent that, in their opinion, the substitution of sugar and coffee for the whiskey part of the ration allowed to soldiers has been productive of great good to the service, and also the means of preserving the health, efficiency and happiness, and frequently effecting the moral reformation of that part of our army. And sincerely believing that the gill of whiskey still allowed to men on fatigue duty, by the act of congress passed March 2, 1819, not only fails to answer the end for which it was granted, but contributes, in a great degree, to form and keep alive habits of intemperance, the legitimate results of which are insubordination, disease and crime, we therefore respectfully and ardently petition your honorable body to repeal so much of said act as relates to the subject.

L. A. BIRDBALL,

Assistant surgeon U. S. army.

A. G. BLANCHARD,

1st lieut. 3d regiment U. S. infantry.

I. H. EATON,

2d lieut. 3d infantry U. S. A.

Camp on Sabine lake, La., Feb. 25, 1838.

The petition was referred to the committee on military affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The following petitions, among others, were presented. By Mr. Webster: From Edward Everett and others, of Boston; from Samuel Fessenden and others, of Portland; from several citizens of the city of New London, Connecticut; from citizens of the county of Oneida, New York; from citizens of Holliston, Massachusetts, and from several other lances; all remonstrating against the late alleged treaty with the Cherokees, expressing the opinion that it was not conformable to the wishes of the majority of the tribe, and praying that its execution might not be forced upon them. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Williams presented resolutions of the legislature of Maine in relation to the northeastern boundary, to fortifications in that state, and to another subject, (unheard.) Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the committee on the judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the counterfeiting of treasury notes and other public obligations and securities.

The senate then took up the bill to increase the salary of the commissioner of the general land office. Mr. Buchanan said he should like to know the reason for the increase of salary proposed by this bill. He was opposed to the increase of any salary, unless it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said the reason was to be paid in the comparatively high qualifications and great amount of duty of a commissioner of the general land office, which he proceeded to specify, and to compare with those of other officers with higher present salaries.

Mr. Buchanan said he had no doubt of the qualifications and merits of the present commissioner, but that was out of the question. The true question was, whether in the existing state of the treasury congress ought to set an example of increasing salaries, which would not fail to be followed up by increasing the salaries of other officers. If such increase were to be made at all, Mr. B. would propose to increase especially the salaries of the two assistant postmasters general. But he was opposed to any increase at this time; and in order to test the sense of the senate on this subject, he demanded the yeas and nays on engrossing the bill, which were ordered.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to lay the bill on the table for the present. Negatived.

The questions were then put on engrossing the bill for a third reading; which was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Moulton, Robinson, Sevier, Young—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Spence, Swift, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright—29.

So the bill was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate took up the bill to authorize the sale of the bonds (the 2d and 3d instalments, about $3,000,000,) given to the government by the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, for the government stock in the late Bank of the United States, and due next September and September, 1839.

Mr. Wright made a brief statement of the destitute condition of the treasury, of which the whole present amount of means, as he had just learned from the secretary of the treasury, was but about $700,000. The committee, he said had waited some time for the passage of a bill in the other house which would afford relief to the treasury; and as it was not deemed proper for the senate to originate revenue bills, the committee had resorted to this measure as the best, if not the only one, which the senate could originate for the relief of the treasury.

Mr. Webster said, if it should be thought wise by those who had the power and the responsibility of managing the financial affairs of the country to adopt this measure, he should not oppose it. It was not a measure, however, which he himself should have recommended. We have never before, so far as I know, in the history of the government, farmed out our revenues, or income, or taken them up in advance, or relieved the wants of the treasury other wise than by treasury notes, or loans, on the credit of the government. This selling out of obligations due to us is new, and in this case, he thought, not the measure called for by the state of the treasury.

There are three of these bonds, amounting to about two millions each, with some addition of interest, payable respectively in September of this and the two succeeding years. It is proposed to sell the two last of these bonds, provided they can be sold at or above par. They are to be sold without guaranty, and on the credit of the bank alone. That this credit is, and ought to be, perfectly good, I entertain, said Mr. W. no doubt, although great doubts of the ability and solvency of this debtor to the government are expressed and repeated, even while government is thus proposing to make sale of the debt.

My doubt of the practicability of making sale of the bonds within the conditions of the bill, does not arise from any suspicion that any body will question the credit of the bank, or doubt about the punctual payment of the bonds. But the purchaser will naturally inquire, in what medium, or what currency, will these bonds be paid? Will they be certain to be paid in gold and silver? Or will their probably be, when these bonds come to maturity, treasury notes in circulation, or other paper, which shall be receivable, by law, in debts and dues to government; and is there not danger, if there shall be, that such treasury notes, or other paper, will be below the value of gold and silver?

This is the point, I think, likely to create hesitation. Whatever government receives in payment, the holders of these bonds must receive whoever they may be; unless it be certain, therefore, that government will hereafter receive nothing, in discharge of debts due it, but gold and silver, it is not certain that these bonds will be paid in gold and silver. It is understood that the bond which fell due in September last was paid, in great part, by government paper, which was several per cent. below the value of specie. Money dealers have sharp eyes, and are very likely to look to what may happen in this respect; and, therefore, I think, it is hardly worth while to make an attempt to sell the bonds. Still the treasury may be better informed on the subject; and if the secretary and the honorable chairman think they may be sold for cash, at par, I shall not oppose the bill. I should not have recommended it, however, for another reason. It is not adequate to the exigency. It does not meet the case. It will not furnish sufficient funds to enable the administration to carry on the government. If this sale should be made, there must still be a loan, or the issue of treasury notes.

The chairman of the committee has certainly stated a very strong case. He has put forth the state of the treasury fully and frankly. He states a more forlorn case, even, than I have heard stated before, or than ever was stated before, I believe, in the history of this government. He says, one of the usual, ordinary, annual appropriation bills, having passed the house of representatives, is now before the committee. It is the annual navy bill; and this bill, he says, the committee does not report to the senate, simply because, if it pass into a law, it will create demands that the treasury cannot meet. In other words, the treasury is not in a condition to meet the ordinary payments for the support of the navy. This is certainly a most extraordinary state of things. It deserves to attract strongly the public attention.

The honorable member's plain and direct admission is really astounding. The officers and seamen of the navy cannot be paid for want of means in the treasury! The annual appropriation bill, for this branch of the public service, cannot be passed, because, if it were passed, the discredit of government would be open and notorious! And is this admitted to be the true state of things to which we have arrived? If this be so, something much more efficient than this measure is due to the occasion.

I can well conceive a state of things in which some use might be made of these bonds. If government and the bank were on good terms, I have no doubt the bank would answer drafts made upon it by government in the common course of disbursements, and charge their amount against these bonds; thus itself anticipating their payment. But no such thing is proposed. The plan is to sell the bonds, all at once, and place the amount in the treasury. Whether this is likely to be done, is with me a matter of doubt. The administration, however, may have ascertained this point, perhaps, and may expect to find no difficulty. But if this should prove to be the case, still the measure is by no means an adequate measure.

The honorable chairman says he can think of no other measure which it is competent for the senate to originate; that the senate cannot originate a loan bill, or a treasury note bill; or, at least, that the house of representatives dispute its authority to either. But is this a sufficient reason? Both houses must, of course, agree to any bill to make it a law. Wherever it originates, both must concur. It seems, therefore, no sufficient reason for proposing this measure, that the senate can propose no other.

We are to take it for granted that those who have the power to originate the proper measures will do their duty.

Mr. Wright said he would not occupy the time of the senate in explaining this bill; it went far to explain itself; and he would only say, that in his own view, and as a matter of information through the whole country, the credit of this institution was very high; but it was evident to him and to others, in regard to the treasury, that present means were to be provided by various legislation of congress, and must be raised by them in some way or other. It was obvious that it might be done by issuing treasury notes, or by the sale of these bonds. Mr. W. had been informed that money was at a low rate in England, and as these bonds were at six per cent. they might be disposed of there, if not in this country. The committee did not propose to sell the bonds due in September next; but one of those which they proposed to sell had one year from the 1st of October next to run, and the other two years from that time. These bonds were for $2,250,000 each at par value, but they would amount to less than that, as interest was to be deducted. The attention of the committee had been called to this subject by a special resolution of the senate, and Mr. W. could not feel otherwise than in favor of the measure. If the senate thought the committee were mistaken, they might refuse to pass the bill; but at all events it could make the treasury no worse. The committee were of opinion that if these bonds should go abroad for a market, and even if they should be disposed of at home, the avails would not be received in time to render necessary other measures to relieve the treasury.

Mr. Webster said this was simply a question of propriety, prudence, and financial fitness. Will this measure prove beneficial to the country, by relieving, in a proper manner, the wants of the treasury? I doubt this; and that doubt is founded in an apprehension that purchasers may not be certain in what medium the bonds may be paid. The honorable member says, we can do nothing with that; that is a question which must be left to those who propose to purchase. If they have doubt on that head, he says, they will not buy. This is all very true. But is it worth while to resort to an expedient to raise money, which may be met with such an objection; and which, if it meet with no difficulty in the execution, is yet insufficient to supply our wants, and will, therefore, not supersede the necessity of other measures?

It is proposed to attempt a sale of these bonds in Europe. Are we to stay here till we know the result of that attempt? I hope that we have not before us such a prospect as that.

On the whole, sir, though I repeat that I do not make any strenuous opposition to the bill, yet it is a measure which, if my counsels prevailed, would not be adopted, as I think it of doubtful success, and, if successful to the fullest extent, still falling short altogether of the public necessities.

Mr. Wright said, if the purchasers were not satisfied that he would receive payment for the bonds in a medium acceptable to him, he of course would not purchase. But Mr. W. believed there would be no difficulty on this point. If congress should authorize the issue of treasury notes, it would be, as heretofore, to such an amount as the treasury might require, not to exceed a certain limit. Mr. W. admitted that this limit would be just as high as if this bill should not pass; but, if it passed, it might lessen the amount of treasury notes which would be actually issued.

After a few words of rejoinder by Mr. Webster—the bill was passed to a third reading.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to authorize the erection of a hospital in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

The question being on a former motion of Mr. Sevier to strike out the words "and others" from the bill, thus limiting its benefits, as it was understood, to indigent seamen and soldiers,

Mr. Roane and Mr. Williams spoke briefly in opposition to the amendment; whereupon Mr. Sevier so modified his amendment as to extend the benefits of the bill to citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, spoke in favor of the amendment, and against the large appropriation ($50,000) proposed in the bill.

Mr. Buchanan said he was very glad to perceive that the lesson on economy which had just been taught his honorable friend from Alabama had proved effectual; and Mr. B. would assure him that he would follow his lead, and be a soldier under his command in all reasonable reductions of expenditures.

Mr. Williams spoke warmly against the amendment, especially as it would turn out many from the poor-house who had already been received, and who were not citizens of this district.

Mr. Niles spoke at some length in general opposition to the bill.

Mr. Southard spoke against the amendment, and with much feeling and earnestness in favor of the bill. He hoped it would be passed in the shape in which it had been reported to the senate. There could be no difference of opinion as to the object of the bill; and were it in a state legislature, and for the benefit of a state, there could be no occasion for arguments in its favor. The bill, he said, was not designed to give permanent support to those belonging to other places, but to save them from suffering till they could be removed. If this duty were a burden on the government, it was one which could not be avoided without inhumanity. The seat of government being here, brought great numbers to this place in pursuit of claims or pensions, and were left destitute and totally dependent on public charity to keep them from starving.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, spoke briefly in favor of the amendment, and of reducing the appropriation in the bill. He argued that government should be just to itself and faithful to its trust, rather than to listen too readily to the calls of generosity or humanity.

Mr. Roane advocated the bill with much earnestness and warmth of feeling. No one, he said, would he yield to on the subject of economy; but he argued that it was the duty of every community to provide for those unfortunate classes of persons among them who are unable to provide for themselves. If this was not a seaport, it was the metropolis of the nation, where all classes congregated, soldiers and sailors, especially, who were in quest of aid from the government, for the helpless and suffering, among whom the government ought to provide at least temporary relief and protection.

Mr. Williams estimated the number of insane in this district at about forty, taking into view the general proportion of this class to the rest of the population. He also spoke further in favor of the bill and against the amendment.

The amendment conferring the benefits of this bill to residents of this district, was agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Trotter, Wall, White, Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Southard Spence, Swift, Webster, Williams, Young—18.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the appropriation of $50,000 in the bill was reduced, and limited to $30,000.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Roane gave notice that he should on Wednesday next, ask the senate to take up the bill relating to the affairs of the District of Columbia.

The senate took up the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Benton having signified his desire to speak on this bill to-morrow,

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

May 8. A message was received from the house, through their clerk, announcing the death of the hon. Joab Lawler, member of the house from Alabama, and informing the senate that his funeral would take place to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, from the hall of the house.

Mr. King then rose and addressed the senate as follows:

Mr. President: Another of the members of this congress has passed from time to eternity. This unexpected event is well calculated to produce the most serious reflections. "Be ye also ready," should be deeply impressed upon every heart. The hon. Joab Lawler, a representative from the state of Alabama, breathed his last at his boarding house in this city, about 9 o'clock this morning. His sickness was of short duration; but a life devoted to piety and virtue enabled him to look with calm and christian resignation on the dread change that awaited him.

Mr. Lawler, Mr. President, was of humble origin. He was destitute of the advantages of a liberal education; but a vigorous intellect, combined with sterling integrity, early recommended him to the favorable notice of his fellow citizens, and they placed him in the legislature of his state. For years he continued to discharge his duties in that situation in a manner so creditable to himself, so satisfactory to those he represented, that they demanded his services in a more exalted station. He yielded to their wishes, and twice has been chosen to represent their interests in the congress of the United States. Mr. President, his mortal career has closed. His country has lost the services of one of her most virtuous citizens; his bereaved wife, an affectionate husband, and his orphan children, the fostering care and protection of an indulgent father. To that desolate, heart-stricken family I would say, "mourn not as one without hope." The husband, the father, was a christian. He died as a christian dieth, in the full hope of a blessed immortality. Keep, then, before your eyes the purity and holiness of his life; live as he lived, and you may go to him; to you he can never return.

On motion of Mr. King, the senate resolved unanimously to attend the funeral of the hon. Mr. Lawler, at the time and place appointed, and to wear crape round the left arm for thirty days, in respect to the memory of the deceased; as a farther token of which, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 7. The following, on leave, were presented by the Speaker:

A communication from the secretary of war, transmitting a report from the commanding general of the army, accompanied by a copy of that of major Belknap "with respect to the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Sabine river," called for by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 1st inst.

A communication from the secretary of war, in compliance with a resolution of the house of the 19th of March last, relative to the progress made in issuing patents for land in the state of Louisiana, and the examination of certificates of purchase under the pre-emption law of 1834.

Among the resolutions offered was the following by Mr. Gray:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of five persons, be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing permanent contracts to be made with the different railroad companies, or such of them as may be willing to make permanent contracts for the transportation of the mail, public property, and troops of the United States from the seat of government to lake Erie and lake Ontario, upon such terms and such restrictions as may be prescribed by law.

The resolution was amended by striking out "consisting of five persons be appointed to," and inserting therein, "on the post office and post roads," and also by striking out all of the same after "United States," (so as to make the inquiry general, instead of confining it to a particular case,) and agreed to by the house.

On motion of Mr. Miller,

Resolved, That the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from Huntsville, in Randolph county, Missouri, by Johnson Wright's, to Mocar court-house, in said state.

One or two petitions were received, (as were also the above motions,) by general consent. The presentation of other petitions was objected to, and refused.

Mr. Cambreleg hoped the house would consent to go into the transaction of public business of an urgent nature. He hoped no objection would be interposed to this, and sent a resolution to the chair, proposing to take up the bills which have been referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

To the presentation of this, at this time, Mr. Adams objected. Leave had been refused him to present petitions, after others had had that permission, and he should therefore object to any thing which should postpone the orders of the day.

Mr. Cambreleg moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of presenting his resolution; and upon this motion he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house refused to suspend the rules, by a vote of 112 yeas to 57 nays—two thirds required.

The duel reports.

Mr. Sawyer rose and said that he had voted frankly and aboveboard on this whole question, and he was now disposed to put gentlemen to the test, and, before he sat down, should move a proposition for that purpose. What good, he would ask, was to be attained by this debate? What end arrived at? This was but the chrysalis state of a question, involving, in every stage of its progress, much exacerbation, ill feeling, and disaster. What spectacle was presented to the eye of the American people, who were looking to congress for some kind of action, if not for relief? They had been in session for five months, and had done absolutely nothing for the relief of the country. Every important measure was yet unacted on—all was uncertain, while they were engaged in a vain crusade after their lost or invaded privileges. He deemed this whole course of proceeding, thus far, irregular, a malum usque ad ovis; and he thought it high time it should be arrested. He admonished gentlemen that, if they persisted in this course, he should introduce instructions to the select committee to report in favor of rescinding the resolution of the 28th of February last. He was opposed to this making one party a subject of mourning, and the other of ostracism.

Mr. S. then passed an eulogy upon the course pursued in this matter by Mr. Adams, who, he said, had nobly stepped forward, the advocate of the privileges of that body, and the defender of popular rights. He closed by moving to lay the whole subject on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. Grantland made an effort to obtain permission to say a few words, but the chair decided it to be not in order. Mr. Murray asked if a vote of two-thirds would be required to take up this question, if laid on the table. The Chair decided that, being a question of privilege, it would at all times be in order to take it up, on motion, without a suspension of the rules. The motion of Mr. Sawyer was lost—yeas 48, nays 131.

The Chair then stated the question as it was left at the adjournment on Thursday last. It was debated by Messrs. Rariden, Reed, Grantland, Dunson, and Rives, the latter gentleman moving to postpone the further consideration of the subject till the first day of June next. On which motion he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

This proposition was debated by Messrs. River, Menefee, and Bynum; and was then withdrawn by the mover. The pending amendment was then debated further by Messrs. Bynum and Thompson.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Reed to that of Mr. Loomis, to add to the instructions to the committee the words "and if a member prove to be involved, they shall not proceed against him, but shall make a special report of that fact to the house;" and this motion of Mr. Reed was negative—yeas 79, nays 82.

The amendment of Mr. Loomis was then in order.

Mr. Dunson moved to lay the whole of the papers on the table, and to print the journal and evidence.

Mr. Briggs asked for a division of this question; and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the first part of the motion [to lay it on the table] was rejected by the following vote—yeas 56, nays 163.

Mr. Sibley then offered an amendment, calling for the names of all the members implicated, which was accepted as a modification of his own by Mr. Loomis.

The question was then further discussed by Messrs. Bynum, Duncan and Thomas. Further motions to amend, to lay on the table, to print, to postpone, &c. were offered, and discussed by various members (of which debate, as well as that upon the other questions presented during this day's session, a report will hereafter be given.)

Mr. Sibley having the floor, gave way to Mr. Fillmore, who moved that the house adjourn.

Mr. Petrikin asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house (at 20 minutes before 5 o'clock) refused to adjourn, by a vote of 56 yeas to 163 nays.

Mr. Sibley resumed the floor, and spoke at length. After he had concluded, Mr. Underwood took the floor, and moved an adjournment. Mr. Petrikin moved the yeas and nays. Ordered.

Mr. Underwood withdrew the motion to adjourn. It was immediately renewed, the yeas and nays ordered, and the house (at five minutes before 6 o'clock) by a vote of 82 yeas to 73 nays, adjourned.

Tuesday, May 8. Immediately after the reading of the journal, Mr. Lyon, of Alabama, rose and addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I have the melancholy duty to perform of announcing to this house the death of one of its members.

My friend and colleague, the hon. JOAB LAWLER, expired this morning at his lodgings in this city, after a brief and painful illness, which he bore with unusual fortitude and resignation.

Less than a week ago, and he was present in his place in this hall, in the performance of his part in the laborious duties assigned by the people to their representatives. He was yet in the prime of life, and has been cut off in the midst of his usefulness.

By his death, his immediate constituents and his state have lost an attentive, intelligent, and faithful representative; his family have been deprived of a husband and father; and society has lost a member whose conduct, in every relation of life, was worthy of all imitation.

The deceased enjoyed the confidence and esteem of those who knew him, to an extent which nothing but a course of life the most exemplary, and a character the most irreproachable, could have secured.

In his state he had filled several offices of much importance, and under the general government he held, for several years, a trust of great responsibility. In all his official conduct in the various public stations held by him, he acquired a high character for integrity and capacity, which no act of his life forfeited or impaired.

His conduct as a member of this house has been in character with his whole life. While he was firm and unwavering in the discharge of what he considered his duty as a representative, he was mild and unobtrusive in his deportment, and respectful towards his associates. He had lived the life of a christian, and died without apprehension as to the future.

To testify our regret for his loss and respect for his memory, I move the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will attend the funeral of Joab Lawler, deceased, late a member of this house from the state of Alabama, to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take order for superintending the funeral of Joab Lawler, deceased.

Resolved, That the members and officers of this house will testify their respect for the memory of Joab Lawler, by wearing crape on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That when this house adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the senate to notify that body of the death of Joab Lawler, late a representative from the state of Alabama, and that his funeral will take place to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, from the hall of the house of representatives.

The several resolutions were unanimously agreed to by the house; and then

The house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 9, 1838. Pursuant to order, the house assembled at 12 o'clock, M. for the purpose of attending the funeral obsequies of the hon. Joab Lawler, late a representative in congress from the state of Alabama.

The following was the order of arrangements:

The committee of arrangements, pall-bearers, and mourners, attended at the late residence of the deceased, at Mr. Mount's, on Pennsylvania avenue, at 11 o'clock, A. M. at which time the remains were removed, in charge of the committee of arrangements, attended by the sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives, to the hall of the house.

Shortly after 12 o'clock, meridian, funeral service was performed in the hall of the house of representatives, and, immediately after, the procession moved to the place of interment in the following order:

The chaplains of both houses.

Physicians who attended the deceased.

Committee of arrangements, viz:

Mr. Lyon, of Alabama,

Mr. Mercer, of Va. Mr. Henry, of Penn.
Mr. Harlan, of Ky. Mr. Parmenter, of Mass.
Mr. Maury, of Tenn. Mr. Boon, of Indiana.

Pall-bearers, viz:

Mr. Elmore, of S. C. Mr. Conner, of S. C.
Mr. Carter, of Tenn. Mr. Kilgore, of Ohio.
Mr. Sibley, of N. Y. Mr. Briggs, of Mass.

The family and friends of the deceased.

The members of the house of representatives and senators from Alabama, as mourners.

The sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives.

The house of representatives, preceded by the speaker and clerk.

The other officers of the house of representatives.

The sergeant-at-arms of the senate.

The senate of the United States, preceded by the vice president and secretary.

The other officers of the senate.

The president of the United States.

The heads of departments.

Foreign ministers.

Citizens and strangers.

Thursday, May 10. Mr. Martin, of Alabama, by leave, offered a resolution that the speaker inform the governor of Alabama of the death of the late Joab Lawler, in order that steps may be taken to fill the vacancy thereby occasioned in the Alabama delegation; which was agreed to.

The Chair laid before the house a communication from the secretary of state, enclosing a list of the names of all our diplomatic agents, their salaries, dates of appointment, &c.

Also, a communication from the war department, covering a report from the commissioners of Indian affairs, with a statement respecting the payment of the annuities due to the Seneca tribe of Indians.

These communications were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hoffman of New York, and Mr. Bouldin, of Virginia, obtained leave to offer memorials.

Mr. Tillinghast asked leave, by unanimous consent, to present two memorials, which he said were from communities of the highest respectability, and entitled to the most respectful consideration; and that this was also due to the great national importance of the subject of the memorials. They related to the execution of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians, which is now about to take place. He was constrained, therefore, to ask this special leave at this time, inasmuch as, if he waited for an opportunity, under the rules of the house, the time would, perhaps, have passed away when the memorials could have any effect; and it would be a mere ceremony to receive these memorials after the main subject of their prayer had been put beyond the reach of the action of the house. The memorials were, one from "the representatives of the yearly meeting of friends for New England," and one from inhabitants of the city of Norwich, in Connecticut.

Objection being made, Mr. T. moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to present these memorials; which motion did not prevail, not two-thirds voting for it.

On motion of Mr. Harlan, it was ordered that a member of the committee on private land claims be appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late Mr. Lawler.

The following message was received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Abraham Van Buren, his private secretary:

To the senate and house of representatives.

I submit to the consideration of congress a statement, prepared by the secretary of the treasury, by which it appears that the United States, with over twenty-eight millions in deposit with the states, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which those funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, the various pecuniary obligations of the government.

The occurrence of this result has for some time been apprehended, and efforts made to avert it. As the principal difficulty arises from a prohibition in the present law to re-issue such treasury notes as might be paid in before they fall due, and may be effectually obviated by giving the treasury, during the whole year, the benefit of the full amount originally authorized, the remedy would seem to be obvious and easy.

The serious embarrassments likely to arise from a longer continuance of the present state of things induces me respectfully to invite the earliest action of congress to the subject which may be consistent with a due regard to other public interests.

May 10, 1838.

M. VAN BUREN.

Treasury Department, May 10, 1838.

The undersigned would respectfully submit to the president the following statement concerning some fiscal embarrassments which are likely soon to happen, unless averted by early legislation.

It has been usual for the secretary of the treasury, except in the annual report on the finances, and in replies to special calls or directions by either house of congress, to give information respecting all matters which appertain to his office, through letters addressed to the appropriate committees. For some months past, and on several occasions, that mode has been pursued in respect to these threatened embarrassments, by giving to the committee of ways and means such information concerning them as the public exigencies and a seasonable foresight seemed to require. Some suggestions and facts connected with them have likewise been introduced into reports made to congress. But the relief desired having not yet been granted, and a longer omission to provide for the emergency having a tendency to impair public credit, to the great prejudice of contractors and workmen, as well as of pensioners, the army, navy, and many other classes, the undersigned deems it his duty to apprise the executive also of the impending difficulties, in order that he may take such further steps as appear proper to promote a faithful discharge of the pecuniary obligations of the government.

The peculiarity in the present condition of the finances can be very briefly explained. It has arisen, not from any actual deficiency which has yet occurred in the amount of receipts anticipated for the year; not from any excess of appropriation which has yet been made for either ordinary or extraordinary objects; but from a prohibition to use, for the payment of the public dues, what is required by law to be received for them.

In the act of October last, authorising the issue of treasury notes they were made receivable at any time for those dues, but were expressly forbidden, after such receipt, from being reissued in discharge of claims on the treasury. From this circumstance, coupled with the protracted failure of the most of the banks to resume specie payments, little has of late been received for revenue except treasury notes. Over five and a half millions of them have already been paid in, though none fall due till about the first of November next. As these cannot be paid out again, or others in their place, till the restriction before mentioned is modified, it has followed that a great portion of the receipts of the year have thus far been entirely useless for aiding to defray the large expenditures charged upon it, and resort has of necessity been had to the emission of more treasury notes under the original act, until the whole amount authorised, except $216,302, has been exhausted.

The only other means available to meet the public engagements, with the exceptions as to trusts and the mint, detailed in a special report on the condition of the treasury to the house of representatives the 26th of March last, are reduced to about $317,432.

These constitute an aggregate of five hundred and sixty-four thousand two hundred and thirty-four dollars thus available, instead of a balance of from two to six millions, which it has generally been considered wise to retain on hand, in order, with the aid of the current revenue, to insure punctuality, and guard against the embarrassments incident to fluctuations and other contingencies. During the present year, however, the revenue has been paid in treasury notes to such an extent that only about one-fourth of a million, monthly, has been received from it in money so as to assist in discharging the current expenditures. These last, on an average, have been over two millions monthly, and in April nearly three millions.

As more than four millions of the treasury notes are still outstanding, and the banks generally have not yet resumed specie payments, it is probable that a great part of the revenue will, for some time to come, be paid in a similar manner. Under such circumstances, and when it is considered that large sums due from the postponed custom-house bonds, the banks, and the states, are not yet payable, and that no power now exists, except in congress, to recall the deposits from the latter; that there is no reserved fund to resort to, or any other authorized means by which the wants of the treasury can be supplied, it is manifest that the department is exposed weekly and almost daily to be deprived of the whole of its available means, and the credit of the government to be injuriously effected, both at home and abroad.

Congress could readily avert these results, if approving the course suggested in the last annual report on the finances. It could remove the prohibition to re-issue the notes which may be or have been prematurely paid in and redeemed, and, where they have been cancelled, permit others to be issued in their stead; or it could effect the same object by allowing other notes to be emitted, instead of such as have been and shall hereafter be paid in, before the year for their redemption expires. By the seasonable adoption of either of these measures, all anticipated embarrassments during 1838 can probably be obviated. For, in that event, no provision of additional means to meet the expenditures of the year will be necessary hereafter, unless before the close of the session it shall appear that new appropriations have been made, or are likely to be made, exceeding the estimates submitted by the department in December last, by several millions, or that the revenues received will be materially less.

On the contrary, if neither of the measures above proposed should meet the approbation of congress, it is obvious that among the various substitutes which may be thought of, or which this department has taken occasion to suggest in communications to the committee of ways and means, some one must be selected that can be made efficient in its operation, at a very early day, or it will be impracticable to preserve the national faith unbroken, and to avert the injuries with which the public service is threatened. With great respect,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

Mr. Cumbreleng observed that he had, two days since, moved to postpone the question of privilege immediately before the house, for the purpose of considering the fiscal necessities of the government, but the motion had failed. He now gave notice that he should, at some time this day, endeavor to renew that motion. He moved that the message and documents be referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and printed.

Mr. Underwood, who had the floor from Monday, said he was very willing that the speech he had intended to make should be indefinitely postponed, if the house would agree, with it, to postpone indefinitely the whole subject of the duel report; and he was about himself to make a motion to that effect. Mr. Sergeant suggested that, as it was probable the message and documents would be printed by to-morrow, it would be better to postpone the consideration of it till to-morrow. Mr. Cumbreleng replied that, as to the time of commencing proceedings on the subject of this message, they could not be commenced a moment too soon. Were there the slightest probability that the house would finally dispose of the question of privilege this day, the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania would have weight; but, as he could not indulge a hope of this, he thought the subject of the message might as well be taken up at once. The general state of the finances of the country had been, from time to time, laid before the house. No gentleman could be ignorant of it. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) was not, probably, aware what would be the effect of his proposed motion for an indefinite postponement of the subject at present before the house. It would not bring the house to an immediate decision, but would, on the contrary open the whole subject.

[The question was in the mean while put on referring the message and papers to a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and printing, and agreed to.]

Mr. Underwood said that he was fully aware of the effect of the motion which he proposed to make. But if the gentleman from New York (Mr. Cumbreleng) would move his resolution at this moment, he would not press his own. Mr. Cambreling then moved the following resolution, (being the same he offered unsuccessfully on Monday:)

Resolved, That the rules be suspended for the purpose of considering bills referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union."

Before the question on this motion was put, Mr. Graves said he was very desirous of being heard; but the chair pronounced it at present not to be in order to hear him. The Speaker having stated the question, before a vote was taken on it, Mr. Graves moved a call of the house, and demanded the yeas and nays on that motion—he explained by saying that he did so with a view of ascertaining what was the actual sense of the whole house in reference to the printing of the evidence taken by the committee. He had again and again been charged with a wish to suppress that evidence. The charge was unfounded, and did him great injustice. He had always been desirous that the whole evidence should appear; and that though he did not think that the report of the committee should be received and printed in its present form, he had rather the whole should go out as it was, than that the house should fail to print the testimony. The question being put, the house ordered the call—yeas 102, nays 75. The roll was then called; but before it had been called through, Mr. Cambreling moved that the call be suspended, which was agreed to. Mr. Cambreling, expressing his hope that the house would dispose of the subject this day, withdrew his resolution to suspend the rules; and the house went on to further consider the reports from the select committee on duelling, &c.

The debate on this subject was resumed, and continued by Messrs. Underwood, Mercer, Reed, and Thomas, who concluded his remarks with a motion to lay the whole subject on the table, and print the reports, evidence, and journal of the committee. Mr. Jenifer demanded a division of the question. Mr. Thomas asked for the yeas and nays. Ordered.

The first division of the motion of Mr. Thomas (to lay on the table) was then decided in the affirmative by the following vote—yeas 102, nays 79. Mr. Petrikin demanded the previous question on the motion to print.

Mr. Rice Garland moved to reconsider the vote, whereby the first branch of the motion of Mr. Thomas had been carried; and on this motion he asked the yeas and nays. Mr. Thomas raised a point of order.

The Chair decided that, by the 44th rule of the house, the motion to reconsider would have precedence in ordinary cases. But this was but half a question, and to it that rule was not applicable.

After some incidental remarks, concluding in no motion, Mr. Rice Garland withdrew his motion to reconsider, and followed that withdrawn by moving that there be a call of the house; upon which motion he asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion that there be a call of the house was decided as follows—Yeas 64, nays 123. So the call was refused.

Some inquiries were then presented to the chair by Messrs. Slade and Graves, as to the divisibility of the question; to which the chair replied, that that would be a proper subject of inquiry after the house had decided whether the main question should be put.

The house having decided that the main question should now be put—Mr. Briggs asked that the motion to print be divided; and the first question was on the printing of the three reports of the committee; which was decided in the affirmative by the following vote—yeas 123, nays 74.

The question was then taken upon printing the evidence and journal, and decided in the affirmative by the following vote—yeas 189, nays 4. Mr. Boon rose and said that "the dear people" had been much talked of during this debate. The Speaker said there was no proposition before the house. Mr. Boon remarked that he was about to make one; if in order, he hoped it would be adopted; if not in order, "the dear people" would have the benefit of the motion. The Speaker said it would not be in order to proceed, until the gentleman from Indiana should have presented his proposition. Mr. Boon then moved to print 20,000 extra copies of the majority report and the evidence for the benefit of "the dear people" of this country. The Speaker decided this motion to be out of order, in the present position of the question. Reports from the committees, severally, of manufactures and Indian affairs were presented by Messrs. Adams and Everett; and then, on motion of Mr. Reed, the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

Naval. The United States frigate Columbia, bearing the broad pendant of commodore George C. Read, and the sloop of war John Adams, commander Thos.

W. Wyman, went to sea from Hampton roads on Sunday morning last, soon after sunrise, with a leading breeze.

The United States steam frigate Fulton, capt. M. C. Perry, arrived at Norfolk, from New York, on Monday afternoon. She left New York on the 2d instant, and put into the Delaware break-water on account of a severe gale, whence she left on Sunday afternoon, making her run to Norfolk in 21 hours, notwithstanding her progress was much impeded by a s. w. wind and a heavy sea. She left Norfolk on Wednesday, and arrived at the Washington navy yard yesterday (Friday) evening.

Capt. Marryatt's toast. Capt. Marryatt, the novelist, at the St. George's dinner, recently given at Toronto, offered the following toast:

"Capt. Drew and his brave comrades who cut out the Caroline."

The achievement thus signalized by capt. Marryatt was one of the most base and cowardly that happened on the frontier during the recent insurrectionary movements; and the man who could magnify the actors in it into heroes, is only fit to be associated with robbers of hen roosts and sackers of dairies. There is, however, an air of malignancy in the sentiment, which, in the present state of that unfortunate affair, indicates more of hatred towards us as a people, than a lack of high and chivalrous principles of honor.

Connecticut. The legislature of Connecticut convened at New Haven on Wednesday the 2d inst. Wm. W. Boardman, whig, was elected speaker of the house by a majority of 106 votes over all others. Chauncey F. Cleveland, the adm. candidate, who was speaker last year, received 37 votes, and there were three scattering. Total, 146. The joint committee appointed to canvass the return of votes for state officers, reported that the whole number of votes returned for governor, is 50,101; of which W. W. Ellsworth has 27,115; for Lt. governor 50,063—of which Charles Hawley has 27,976; for secretary 49,817, of which Royal R. Hinman has 23,377—for treasurer 49,911; of which Hiram Rider has 26,726; for comptroller 49,937; of which Henry Kilbourn has 21,466—with a resolution declaring the above officers legally elected.

Rhode Island. The legislature of Rhode Island also convened at Newport on Wednesday the 2d inst. The hon. George Curtis, (w.) was re-elected speaker of the house without opposition. The official returns of votes for governor give Wm. Sprague (w.) 3384; Francis, V. B. 3504; scattering, 99. Sprague's plurality over Francis, 430. His majority over all others, 381. For Lt. governor, Childs, (w.) received 4133 votes; Thurston, V. B. 3461; scattering, 15. Childs' majority, 662. The average whig majority for senators is 872 and a fraction. All the senators, 10 in number, are whigs. The house consists of 72 members, 45 of whom are whigs, and 27 loco focus. Whig majority in the house 18; in joint ballot, adding the Lt. governor, who presides over the senate, 29. Last year, says the Providence Journal, there was a majority of 41 the other way.

The elections of 1836, 1837, and 1838. Since Mr. Van Buren's inauguration as president on the 4th of March, 1837, there have been general elections in twenty-one of the twenty-six states which compose the federal union—Maryland, Mississippi, Michigan, New Hampshire, and Connecticut, have held two elections each—Rhode Island three. Virginia held an election last April, but the result was such that it could not be presented in a tabular form; which is of little consequence—it indicates no chance of opinion from the presidential contest. The same of Ohio. The states of Delaware, South Carolina, Louisiana, Missouri, and Illinois, have held no general election since 1836. The following table presents the vote of all the states which have held elections since 1836—the right hand columns giving the vote at the last state election; the left, that of the presidential contest—November, 1836:

The table of votes at the late elections have been compiled with great care, but may not be entirely correct. They are near enough, however, for all purposes. We have not yet the official return from Rhode Island

—the average whig majority there is something higher than we have placed it. [New Yorker.]

U. S. circuit court. This court was engaged yesterday, without a trial, respecting some woollen goods of which much has of late been said in the papers. The present action is brought against three cases of woollen goods, claimed by Wm. Downes, but which the United States, by the district attorney, alleges are forfeited, as they were knowingly and intentionally much undervalued in the invoice, thereby intending to lessen the duties upon them. As the trial is not yet concluded, we refrain from giving the evidence on either side, but on its termination, if deemed of sufficient importance, we shall present to our readers a full report.

Mr. Thomas Bradford. This venerable relic of the last age, died yesterday afternoon, at the great age of 94, and his funeral will proceed from the house of his son, Mr. Thomas Bradford, in Sansom street, to-day, at 11 o'clock A. M. Mr. Bradford entered upon the profession of an editor in 1763, the year signalized by the peace of Paris, which terminated that bloody war called "The Old French War" in this country, and "The Seven Years' War" in Europe. During our revolution, he was commissary general of the Pennsylvania division, and printer to the continental congress. The first was a very important public trust, and proves the high estimation in which he was held for integrity and knowledge of business. The second shows that he was favorably known to one of the worthiest bodies of men that ever assembled for the good of mankind. We presume that just before his death, he was the oldest member of the editorial corps in this country, and perhaps the only person then living, in any manner directly connected with the body of men that signed the declaration of independence.

The Moselle. The Louisville Journal contains the following paragraph respecting the mad ambition of capt. Perin, to which is justly attributable the late melancholy accident, and the loss of life attendant on it:

There is no doubt, that the deplorable occurrence is to be attributed to the overweening anxiety of capt. Perin to gain for his boat the reputation of unrivalled speed. We have always had the kindest feelings for capt. P. and when, a few weeks ago, he made a swift trip to this city from above, we cheerfully, in compliance with his request, took notice of the fact. From Louisville he made an extraordinary passage to St. Louis, whence he wrote as by express mail, requesting that we would again proclaim his matchless speed, and say that his boat was and would be "the eagle of the waters." We declined to comply with this second request for we saw that his ambition was already roused to a most dangerous pitch. The dreadful result is before the world.

The ship Science arrived at Portland, Maine, last week, from a whaling voyage of four years. Her appearance created as great a sensation among the good people of Portland as that of the steam ship from England did at New York. She has brought home a cargo of 2200 barrels of oil. Four of her crew are natives of the Sandwich Islands.

Astonishing despatch in travelling. The arrival of the Neptune from Charleston in 61 hours gives us an idea of the possible and actual rapidity of travelling in this country. She left Charleston after the arrival of the rail road cars from Augusta. Passengers may have started from Augusta on Saturday morning at 6 o'clock, and coming in the Neptune to New York, could arrive in Boston on Wednesday, having ten hours to spare in New York, making the whole distance from Augusta to Boston, (more than a thousand miles,) in about 89 hours running time, and 73 hours from Augusta to New York.

Indian Relics. A mound in this city has been partially opened this week, and our citizens are picking up beads, arrow points, stone knives, and various other instruments and ornaments. One skeleton has been discovered entire, and portions of others. On counting the grains of the stump of a tree that stands upon the top of the mound, it appears that this tree must have been about one hundred and fifty years old. It has been cut down about sixteen years. We suppose that this ancient receptacle of the dead must have been formed about two hundred years ago.

New York canals. The Albany Argus states that the quantity of flour brought to tide water on the New York canals in the month of April in 1837 and 1838, is as follows, viz:

	1837.	1838.
Albany	11,227	24,772
Troy	4,921	9,271
	16,148 bbls.	34,043 bbls.

Increase 17,895
There came over the rail road in 1838, 948 bbls. of flour.

There arrived at Troy in April, 1837, 2300 bushels of wheat, and in 1838, 39,235 bushels; at Albany, in April, 1837, 1436 bushels, and in 1838, 4498 bushels. Increase in 1838 over 1837, 89,997 bushels.

It will be seen by our abstracts of congressional proceedings, that the bill to authorize the issuing of treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the government, passed the house of representatives on Wednesday last, after one of the most close and ardent contests that has yet occurred in that body. On Thursday it was reported to the senate by the chairman of the committee on finance, without amendment. Yesterday it was taken up, and, after an animated debate, at about 7 o'clock, passed—Ayes 27, noes 13. Particulars in our next.

SEVATOR TALLMADGE. The Madisonian states that senator Tallmadge's private opinions were always adverse to the expunging resolution, and that he voted for that resolution only in obedience to the express instructions of the legislature of his state.

MEXICAN BLOCKADE. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 23d ult., states that the schooner Sarah Ann, which left that port for Tampico, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, and thirty-two passengers, arrived off her place of destination 22d ult., where she was boarded by a boat from a French brig of war of twenty-four guns, and informed that she could proceed no further under penalty of being sunk, nor be allowed to have any communication with the shore. The papers of the schooner were endorsed by the boarding officer, and, although the captain pleaded a scarcity of provisions and a large number of passengers, there was no alternative but to return. The Bulletin of the 10th inst., says that the schooner Essex, capt Carroll, had also been ordered off by the squadron before Tampico, and had returned to New Orleans. The French officers conducted themselves with the courtesy characteristic of their nation. Although intercepted off the port of her destination, she was allowed all communication with the shore, and ordered off after her papers had been endorsed. The same treatment is meted out without partiality to the vessels of all nations. A French brig, the Louise, from Bordeaux, bound also for Tampico, met with a like reception on the same day. One Yankee vessel, however, had the temerity to break the blockade. She was a barque heavily laden, and the captain not liking to miss a chance at speculation, dashed through the blockading squadron, and succeeded in running his vessel safe into port.

New Orleans, April 29. By a letter which has just been brought by the schooner which quitted Tampico the moment before the operation of the blockade, we learn that the government commissioners, at the head of whom were Cuevas and Mozan, secretaries of state and war, had started from Mexico for Vera Cruz, in order to treat with Baron D'Esclapart, and that the conference was to be held aboard the principal blockading vessel. It is presumed that the result of this mission will be satisfactory to both parties.

We see by a note from captain Page, commander of the U. S. ship Natchez, that that vessel was off the Mississippi, with the intention of proceeding to Tampico, and that he would convey any letters which the merchants of New Orleans might wish to transmit. A letter bag was, for this purpose, deposited at one of the insurance offices.

United States sloop-of-war Concord, Fitzhugh, commanding, from Tampico, touched at the Balize on the 4th inst., having on board $71,000 specie, which she put on board a tow boat, and then proceeded to Pensacola.

A passenger, who came by the Concord, reports, that, having remained three days at Vera Cruz, he felt convinced, from the rumors in circulation, that the Mexican government was in no wise disposed to pay the indemnity claimed by France.

VIRGINIA ELECTIONS. Mr. Banks, and not Mr. Slaughter, as stated in our last, has received the return for the Spotsylvania district—his majority over Mr. S. is thirteen votes. The Richmond Enquirer, of yesterday, says: "The want of form in holding the poll of Green county did not consist, as we originally heard, in the commissioners' not being sworn, but it is now said in the sheriff of Orange (from which Green had been taken) superintending the taking of the poll; and in the irregular manner in which the poll was presented to the assembled sheriffs."

The state of parties in the legislature may be ascertained from the following summary which we find in the last Enquirer:

"The Richmond Whig of yesterday morning assigns Mr. O'Ferral to the list of the friends of the administration. The "Winchester Republican" (also whig, and near to Mr. O'Ferral's residence,) ranks him among the administration men, as a conservative. The Whig also allows us the delegate from Lee, and puts up the friends of the administration as 61. The Whig claims 73 whigs; but among these is Mr. Samuel Jones, the deceased delegate of Buckingham. Correcting this error, therefore, it would leave the parties, according to the Whig tale, 71—61; and two vacancies, in Buckingham and King George. Should we assign both Lee and Morgan to the administration, then the joint vote of both houses will stand:

Administration,	83
Vacancies,	2

Even though the whigs should carry both the vacancies, the parties will be tied, on joint vote. Should we carry one, it will be 84—82; two majority for the administration. Should we carry both, it will be 85—81; four majority."

NOTICE. Baltic Sea. The hydrographic section of the marine department makes known to navigators, that since the opening of the navigation in the year 1838, an ordinary signal buoy is placed at the northern extremities of the reefs of Perespe and of the land bank of Wikala, in the gulf of Finland, and that the buoy, with a flag, that was until now placed near the island of Eckholm, will be removed, as it has thus been rendered useless. DOCTOR ANTONMARCHI, the physician who accompanied Napoleon to St. Helena, and remained with him during his life, died of yellow fever at St. Jago de Cuba, on the 2d of April. Dr. A. arrived at New Orleans from France about three years ago, travelled through Mexico, and was on his return to this country.

STATE LOAN. The Albany Argus says that the state loan of half a million of dollars for the enlargement of the Erie canal, was taken on Saturday last by Prime, Ward & King, at $100 25 for each $100 of 5 per cent. stock, redeemable in 1855, having 17 years to run.

FROM FRANCE. By the Silvie de Grasse, from Havre, the editor of the New York American has received advices from Paris to the 20th of April. The approaching coronation of the emperor of Austria, at Milan, divides public attention with that of queen Victoria. Marshal Soult is to represent Louis Philippe at London, and the Marquis de St. Aulaire, at Milan. The king of Naples has pardoned all those concerned in the late insurrection at Sicily. A Marseilles paper gives an account of a great victory gained by the Circassians over the Russian army, near Erzerum in Armenia. From Spain we learn that count Negri, the Carlist chief, who had advanced near to Madrid with a corps of 6,000 men, had retreated and was followed by Iriarte.

In giving an account of the proceedings of the slavery committee of the chamber of deputies, the Quotidienns says:—"M. Berryer has convinced the majority, that, before a population of slaves is enfranchised, it ought to be civilized, and that the only means of civilizing a race of blacks, is to entrust them to the care and instruction of the ministers of God. The mission of the catholic clergy is naturally pointed out, and M. Berryer has insisted on the advantage of a religious congregation which would devote itself to this laborious task. The committee, with the exception of M. Isambert, acknowledged all the difficulties presented by the present condition of the slaves as opposed to the glorious reminiscences of the old French missions, and even M. Guizot, zealous protestant as he is, repelled the idea of an evangelical mission as suggested by M. Isambert. The committee did not stop here; it acknowledged, with the concurrence also of M. Berryer, that before liberty was granted to the blacks, they should be led into forming families, and that in order to give to the ceremony of marriage all the solemnity required, it ought to be proposed that the registers of the marriages, births, and deaths of the blacks should be placed in the hands of catholic missionaries only."

Defeat of the Russians by the Circassians. We extract the following from the Semaphore of Marseilles, of the 14th inst: "We have received a letter of the 26th ult. from Constantinople, from which we take the following passages: The Circassians have just gained a complete victory. The Russian army is destroyed; all the works raised by the besiegers of the shore have been levelled to the earth. Thousands of Russians who have escaped from the carnage, have taken refuge in Erzerum. This has given rise to a report that they had taken forcible possession of the town."

Turkey and Egypt. A report is current that a formidable expedition against Egypt is in contemplation, and that the sultan, with the Sandiak sheikh, will place himself at the head of it. It is stated that Khosrow Pacha will represent the sultan during his absence, and that Halil Pacha will accompany his father-in-law.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. A letter from New York, under date 12th inst. says, the Bank of the United States has offered to arrange with the government for the entire six millions of its stock in the bank. This day she has in her vaults in specie $3,000,000 In Europe - 7,000,000 Stocks, &c. convertible in an hour to specie - 10,000,000

Surplus - 10,000,000

The Pennsylvania Bank of the United States received last week one million of dollars from the west, which, with the million and a half of dollars purchased here, and, as is stated, about six hundred thousand dollars that was held here in special deposit, swells the actual amount of specie now in its vaults to about seven millions of dollars.

The New York Commercial Advertiser says, the committee of the board of trade of that city, which visited Philadelphia for the purpose of inviting Mr. Biddle and his associates in the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States to establish a bank in that city with a large capital, under the late banking law, has returned.

We learn, says the Commercial; that the committee were received with the greatest courtesy and kindness by Mr. Biddle who entered at once into their feelings upon the subject. He appeared quite favorable to the project, and promised to bring the question before the directors at the earliest day. The design is to establish a bank, one of from ten to fifteen millions capital. We believe the new bank law does not go into operation until the 19th of the present month; and from the complexion of our advices, we should not be surprised if the new bank went into operation on the 20th.

Specie in New York. The exact amount of importations of specie last week, at this port, were:

Gold	$1,100,223
Silver	28,175

Total last week	$1,129,398
Yesterday	1,363,748

The last eight days - $2,498,146

The Louisiana state bank at New Orleans resumed specie payments on the 7th inst.

Bicknell's (Philadelphia) Reporter says "The banks discount good business paper with sufficient liberality, while unexceptionable notes find ready sale out of doors, at from 8 1-2 to 9 per cent. The tone generally is wholesome, and confidence is gradually reviving. Our banks have not yet designated a day for the general resumption of specie payments, but we incline to the opinion that they will do so much sooner than was expected. We may add, that at a recent meeting of the bank delegates of this city, Mr. Lewis, cashier of the Girard bank, offered a resolution pledging the banks to resume in full as the action of the government would authorize such a course. This resolution was not acted on, but will be on the first Wednesday in June. In the mean time, we may remark that none of the Philadelphia banks (not even the Bank of the United States) will resume or pay specie more generally than at present."

MR. TYLER. We publish the annexed letter with pleasure; and although we have unwillingly been guilty of a want of courtesy, in making a public, instead of a private call upon Mr. Tyler, yet we hope no harm has in reality been done. It has afforded him an opportunity of speaking out—and we are happy to find that he does so in a frank and manly manner. [Richmond Whig.]

Williamsburg, May 11th, 1838.

Gentlemen: An article in your paper of the 8th inst. under the editorial head, has, in no small degree, excited my astonishment and regret—and but for the direct reference made to me by name in the latter part of the article, I would have been at a loss to know what "prominent whig" was intended in the very urgent call made by you for the disclosure of his opinions. The expressions in the first paragraph of that article, are as follows:—"A prominent whig has been named as likely to succeed 'Mr. Rives, and the party' at Washington have intimated their satisfaction with his nomination. It therefore becomes the friends of this gentleman at once to let his opinions be known without hesitation. The mere fact that his election can not only 'now be tolerated by the corrupt crew at Washington, but hailed with pleasure, renders it necessary that the public mind should forthwith be disabused in relation to the opinions imputed to him.'" Now I cannot for a moment believe that you designed me injury by the above paragraph, but most certainly nothing could be better calculated to inflict it. My opinions are not only doubtful, but imputations are made which render it necessary that the public mind should be instantly disabused. Nor is this all—the administration party at Washington are clapping their hands in an ecstasy of joy at my being named for the senate as the successor of Mr. Rives. Such is the fair inference from the paragraph—and yet I readily acquit you of all improper motive in penning it, but will ascribe it to the friendship which you declare to be its sole dictator.

You also place me in a position of a candidate for the senate, to succeed Mr. Rives. Now this is to place me, during the entire interval of time between this and the meeting of the legislature, in no enviable predicament. In the first place, the thing is altogether unusual, and would be on my part, wholly unwarrantable. The legislature will, in its own wisdom, select a suitable person to represent the sovereignty of the state in the senate of the United States. It is a matter entrusted by the constitution to the hands of the legislature, and I do not doubt that it will acquit itself of its duty in that behalf as will best become it.

As to my opinion on the sub-treasury bill, I might, under the above views, well content myself with saying emphatically, "ask my constituents"—men who have not blenched when the storm was at the highest, and have been firm in maintaining their faith through the agitations of the last five years. I have, however no disposition to conceal my opinions, on any political question, from the public, and therefore answer, that I am no advocate of the sub-treasury scheme, and that I regard it as but a continuation of that series of disastrous measures which have plunged the country into the present state of difficulty and embarrassment—that I regard it as a part of that system of humbuggery which has been played off, but too successfully, for the last five years. I say, moreover, that upon all proper occasions, my opinions have been frankly expressed—that, if I have not published them from the house tops, I have been influenced by no selfish motive. Those around me, with whom I am in the habit of exchanging political views, have all along had knowledge of them. The few correspondents that I have in Washington on public affairs, have long since known them. Those correspondents are exclusively attached to the party to which I belong.

An after paragraph in your paper speaks of advances made to "a prominent whig." If you design me by that remark, I utterly disclaim it. No such advance had been made, and no lures thrown out—and if the administration party at Washington rejoice at the prospect of my re-election to the senate, your paper brings me the first intelligence of the fact. I stand where I did three years ago, and there I shall always stand. If that party desires my election, it must arise from the apprehension that they cannot elect a man of their party, and preference for me, if felt, of which I am not aware, arises solely out of a mere personal preference. Of that, I have no cause to complain—but of this, all of all parties may be assured, that I shall upon all subjects think as a freeman, and shall always dare to act as such.

I regret, gentlemen, that you, or either of you had not seen cause to address me in a private letter, requesting me to remove any doubt as to my opinions, under which you may have labored. It would have saved me from the unpleasant alternative of appearing in the public prints. My apology to the public will be found in the character of your call.

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN TYLER.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY. One of the most important geographical discoveries of the age (says the Journal of Commerce) is made known to us through the London Morning Chronicle of April 19th. It is no less than a solution of the long pending problem whether or not there is a communication by water from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, around the northern portion of the American continent. It is now ascertained that there is such a communication. The narrative of its discovery is published in the Morning Chronicle.

The following abbreviation of the contents of this interesting narrative is copied from the New York Evening Post of Monday:

"The scientific expedition undertaken at the expense of the Hudson's Bay Company, to survey the extreme northern coast of America, has, in part, fulfilled its object. Messrs. Dease and Simpson, with ten attendants, reached Fort Good Hope, the northernmost settlement of the company, on the 4th of July last, and descended the Mackenzie river in boats. They reached the ocean on the 9th of July, and, proceeding westerly, followed the line of coast to Point Barrow. They thus completed the survey of the coast between the extreme points laid down by captain Beechey and captain Franklin.

"They passed a few days with the Esquimaux at the point, and, setting out on their return, reached Fort Norman on the 4th of September, having been sixty-four days absent. From Fort Norman, they were, at the time the despatches were sent, preparing to proceed to a settlement which had been got ready for them at the east end of Great Bear Lake. Here they were to winter, and in July next to resume their labors. Proceeding to the eastward, they hope to connect the discoveries of Franklin and Back, and then complete the survey of the whole coast of North America."—Nat. Intel.

DR. THELLER. Senator Norvell has addressed a letter to the editor of the Detroit Morning Post, stating that he had suggested to the secretary of state the propriety of interposing with the British government to save Dr. Theller's life. The application, however, it seems by the following correspondence, had been anticipated, and Mr. Norvell trusts "that the life of the unhappy and apparently ill-fated individual may be saved." [Globe.]

Department of State,
Washington, April 25, 1838.

Sir: Your communication of yesterday, with its enclosure, relating to the case of Dr. Theller, recently sentenced to death at Toronto, Upper Canada, for high treason, has been received, and I have the honor to transmit to you, in reply, the copy of a letter addressed to a committee of citizens of Philadelphia, in answer to their request for the intervention of this department in behalf of the same person.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

Hon. John Norvell,
Of the senate of the United States.

Department of State,
Washington, April 23, 1838.

Gentlemen: Your letter of the 22d instant, requesting the interposition of this department, in behalf of Dr. Theller, now under sentence of death at Toronto, in Upper Canada, for alleged treason against the British government, has just been received. I have the honor to inform you, in reply, that a special agent was recently despatched to Canada, and is, probably, now there, who was instructed to inquire into the situation of all persons claiming to be American citizens, who had been imprisoned by the local authorities, on the charge of being implicated in the recent disturbances in the British provinces; and, it is presumed that, if the case of Dr. Theller is one in which the intervention of his good offices is justifiable, they will, without doubt, be exerted in his favor.

I am, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

To Messrs. John Oakford, and others, committee, &c. Philadelphia.

NEW MAIL ARRANGEMENT. Mail cars, constructed under the directions of the post office department, are now running on the railroads between Washington and Philadelphia. They contain two apartments; one appropriated to the accommodation of the great mails, and the other to the way mails, and a post office agent. The latter apartment is fitted up with boxes, labelled with the names of all the small offices on or near the railroad lines. It has also a letter-box in front, into which letters may be put up to the moment of starting the cars, and any where on the road.

The agent of the post office department attends the mail from the post offices at the ends of the route, and sees it safely deposited in his car. As soon as the cars start, he opens the letter-box and takes out all the letters, marking them so as to designate the place where they are put in. He then opens the way mail bag, and distributes its contents into the several boxes. As the cars approach a post office, the agent takes out the contents of the proper box and puts them into a pouch. The engineer slackens the speed of the train, and the agent hands the pouch to the postmaster, or carrier, who stands beside the track to take it, receiving from him, at the same time, another pouch, with the matter to be sent from that office. This the agent immediately opens, and distributes its contents into the proper boxes. Having supplied thus all the way offices, the agent, when arrived at the end of the route, sees the mail safely delivered into the post office.

The mail leaves Washington at 6 o'clock, A. M. All letter-writers should, if possible, put their letters into the post office the preceding evening. The letter box at the cars will not be open until after 5 o'clock in the morning. It is not a post office; and letters will not be received at it while the post office is open. Its object is to allow all persons, until the last moment before departure, to send letters by mail, even although the mail has been closed at the post office, and even placed in the car.

The letter box will be open after the mail closes in the post office at Baltimore, and all the intermediate points. Philadelphia cannot at present enjoy its advantages fully, because the cars do not run into the city.

In this arrangement, the post office department has sought to give the greatest security to the mails, and to afford the community the best possible accommodation. Well executed, the plan must be almost the perfection of mail arrangements. It is intended, when it can be conveniently done, to extend a similar arrangement through to New York.

DEATH OF MR. THORNTON. Extract from a letter received at the department of state, from the consul of the United States at Lima:

Consulate of the United States,
Lima, Jan. 29, 1838.

SIR: The painful duty devolves upon me, of communicating to you the death of James B. Thornton, United States charge d'affaires to Peru. He arrived at Callao, from Valparaiso, in the United States ship Falmouth, capt. McKeever, on the 22d instant, and expired on the 25th. His remains were interred on the 26th inst. in the British cemetery at Bella Vista, with all the honors due to his rank, being accompanied to the grave by a detachment of the United States, British, and French marines and sailors; by the officers of all the foreign vessels of war in Callao; by the members of the diplomatic corps; by officers of all the foreign vessels of war in Callao; by the members of the diplomatic corps; by officers delegated for that purposes by the supreme government to which he was accredited, and by a numerous concourse of his fellow-citizens and foreigners resident in the capital and Callao. Minute guns were fired from the Falmouth during the procession, and all the vessels in Callao had their flags at half-mast during the day of the funeral.

WHIG NATIONAL CONVENTION. It having been proposed by various meetings of the opponents of the present administration, in different parts of the United States, that there should be a general meeting of delegates from all the states, for the purpose of agreeing on and recommending suitable persons as candidates for the offices of president and vice president at the next election; and a desire having been expressed by several of said meetings that the time and place for holding such meeting should be fixed by the opposition members of congress, those members have authorized us to announce that, in compliance with what thus appears to be the general wish they have met and consulted on the subject, and, after due consideration and reflection, they are of opinion that the borough of Harrisburg, in the state of Pennsylvania, is a suitable place, and the first Wednesday in December, 1839, a proper time, for holding a general meeting for the purposes above mentioned, to be composed of delegates from all the states, in proportion to their representation in the two houses of congress. NEW YORK BANK LAW.

An act to authorize the business of banking, passed April 18, 1838.

The people of the state of New York, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

Sec. 1. The comptroller is hereby authorized and required to cause to be engraved and printed in the best manner, to guard against counterfeiting, such quantity of circulating notes, in the similitude of bank notes in blank, of the different denominations authorised to be issued by the incorporated banks of this state, as he may from time to time deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and of such form as he may prescribe. Such bank circulating notes shall be countersigned, numbered, and registered in proper books to be provided and kept for that purpose in the office of the said comptroller, under his direction, by such person or persons as the said comptroller shall appoint for that purpose, so that each denomination of such circulating notes shall all be of the same similitude and bear the uniform signature of such register, or one of such registers.

Sec. 2. Whenever any person or association of persons, formed for the purpose of banking, under the provisions of this act, shall legally transfer to the comptroller any portion of the public debt now created or hereafter to be created by the United States or by this state, or such other states of the United States as shall be approved by the comptroller, such person or association of persons shall be entitled to receive from the comptroller an equal amount of such circulating notes, of different denominations, registered and countersigned as aforesaid; but such public debt shall in all cases be, or be made to be, equal to a stock of this state producing five per cent. per annum; and it shall not be lawful for the comptroller to take any stock at any rate above its par value.

Sec. 3. Such person or association of persons are hereby authorized, after having executed and signed such circulating notes in the manner required by us, to make them obligatory promissory notes payable on demand, at the place of business within this state of such person or association, to loan and circulate the same as money, according to the ordinary course of banking business as regulated in the laws and usages of this state.

Sec. 4. In case the maker or makers of any such circulating notes, countersigned and registered as aforesaid, shall at any time hereafter, on lawful demand during the usual hours of business between the hours of ten and three o'clock, at the place where such note is payable, fail or refuse to redeem such note in the lawful money of the United States, the holder of such note making such demand may cause the same to be protested for non-payment by a notary public, under his seal of office in the usual manner; and the comptroller on receiving and filing in his office such protest, shall forthwith give notice in writing to the maker or makers of such note to pay the same; and if he or they shall omit to do so for ten days after such notice, the comptroller shall immediately thereupon, (unless he shall be satisfied that there is a good and legal defence against the payment of such note or notes,) give notice in the state papers that all the circulating notes issued by such person or association will be redeemed out of the trust funds in his hands for that purpose; and it shall be lawful for the comptroller to apply the said trust funds beginning to the maker or makers of such protested notes to the payment and redemption of such notes, with costs of protest, and to adopt such measures for the payment of all such circulating notes put in circulation by the maker or makers of such protested notes, pursuant to the provisions of this act, it will in his opinion most effectually prevent loss to the holders thereof.

Sec. 5. The comptroller may give to any person or association of persons so transferring stock in pursuance of the provisions of this act, powers of attorney to receive interest or dividends thereon, which such persons or association may receive and apply to their own use; but such powers may be invoked upon such person or association failing to redeem the circulating notes so issued, or whenever, in the opinion of the comptroller, the principal of such stock shall become an insufficient security; and the said comptroller, upon the application of the owner or owners of such transferred stock in trust, may, in his discretion, change or transfer the same for other stocks of the kind before specified in this act, or may re-transfer the said stocks, or any part thereof, or the mortgages, or any of them hereinafter mentioned and provided for, upon receiving and cancelling an equal amount of such circulating notes delivered by him to such person or association, in such manner that the circulating notes shall always be secured in full, either by stocks or by stocks and mortgages, as in this act provided.

Sec. 6. The bills or notes so to be countersigned, and the payment of which shall be so secured by the transfer of public stocks, shall be stamped on their face, "Secured by the pledge of public stocks."

Sec. 7. Instead of transferring public stocks as aforesaid to secure the whole amount of such bills or notes, it shall be lawful for such person or association of persons, in case they shall so elect before receiving any of the said bills or notes, to secure the payment of one half of the whole amount so to be issued, by transferring to the comptroller bonds and mortgages upon real estate, bearing at least six per cent. interest of this state, payable annually or semi-annually; in which case all such bills or notes issued by the said person or association of persons, shall be stamped on their face, "Secured by pledge of public stocks and real estate."

Sec. 8. Such mortgages shall be only upon improved, productive, unincumbered lands within this state, worth, independently of any buildings thereon, at least double the amount for which they shall be so mortgaged; and the comptroller shall prescribe such regulations for ascertaining the title and the value of such lands as he may deem necessary; and such mortgages shall be payable within such time as the comptroller may direct.

Sec. 9. The comptroller may, in his discretion, resign the said bonds and mortgages, or any of them, to the person or association who transferred the same, on receiving other approved bonds and mortgages of equal amount; and when any sum of the principal of the bonds and mortgages transferred to the comptroller shall be paid to him, he shall notify the person or association that transferred the bonds and mortgages of such payment, and may pay the same to such person or association on receiving other approved bonds and mortgages of equal amount.

Sec. 10. The person or association of persons assigning such bonds and mortgages to the comptroller, may receive the annual interest to accrue thereon, unless default shall be made in paying the bills or notes to be countersigned as aforesaid, or unless in the opinion of the comptroller the bonds and mortgages or stocks so pledged shall become an insufficient security for the payment of such bills or notes.

Sec. 11. In case such person or association of persons shall fail or refuse to pay such bills or notes on demand in the manner specified in the fourth section of this act, the comptroller, after the ten day's notice herein mentioned, may proceed to sell at public auction the public stocks so pledged or the bonds and mortgages so assigned, or any or either of them, and out of the proceeds of such sale shall pay and cancel the said bills or notes, default in paying which shall have been made as aforesaid; but nothing in this act contained shall be considered as implying any pledge on the part of the state for the payment of the securities pledged to the comptroller for their redemption.

Sec. 12. The public debt and bonds and mortgages to be deposited with the comptroller by such person or association, shall be held by him exclusively for the redemption of the bills or notes of such person or association put in circulation as money, until the same are paid.

Sec. 13. The plates, dies and materials to be procured by the comptroller, for the printing and making of the circulating notes provided for hereby, will all remain in his custody and under his direction; and the expenses necessarily incurred in executing the provisions of this act, shall be audited and settled by the comptroller, and paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and for the purpose of reimbursing the same, the said comptroller is hereby authorized and required to charge against and receive from such person or association applying for such circulating notes, such rate per cent. thereon as may be sufficient for that purpose, and as may be just and reasonable.

Sec. 14. It shall not be lawful for the comptroller, or other officer, to countersign bills or notes for any person or association of persons, to an amount in the aggregate exceeding the public debt, or public debt and bonds and mortgages at their value, as provided in the second section of this act, deposited with the comptroller by such person or association; and any comptroller or other officer who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine not less than five thousand dollars, or be imprisoned not less than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Sec. 15. Any number of persons may associate to establish offices of discount, deposit and circulation, upon the terms and conditions, and subject to the liabilities prescribed in this act; but the aggregate amount of the capital stock of any such association shall not be less than one hundred thousand dollars.

Sec. 16. Such persons, under their hands and seals, shall make a certificate which shall specify:

1. The name assumed to distinguish such association, and to be used in its dealings:

2. The place where the operations of discount and deposit of such association are to be carried on, designating the particular city, town, or village:

3. The amount of the capital stock of such association, and the number of shares into which the same shall be divided:

4. The names and places of residence of the shareholders, and the number of shares held by each of them respectively:

5. The period at which such association shall commence and terminate; which certificate shall be proved or acknowledged and recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where any office of such association shall be established, and a copy thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state.

Sec. 17. The certificate required by the last preceding section to be recorded and filed in the offices of the clerk of the county and secretary of state as aforesaid, or copies thereof, duly certified by either of those officers, may be used as evidence in all courts and places for and against any such association.

Sec. 18. Such association shall have power to carry on the business of banking, by discounting bills, notes and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling gold and silver bullion; foreign coins and bills of exchange in the manner specified in their articles of association for the purposes authorized by this act; by loaning money on real and personal security; and by exercising such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on such business; to choose one of their number as president of such association, and to appoint a cashier, and such other officers and agents as their business may require, and to remove such president, cashier, officers, and agents at pleasure, and appoint others in their place.

Sec. 19. The shares of said association shall be deemed personal property, and shall be transferable on the books of the association in such manner as may be agreed on in the articles of association; and every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer, shall, in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of prior shareholders; and no change shall be made in the articles of association by which the rights, remedies of security of its existing creditors shall be weakened or impaired. Such association shall not be dissolved by the death or insanity of any of the stockholders therein.

Sec. 20. It shall be lawful for any association of persons organized under this act by their articles of association, to provide for an increase of their capital and of the number of the associates, from time to time, as they may think proper.

Sec. 21. Contracts made by any such association, and all notes and bills by them issued and put in circulation as money, shall be signed by the president or vice-president and the cashier thereof; and all suits, actions and proceedings brought or prosecuted by or on behalf of such association, may be brought or prosecuted in the name of the president thereof; and no such suit, action or proceeding shall abate by reason of the death, resignation or removal from office of such president, but may be continued and prosecuted according to such rules as the courts of law or equity may direct, in the name of his successor in office, who shall exercise the powers, enjoy the rights, and discharge the duties of his predecessor.

Sec. 22. All persons having demands against any such association, may maintain actions against the president thereof; which suits or actions shall not abate by reason of the death, resignation or removal from office of such president, but may be continued and prosecuted to judgment against his successor; and all judgments and decrees obtained or rendered against such president for any debt or liability of such association, shall be enforced only against the joint property of the association, and which property shall be liable to be taken and sold by execution under any such judgment or decree.

Sec. 23. No shareholder of any such association shall be liable in his individual capacity for any contract, debt or engagement of such association, unless the articles of such association by him signed shall have declared that the shareholder shall be so liable.

Sec. 24. It shall be lawful for such association to purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes:

1. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the convenient transaction of its business; or,

2. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith, by way of security for loans made by, or moneys due, to such association; or,

3. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings; or,

4. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees or mortgages held by such association.

The said association shall not purchase, hold or convey real estate in any other case, or for any other purpose; and all conveyances of such real estate shall be made to the president, or such other officer as shall be indicated for that purpose in the articles of association; and which president or officer, and his successors, from time to time may sell, assign and convey the same, free from any claims thereon, against any of the shareholders, or any person claiming under them.

Sec. 25. Upon the application of creditors or shareholders of any such association, whose debts or shares shall amount to one thousand dollars, and stating facts, verified by affidavit, the chancellor may, in his discretion, order a strict examination to be made by one of the masters of his court, of all the affairs of such association, for the purpose of ascertaining the safety of its investments, and the produce of its management; and the result of every such examination, together with the opinion of the master and of the chancellor thereon, shall be published in such manner as the chancellor shall direct, who shall make such order in respect to the expenses of such examination and publication as he may deem proper.

Sec. 26. Such association shall, on the first Mondays of January and July in every year after having commenced the business of banking as prescribed by this act, make out and transmit to the comptroller, in the form to be provided by him, a full statement of the affairs of the association, verified by the oaths of the president or cashier, which statement shall contain,

1. The amount of the capital stock paid in according to the provisions of this act or secured to be paid;

2. The value of the real estate of the association; specifying what portion is occupied by the association as necessary to the transaction of its business;

3. The shares of stock held by such association, whether absolutely or as collateral security; specifying each kind and description of stock, and the number and value of the shares of each;

4. The amount of debts due to the association; specifying such as are due from moneyed or other corporations or associations; and also specifying the amount secured by bond and mortgage of judgment; and the amount which ought to be included in the computation of losses;

5. The amount of debts due by such association; specifying such as are payable on demand, and such as are due to moneyed or other corporations or associations;

6. The amount of claims against the association not acknowledged by it as debts;

7. The amount of notes, bills, or other evidences of debt issued by such association;

8. The amount of the losses of the association; specifying whether charged on its capital or profits, since its last preceding statement, and of its dividends declared and made during the same period;

9. The average amount in each month during the preceding six months of the debts due to and from the association; the average amount of specie possessed by the same during each month, and the amount of bills and notes issued by such association and put in circulation as money, and outstanding against the association, on the first day of each of the preceding six months;

10. The average amount in each month during the preceding six months due to the association, from all the shareholders in the association, also the greatest amount due to the association in each of the said preceding six months, from all the shareholders in such association;

11. The amount which the capital of the said association has been increased during the preceding six months, if there shall have been any increase of the said capital; and the names of any persons who may have become parties to the said articles of association, or may have withdrawn therefrom since their last report.

It shall be the duty of the comptroller to cause the statement required to be made by this section to be published in a newspaper printed in the county where the place of business of such association is situated, and in the state paper; the expense of which shall be paid by such association.

Sec. 27. If such association shall neglect to make out and transmit the statement required in the last preceding section, for one month beyond the period when the same is required to be made, or shall violate any of the provisions of this act, such association may be proceeded against and dissolved by the court of chancery, in the same manner as any moneyed corporation may be proceeded against and dissolved.

Sec. 28. If any portion of the original capital of any such association shall be withdrawn for any purpose whatever, whilst any debts of the association remain unsatisfied, no dividends or profits on the shares of the capital stock of the association shall thereafter be made, until the deficit of capital shall have been made good, either by subscription of the shareholders, or out of the subsequently accruing profits of the association; and if it shall appear that any such dividends have been made, it shall be the duty of the chancellor to make the necessary orders and decrees for closing the affairs of the association, and distributing its property and effects among its creditors and shareholders.

Sec. 29. Such association shall be liable to pay the holder of every bill or note put in circulation as money, the payment of which shall have been demanded and refused, damages for non-payment thereof, in lieu of interest, at and after the rate of fourteen per cent. per annum, from the time of such refusal until the payment of such evidence of debt, and the damages thereon.

Sec. 30. The president and cashier of every association formed pursuant to the provisions of this act, shall at all times keep a true and correct list of the names of the shareholders of such association, and shall file a copy of such list in the office of the clerk of the county where any office of such association may be located, and also in the office of the comptroller, on the first Mondays of January and July in every year.

Sec. 31. It shall not be lawful for any association formed under the provisions of this act, to make any of its bills or notes of a denomination less than one thousand dollars, to be put in circulation as money, payable at any other place than at the office where the business of the association is carried on and conducted.

Sec. 32. The legislature may at any time alter or repeal this act.

Sec. 33. No association of persons authorized to carry on the business of banking under this act, shall at any time, for the space of twenty days, have on hand at their place of business, less than twelve and a half per cent. in specie on the amount of the bills or notes in circulation as money.

State of New York. } This bill having been approved by the } proved and signed by the governor of this state on the 18th day of April, 1838, I do hereby certify that the same became a law on that day.

JOHN A. DIX, secretary of state.

SPEECH OF MR. CALHOUN, OF S. C.

In reply to Mr. Clay on the sub-treasury bill. Delivered in the senate of the United States, March 10, 1838.

I rise to fulfil a promise I made some time since to notice at my leisure the reply of the senator from Kentucky farthest from me (Mr. Clay) to my remarks, when I first addressed the senate on the subject now under discussion.

On comparing with care the reply with the remarks, I am at a loss to determine whether it is the most remarkable for its omissions or misstatements. Instead of leaving not a hair in the head of my arguments, as the senator threatened, (to use his not very dignified expression,) he has not even attempted to answer a large, and not the least weighty portion; and of that which he has, there is not one fairly stated or fairly answered. I speak literally, and without exaggeration; nor would it be difficult to establish to the letter what I assert, if I could reconcile it to myself to consume the time of the senate in establishing a long series of negative propositions, in which they could take but little interest, however important they may be regarded by the senator and myself. To avoid so idle a consumption of the time, I propose to present a few instances of his misstatements, from which the rest may be inferred; and, that I may not be suspected of having selected them, I shall take them in the order in which they stand in his reply.

The senate will recollect, that when the senator from Virginia farthest from me (Mr. Rives) introduced his substitute, he accompanied it with the remark, that it was his first choice, and the second choice of those who are allied with him on this occasion. In noticing this remark, I stated, that if I might judge from appearances, which could scarcely deceive one, the senator might have said, not only the second but, under existing circumstances, it was their first choice, and that, despairing of a bank for the present, they would support his substitute. Assuming this inference to be correct, I stated that the question was narrowed down, in fact, to the bill and substitute, of which one or the other must be selected. The senator from Kentucky, in his reply, omitted all these qualifications, and represented me as making the absolute assertion that, in the nature of the case, there was no other alternative but the bill or the substitute, and then gravely pointed out two others; to do nothing, or adopt a national bank, as if I could possibly be ignorant of what was so obvious. After he had thus replied, not to what I really said, but his own misstatement of it, as if to make compensation, he proceeded in the same breath to confirm the truth of what I did say by giving his support to the substitute, which he called a half way house, where he could spend some pleasant hours. Nothing is more easy than to win such victories.

Having inferred, as has turned out to be the fact, that there was no other alternative at present but the bill and substitute, I next showed the embarrassment to which the gentlemen opposite to me would be involved from having, four years ago, on the question of the removal of the deposits, denounced a league of state banks, similar to that proposed to be revived by the substitute. After enlarging on this point, I remarked that, if I might be permitted to state my opinion, the gentlemen had taken a course unfortunate for themselves and the country—unfortunate for them, for let what would come they would be responsible. If the bill was lost, there would be the responsibility; if the substitute was carried, on them the responsibility would fall; and, if nothing was done, they would be held responsible; and, unfortunate for the country, because it had prevented the decision of the question at the extra session, which could not have failed to put an early termination to the present commercial and pecuniary embarrassment. This the senator, in his reply, met by stating that I had called on him and his friends to follow my lead; and thus regarding it, he made it the pretext of some ill-natured personal remarks, which I shall notice hereafter. I never dreamed of making such a call; and what I said cannot be tortured, by the force of construction, to bear a meaning having the least semblance to it.

After making these preliminary remarks, I took up the substitute, and showed that it proposed to make a bargain with the banks. I then stated the particulars and the conditions of the proposed bargain; that its object was to enable the banks to pay their debts, and for that purpose it proposed to confer important privileges; to give them the use of the public funds from the time of deposits to disbursement, and to have their notes received as cash in the dues of the government. I then asked, if we had a right to make such a bargain? The senator, leaving out all of these particulars, represented me as saying that the government had no right to make a bargain with the banks; and then undertakes to involve me in an inconsistency, in supporting the bill, because it proposes to bargain with the banks for the use of their vaults, as a place of safe-keeping for the public money, as if there was a possible analogy between the two cases. Nothing is more easy than to refute the most demonstrative argument in this way. Drop an essential part of the premises, and the most irresistible conclusion, of course, fails.

In the same summary and easy mode of replying to my argument, the senator perverted my denial that the government had a right to receive bank notes as cash, into the assertion that it had no right to receive any thing but cash; and then accuses me with inconsistency, because I voted, at the extra session, for the bill authorizing the receipt of treasury notes in the dues of the government; as if any one ever doubted that it could receive its own paper, or securities, in payment of its debts. Such are the misstatements of the senator taken in their regular order, as they stand in his reply, and they present a fair specimen of what he chooses to consider an answer to my argument. There is not one less unfairly stated, or unfairly met, than the instances I have cited.

The senator presented two difficulties in reply to what I said against receiving bank notes by the government, which demand a passing notice before I dismiss this part of the subject. He objected, first, that it was contrary to the provision of the bill itself, which authorizes the receipts of the notes of specie-paying banks for a limited time. To answer this objection, it will be necessary to advert to the object of the provision. By the provisions of the joint resolutions of 1816, the notes of specie paying banks are made receivable in the dues of the government; and, of course, on the resumption of specie payments, bank notes would again be received by the government as heretofore, without limitation as to time, unless some provision be adopted to prevent it. In a word, the government, though separated in fact at present from the banks, is not legally separated; and the object of the provision is to effect the separation as well in law as it is in fact. This it proposes to do by a gradual repeal of the joint resolution of 1816, in order to prevent, as far as possible, any injurious effects to the community or the banks. The senator, in making his objection, overlooks the broad distinction between the doing and undoing of an unconstitutional act. There are some unconstitutional acts that are difficult, if not impossible, to be undone; such, for instance, as the admission of Louisiana into the union, admitting it to be unconstitutional, which I do not. There are others which cannot be undone suddenly, without widespread distress and ruin; such as the protective tariff, which, accordingly, the compromise act allowed upwards of eight years for the gradual repeal. Such also is the case under consideration, which, under the provisions of the bill, would be effected in seven years. In all such cases I hold it to be not only clearly constitutional for congress to make a gradual repeal, but its duty to do so; otherwise it would be often impossible to get clear of an unconstitutional act short of revolution. His next objection was, that the reasons which would make the receipt of bank notes unconstitutional, would also make the China trade so, which he represented as absorbing a large portion of the specie of the country. There is no analogy whatever between the two cases. The very object of specie is to carry on trade, and it would be idle to attempt to regulate the distribution and fluctuation which result from its operation. Experience proves that all attempts of the kind must either prove abortive or mischievous. In fact, it may be laid down as a law, that the more universal the demand for specie, and the less that demand is interrupted, the more steady and uniform its value, and the more perfectly, of course, it fulfils the great purpose of circulation, for which it was intended. There are, however, not a few who, taking a different view, have thought it to be the duty of the government to prohibit the exportation of specie to China, on the very ground which the senator assumes, and I am not certain but that he himself has been in favor of the measure.

But the senator did not restrict himself to a reply to my arguments. He introduced personal remarks, which neither self-respect, nor a regard to the cause I support, will permit me to pass without notice, as adverse as I am to all personal controversies. Not only my education and disposition, but, above all, my conception of the duties belonging to the station I occupy, indisposes me to such controversies. We are sent here, not to wrangle, or indulge in personal abuse, but to deliberate and decide on the common interests of the states of this union, as far as they have been subjected by the constitution to our jurisdiction. Thus thinking and feeling, and having perfect confidence in the cause I support, I addressed myself, when I was last up, directly and exclusively to the understanding, carefully avoiding every remark which had the least personal or party bearing. In proof of this, I appeal to you, senators, my witnesses and judges on this occasion. But it seems that no caution on my part could prevent what I was so anxious to avoid. The senator, having no pretext to give a personal direction to the discussion, made a premeditated and gratuitous attack on me. I say having no pretext, for there is not a shadow of foundation for the assertion that I called on him and his party to follow my lead, at which he seemed to take offence, as I have already shown. I made no such call, or any thing that could be construed into it. It would have been impertinent, in the relation between myself and his party, at any stage of this question; and absurd at that late period, when every senator had made up his mind. As there was, then, neither provocation nor pretext, what could be the motive of the senator in making the attack? It could not be to indulge in the pleasure of personal abuse, the lowest and basest of all our passions, and which is so far beneath the dignity of the senator's character and station. Nor could it be with the view to intimidation. The senator knows me too long and too well to make such an attempt. I am sent here by constituents as respectable as those he represents, in order to watch over their peculiar interests, and take care of the general concern; and if I were capable of being deterred by any one, or any consequence, in discharging my duty, from denouncing what I regarded as dangerous or corrupt, or giving a decided and zealous support to what I thought right and expedient, I would, in shame and confusion, return my commission to the patriotic and gallant state I represent, to be placed in more resolute and trustworthy hands.

If, then, neither the one nor the other of these be the motive, what, I again repeat, can it be? In casting my eyes over the whole surface, I can see but one, which is, that the senator, despairing of the sufficiency of his reply to overthrow my arguments, had resorted to personalities, in the hope, with their aid, to effect what he could not accomplish by main strength. He well knows that the force of an argument on moral or political subjects depends greatly on the character of him who advances it, and that to cast suspicion on his sincerity or motive, or to shake confidence in his understanding, is often the most effectual mode to destroy its force. Thus viewed, his personalities may be fairly regarded as constituting a part of his reply to my argument; and we, accordingly, find the senator throwing them in front, like a skillful general, in order to weaken my arguments before he brought on his main attack. In repelling, then, his personal attacks, I also defend the cause which I advocate. It is against that his blows are aimed, and he strikes at it through me, because he believes his blows will be the more effectual.

Having given this direction to his reply, he has imposed on me a double duty to repel his attacks: duty to myself and the cause I support. I shall not decline its performance; and when it is discharged, I trust I shall have placed my character as far beyond the darts which he has hurled at it, as my arguments have proved to be above his abilities to reply to them. In doing this, I shall be compelled to speak of myself. No one can be more sensible, than I am, how odious it is to speak of one's self. I shall endeavor to confine myself within the limits of the strictest propriety; but if any thing should escape me that may wound the most delicate ear, the odium ought in justice to fall not on me, but the senator who, by his unprovoked and wanton attack, has imposed on me the painful necessity of speaking of myself.

The leading charge of the senator—that on which all others depend, and which, being overturned, they fall to the ground—is that I have gone over; have left his side, and joined the other. By this vague and indefinite expression, I presume he meant to imply that I had either changed my opinion, or abandoned my principle, or deserted my party. If he did not mean one, or all; if I have changed neither opinions, principles, nor party, then the charge meant nothing deserving notice. But if he intended to imply, what I have presumed he did, I take issue on the fact—I meet and repel the charge. It happened fortunately for me, fortunately for the cause of truth and justice, that it was not the first time that I had offered my sentiments on the question now under consideration. There is scarcely a single point in the present issue on which I did not explicitly express my opinion, four years ago, in my place here, when the removal of the deposits and the questions connected with it were under discussion—so explicitly as to repel effectually the charge of any change on my part, and to make it impossible for me to pursue any other course than I have without involving myself in gross inconsistency. I intend not to leave so important a point to rest on my bare assertion. What I assert stands on record, which I now hold in my possession, and intend, at the proper time, to introduce and read. But, before I do that, it will be proper I should state the questions now at issue, and my course in relation to them, so that, having a clear and distinct perception of them, you may, senators, readily and satisfactorily compare and determine whether my course on the present occasion coincides with the opinions I then expressed.

There are three questions, as is agreed by all, involved in the present issue. Shall we separate the government from the banks, or shall we revive the league of state banks, or create a national bank? My opinion and course in reference to each are well known. I prefer the separation to either of the others; and, as between the other two, I regard a national bank as a more efficient and a less corrupting fiscal agent than a league of state banks. It is also well known that I have expressed myself on the present occasion hostile to the banking system, as it exists, and against the constitutional power of making a bank, unless on the assumption that we have the right to receive and treat bank notes as cash in our fiscal operations, which I, for the first time, have denied on the present occasion. Now, I entertained and expressed all these opinions, on a different occasion, four years ago, except the right of receiving bank notes, in regard to which I then reserved my opinion; and if all this should be fully and clearly established by the record, from speeches delivered and published at the time, the charge of the senator must, in the opinion of all, however prejudiced, sink to the ground. I am now prepared to introduce, and have the record read. I delivered two speeches in the session of 1833-'34, one on the removal of the deposits, and the other on the question of the renewal of the charter of the late bank. I ask the secretary to turn to the volume lying before him, and read the three paragraphs marked in my speech on the deposits. I will thank him to raise his voice, and read slowly, so that he may be distinctly heard, and I must ask you, senators, to give your attentive hearing, for on the coincidence between my opinions then and my course now my vindication against this unprovoked and groundless charge rests.

"If (said Mr. C.) this was a question of bank or no bank; if it involved the existence of the banking system, it would indeed be a great question—one of the first magnitude; and, with my present impression, long entertained, and daily increasing, I would hesitate, long hesitate, before I would be found under the banner of the system. I have great doubts (if doubts they may be called) as to the soundness and tendency of the whole system, in all its modifications. I have great fears that it will be found hostile to liberty and the advance of civilization; fatally hostile to liberty in our country, where the system exists in its worst and most dangerous form. Of all institutions affecting the great question of the distribution of wealth; a question least explored, and the most important of any in the whole range of political economy; the banking institution has, if not the greatest, among the greatest, and, I fear, most pernicious, influence on the mode of distribution. Were the question really before us, I would not shun the responsibility, great as it might be, of freely and fully offering my sentiments on these deeply important points; but, as it is, I must content myself with the few remarks which I have thrown out.

"What, then, is the real question which now agitates the country? I answer, it is a struggle between the executive and legislative departments of the government; a struggle, not in relation to the existence of the bank, but which, congress or the president, should have the power to create a bank, and the consequent control over the currency of the country. This is the real question. Let us not deceive ourselves. This league, this association of banks, created by the executive, bound together by its influence, united in common articles of association, vivified and sustained by receiving the deposits of the public money, and having their notes converted, by being received every where by the treasury, into the common currency of the country, is, to all intents and purposes, a bank of United States, the executive bank of the United States, as distinguished from that of congress.

"However it might fail to perform satisfactorily the useful functions of the Bank of the United States as incorporated by law, it would outstrip it, far outstrip it, in all its dangerous qualities, in extending the power, the influence, and the corruption of the government. It was impossible to conceive any institution more admirably calculated to advance these objects. Not only the selected banks, but the whole banking institutions of the country, and with them the entire money power, for the purpose of speculation, speculation and corruption, would be placed under the control of the executive. A system of menaces and promises will be established; of menaces to the banks in possession of the deposits, but which might not be entirely subservient to executive views; and of promises of future favors to those who may not as yet enjoy its favors. Between the two, the banks would be left without influence, honor, or honesty, and a system of speculation and stock-jobbing would commence, unequalled in the annals of our country.

"So long as the question is one between a bank of the United States, incorporated by congress, and that system of banks which has been created by the will of the executive, it is an insult to the understanding to discourse on the pernicious tendency and unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States. To bring up that question fairly and legitimately, you must go one step farther—you must divorce the government and the banking system. You must refuse all connection with banks. You must neither receive nor pay away bank notes; you must go back to the old system of the strong box, and of gold and silver. If you have a right to receive bank notes at all—to treat them as money by receiving them in your dues, or paying them away to creditors, you have a right to create a bank. Whatever the government receives and treats as money, is money; and, if it be money, then they have the right, under the constitution, to regulate it. Nay, they are bound by a high obligation to adopt the most efficient means, according to the nature of that which they have recognized as money, to give to it the utmost stability and uniformity of value. And if it be in the shape of bank notes, the most efficient means of giving those qualities is a bank of the United States, incorporated by congress. Unless you give the highest practical uniformity to the value of bank notes—so long as you receive them in your dues and treat them as money, you violate that provision of the constitution which provides that taxation shall be uniform throughout the United States. There is no other alternative. I repeat, you must divorce the government entirely from the banking system, or, if not, you are bound to incorporate a bank as the only safe and efficient means of giving stability and uniformity to the currency. And should the deposits not be restored, and the present illegal and unconstitutional connection between the executive and the league of banks continue, I shall feel it my duty, if no one else moves, to introduce a measure to prohibit government from receiving or touching bank notes in any shape whatever, as the only means left of giving safety and stability to the currency, and saving the country from corruption and ruin."

Such were my sentiments, delivered four years since, on the question of the removal of the deposits, and now standing on record; and I now call your attention senators, while they are fresh in your minds, and before other extracts are read, to the opinions I then entertained and expressed, in order that you may compare them with those that I have expressed, and the course I have pursued on the present occasion. In the first place, I then expressed myself explicitly and decidedly against the banking system, and intimated, in language too strong to be mistaken, that, if the question was then bank or no bank, as it now is, as far as government is concerned, I would not be found on the side of the bank. Now, I ask, I appeal to the candor of all, even the most prejudiced, is there any thing in all this contradictory to my present opinions or course? On the contrary, having entertained and expressed these opinions, could I, at this time, when the issue I then supposed is actually presented, have gone against the separation without gross inconsistency? Again, I then declared myself to be utterly opposed to a combination or league of state banks, as being the most efficient and corrupting fiscal agent the government could select, and more objectionable than a bank of the United States. I again appeal, is there a sentiment or a word in all this contradictory to what I have said or done on the present occasion? So far otherwise, is there not a perfect harmony and coincidence throughout, which, considering the distance of time and the difference of the occasion, is truly remarkable, and this extending to all the great and governing questions now at issue?

But the removal of the deposits was not the only question discussed at that remarkable and important session. The charter of the United States Bank was then about to expire. The senator from Massachusetts nearest to me, (Mr. Webster,) then at the head of the committee on finance, suggested, in his place, that he intended to introduce a bill to renew the charter. I clearly perceived that the movement, if made, would fail; and that there was no prospect of doing any thing to arrest the danger approaching, unless the subject was taken up on the broad question of the currency; and that if any connection of the government with the banks could be justified at all, it must be in that relation. I am not among those who believe that the currency was in a sound condition when the deposits were removed in 1834. I then believed, and experience has proved I was correct, that it was deeply and dangerously diseased; and that the most efficient measures were necessary to prevent the catastrophe which has since fallen on the circulation of the country. There was then not more than one dollar in specie, on an average, in the banks, including the United States Bank and all, for six of bank notes in circulation; and not more than one in eleven compared to liabilities of the banks, and this while the United States Bank was in full and active operation, which proves conclusively that its charter ought not to be renewed, if renewed at all, without great modifications. I saw also that the expansion of the circulation, great as it then was, must still farther increase; that the disease lay deep in the system; that the terms on which the charter of the bank of England was renewed would give a western direction to specie, which, instead of correcting the disorder, by substituting specie for bank notes in our circulation, would become the basis of new banking operations that would greatly increase the swelling tide. Such were my conceptions then, and I honestly and earnestly endeavored to carry them into effect, in order to prevent the approaching catastrophe.

The political and personal relations between myself and the senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) were then not the kindest. We stood in opposition at the preceding session on the great question growing out of the conflict between the state I represented and the general government, which could not pass away without leaving unfriendly feelings on both sides; but where duty is involved, I am not in the habit of permitting my personal relations to interfere. In my solicitude to avoid coming dangers, I sought an interview, through a common friend, in order to compare opinions as to the proper course to be pursued. We met, and conversed freely and fully, but parted without agreeing. I expressed to him my deep regret at our disagreement, and informed him that, although I could not agree with him, I would throw no embarrassment in his way, but should feel it to be my duty, when he made his motion to introduce a bill to renew the charter of the bank, to express my opinion at large on the state of the currency and the proper course to be pursued, which I accordingly did. On that memorable occasion I stood almost alone. One party supported the league of state banks, and the other the United States Bank, the charter of which the senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) proposed to renew for six years. Nothing was left me but to place myself distinctly before the country on the ground I occupied, which I did fully and explicitly in the speech I delivered on the occasion. In justice to myself, I ought to have every word of it read on the present occasion. It would of itself be a full vindication of my course. I stated and enlarged on all the points to which I have already referred; objected to the recharter as proposed by the mover, and foretold that what has since happened would follow, unless something effectual was done to prevent it. As a remedy, I proposed to use the Bank of the United States as a temporary expedient, fortified with strong guards, in order to resist and turn back the swelling tide of circulation. With this view, I proposed to prohibit the issue of any note under ten dollars, at first, and after a certain interval, under twenty; and to refuse to receive the notes of any bank that issued notes under five dollars, or that received the notes of any bank that issued less, in order to make a total separation between the banks that should refuse to discontinue the issue of small notes and the others, in the hope that the influence of the latter, with the voice of the community, would ultimately compel a discontinuance. I proposed, that the charter, with these and other provisions that might be devised by a committee appointed for the purpose, should be renewed for twelve years, two years longer than the Bank of England had been, in order to avail ourselves of the experience and wisdom of that great and enlightened nation. All this I proposed expressly on the ground of undoing the system, gradually and slowly, till a total disconnection should be effected, if experience should show that it could be carried to that extent. My object was double; to get clear of the system, and to avoid the catastrophe which has since befallen us, and which I then saw was approaching.

To prove all this, I again refer to the record. If it shall appear from it that my object was to disconnect the government gradually and cautiously from the banking system, and with that view, and that only, I proposed to use the United States Bank for a short time, and that I explicitly expressed the same opinions then as I now have on almost every point connected with the system, I shall not only have vindicated my character from the charge of the senator from Kentucky, but shall do more, much more, to show that I did all an individual, standing alone as I did, could do to avert the present calamities, and, of course, I am free from all responsibility for what has since happened. I have shortened the extracts, as far as was possible to do myself justice, and have left out much that ought, of right, to be read in my defence, rather than to weary the senate. I know how difficult it is to command attention to reading of documents; but I trust that this, where justice to a member of the body, whose character has been assailed, without the least provocation, will form an exception. The extracts are numbered, and I will thank the secretary to pause at the end of each, unless otherwise desired.

The secretary here read the following extract:

"After a full survey of the whole subject, I see none, I can conjecture no means of extricating the country from its present danger, and to arrest its farther increase, but a bank; the agency of which, in some form or under some authority, is indispensable. The country has been brought into the present diseased state of the currency by banks, and must be extricated by their agency. We must, in a word, use a bank to unbank the banks, to the extent that may be necessary to restore a safe and stable currency—just as we apply snow to a frozen limb in order to restore vitality and circulation, or hold up a burn to the flame to extract the inflammation. All must see that it is impossible to suppress the banking system at once. It must continue for a time. Its greatest enemies, and the advocates of an exclusive specie circulation, must make it a part of their system to tolerate the banks for a longer or a shorter period. To suppress them at once would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution—a greater change in the relative condition of the various classes of the community, than would the conquest of the country by a savage enemy. What, then, must be done? I answer, a new and safe system must gradually grow up under, and supplant, the old; imitating, in this respect, the beautiful process we sometimes see, of a wounded or diseased part in a living organic body, gradually superseded by the healing process of nature."

After having so expressed myself, which clearly shows that my object was to use the bank for a time in such a manner as to break the connexion with the system, without a shock to the country or currency, I then proceeded and examine the question, whether this could be best accomplished by the renewal of the charter of the United States Bank, or through a league of state banks. After concluding what I had to say on the subject, in my deep solicitude I addressed the three parties in the senate separately, urging such motives as I thought best calculated to act on them, and pressing them to join me in the measure suggested, in order to avert approaching danger. I began with my friends of the state rights party and with the administration. I have taken copious extracts from the address to the first, which will clearly prove how exactly my opinion then and now coincide on all questions connected with the banks. I now ask the secretary to read the extract numbered two.

"Having now stated the measure necessary to apply the remedy, I am thus brought to the question—can the measure succeed? which brings up the inquiry of how far it may be expected to receive the support of the several parties which compose the senate, and on which I shall next proceed to make a few remarks.

"First, then, can the state rights party give it their support? that party of which I am proud of being a member, and for which I entertain so strong an attachment—the stronger because we are few among many. In proposing this question, I am not ignorant of their long-standing constitutional objection to the bank, on the ground that this was intended to be, as it is usually expressed, a hard-money government—a government whose circulating medium was intended to consist of the precious metals, and for which object the power of coining money and regulating the value thereof was expressly conferred by the constitution. I know how long and how sincerely this opinion has been entertained, and under how many difficulties it has been maintained. It is not my intention to attempt to change an opinion so firmly fixed, but I may be permitted to make a few observations, in order to present what appears to me to be the true question in reference to this constitutional point—in order that we may fully comprehend the circumstances under which we are placed in reference to it. With this view, I do not deem it necessary to inquire whether, in conferring the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, the constitution intended to limit the power strictly to coining money and regulating its value, or whether it intended to confer a more general power over the currency; nor do I intend to inquire whether the word coin is limited simply to the metals, or may be extended to either substances, if, through a gradual change, they may become the medium of the general circulation of the world."

"The very receipt of bank notes on the part of the government, in its dues, would, it is conceded, make them money, as far as the government may be concerned, and by a necessary consequence, would make them, to a great extent, the currency of the country. I say nothing of the positive provisions in the constitution which declare that 'all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States,' which cannot be, unless that in which they are paid should also have, as nearly as practicable, a uniform value throughout the country. To effect this, where bank notes are received, the banking power is necessary and proper within the meaning of the constitution; and consequently, if the government has the right to receive bank notes in its dues, the power becomes constitutional. Here lies, said Mr. C. the real constitutional question: has the government a right to receive bank notes or not? The question is not upon the mere power of incorporating a bank, as it had been commonly argued; though, even in that view, there would be a great constitutional objection to any act on the part of the executive, or any other branch of the government, which should unite any association of state banks into one system, as the means of giving the uniformity and stability to the currency which the constitution intends to confer. The very act of so associating or incorporating them into one, by whatever name called, or by whatever department performed, would be in fact an act of incorporation.

"But, said Mr. C., my object, as I have stated, is not to discuss the constitutional questions, nor to determine whether the bank be constitutional or not. It is, I repeat, to show where the difficulty lies—a difficulty which I have felt from the time I first came into the public service. I found then, as now, the currency of the country consisting almost entirely of bank notes. I found the government intimately connected with the system, receiving bank notes in its dues, and paying them away under its appropriations as cash. The fact was beyond my control; it existed long before my time, and without my agency; and I was compelled to act on the fact as it existed, without deciding on the many questions which I have suggested, as connected with this subject, and on many of which I have never yet formed a definite opinion. No one can pay less regard to precedent than I do, acting here in my representative and deliberative character, on legal or constitutional questions; but I have felt from the beginning the full force of the distinction so sensibly taken by the senator from Virginia, [Mr. Leigh,] between doing and undoing an act, and which he so strongly illustrated in the case of the purchase of Louisiana. The constitutionality of that act was doubted by many at the time, and among others by its author himself; yet he would be considered a madman, who, coming into political life, at this late period, would now seriously take up the question of the constitutionality of the purchase, and, coming to the conclusion that it was unconstitutional, should propose to rescind the act, and eject from the union two flourishing states, and a growing territory."

I next ask the attention of the senators, especially from the northern states, while the secretary reads the short address to the opposition, that they may see how distinctly I foresaw what was coming, and how anxious I was to avert the calamity that has fallen on the section where I anticipated it would. I ask the secretary to read the extract numbered three.

"I next address myself to the members of the opposition, who principally represent the commercial and manufacturing portions of the country, where the banking system has been the farthest extended, and where a larger portion of the property exist in the shape of credit than in any other section; and to whom a sound stable currency is most necessary, and the opposite most dangerous. You have no constitutional objection; to you it is a mere question of expediency; viewing in this light, can you vote for the proposed measure?—a measure designed to arrest the approach of events which I have demonstrated must, if not arrested, create convulsions and revolutions; and to correct a disease which must, if not corrected, subject the currency to continued agitations and fluctuations; and in order to give that permanence, stability, and uniformity which is so essential to your safety and prosperity. To effect this may require some diminution on the profits of banking; some temporary sacrifice of interest; but if such should be the fact, it will be compensated in more than a hundred-fold proportion, by increased security and durable prosperity. If the system must advance in the present course without a check, and if explosion must follow, remember that where you stand will be the crater: should the system quake, under your feet the chasm will open that will engulf your institutions and your prosperity."

I regret to trespass on the patience of the senate, but I wish, in justice to myself, to ask their attention to one more, which, though not immediately relating to the question under consideration, is not irrelevant to my vindication. I not only expressed my opinions freely in relation to the currency and the bank, in the speech from which such copious extracts have been read, but had the precaution to define my political position distinctly in reference to the political parties of the day, and the course I would pursue in relation to each. I then, as now, belonged to the party to which it is my glory ever to have been attached exclusively; and avowed, explicitly, that I belonged to neither of the two parties, opposition or administration, then contending for superiority, which of itself ought to go far to repel the charge of the senator from Kentucky, that I have gone over from one party to the other. The secretary will read the last extract:

"I am the partisan, as I have said, of no class, nor, let me add, of any political party. I am neither of the opposition nor of the administration. If I act with the former in any instance, it is because I approve of their course on the particular occasion; and I shall always be happy to act with them when I do approve. If I oppose the administration; if I desire to see power change hands, it is because I disapprove of the general course of those in authority; because they have departed from the principles on which they came into office; because, instead of using the immense power and patronage put in their hands to secure the liberty of the country and advance the public good, they have perverted them into party instruments for personal objects. But mine has not been, nor will it be, a systematic opposition. Whatever measure of theirs I may deem right, I shall cheerfully support; and I only desire that they shall afford me more frequent occasions for support, and fewer for opposition, than they have heretofore done."

Such, senators, are my recorded sentiments in 1831. They are full and explicit on all the questions involved in the present issue, and prove, beyond the possibility of doubt, that I have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, nor deserted any party. I stand now on the ground I stood then, and, of course, if my relations to the two opposing parties are changed—if I now act with those I then opposed, and oppose those with whom I then acted, the change is not in me. I at least have stood still. In saying this, I accuse none of changing. I leave others to explain their position, now and then, if they deem explanation necessary. But, if I may be permitted to state my opinion, I would say that the change is rather in the questions and the circumstances, than in the opinions or principles of either of the parties. The opposition were then and are now national bank men, and the administration, in like manner, were anti-national bank, and in favor of a league of state banks, while I preferred then, as now, the former to the latter, and a divorce from banks to either. When the experiment of the league failed, the administration were reduced to the option between a national bank and a divorce. They chose the latter, and such, I have no reason to doubt, would have been their choice, had the option been the same four years ago. Nor have I any doubt, had the option been then between a league of banks and divorce, the opposition then, as now, would have been in favor of the league. In all this there is more apparent than real change. As to myself, there has been neither. If I acted with the opposition and opposed the administration then, it was because I was openly opposed to the removal of the deposits and the league of banks, as I now am; and if I now act with the latter and oppose the former, it is because I am now, as then, in favor of a divorce, and opposed to either a league of state banks or a national bank, except indeed as the means of effecting a divorce gradually and safely. What, then, is my offence? What but refusing to abandon my first choice, the divorce from the banks, because the administration has selected it, and of going with the opposition for a national bank, to which I have been and am still opposed? That is all; and for this I am charged with going over—leaving one party and joining the other.

Had some guardian angel, Mr. President, whispered in my ear at the time, "be cautious what you say; this question will not terminate here; four years hence it will be revived, under very different circumstances, when your principles and duty will compel you to act with those you now oppose, and oppose those with whom you now act, when you will be charged with desertion of principles," I could not have guarded myself more effectually than I have done. Yet, in the face of all this, the senator has not only made the charge, but has said, in his place, that he heard, for the first time in his life, at the extra session, that I was opposed to a national bank! I could place the senator in a dilemma from which there is no possibility of escape. I might say to him, you have either forgot or not what I said in 1834. If you have not, how can you justify yourself in making the charge you have? But if you have—if you have forgot what is so recent, and what from the magnitude of the question and the importance of the occasion, was so well calculated to impress itself on your memory, what possible value can be attached to your recollection or opinions, as to my course on more remote and less memorable occasions, on which you have undertaken to impeach my conduct? He may take his choice.

Having now established by the record that I have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, nor deserted any party, the charge of the senator, with all the aspersions with which he accompanied it, falls prostrate to the earth. Here I might leave the subject, and close my vindication. But I choose not. I shall follow the senator up, step by step, in his unprovoked, and, I may now add, groundless attack, with blows not less decisive and victorious.

The senator next proceeded to state, that in a certain document (if he named it, I did not hear him) I assigned as the reason why I could not join in the attack on the administration, that the benefit of the victory would not accrue to myself, or my party, or, as he explained himself, because it would not place myself and them in power. I presume he referred to a letter, in answer to an invitation to a public dinner offered me by my old and faithful friends and constituents of Edgefield, in approval of my course at the extra session.

[Mr. Clay. I do.]

The pressure of domestic engagements would not permit me to accept their invitation, and, in declining it, I deemed it due to them and myself to explain my course, in its political and party bearing, more fully than I had done in debate. They had a right to know my reasons, and I expressed myself with the frankness due to the long and uninterrupted confidence that had ever existed between us.

Having made these explanatory remarks, I now proceed to meet the assertion of the senator. I again take issue on the fact. I assigned no such reason as the senator attributes to me. I never dreamed nor thought of such a one; nor can any force of construction extort from what I said. No; my object was not power or place, either for myself or party. I was far more humble and honest. It was to save ourselves and our principles from being absorbed and lost in a party more numerous and powerful, but differing from us on almost every principle and question of policy.

When the suspension of specie payments took place in May last, (not unexpected to me,) I immediately turned my attention to the event earnestly, considering it as an event pregnant with great and lasting consequences. Reviewing the whole ground, I saw nothing to change in the opinions and principles I had avowed in 1834, and I determined to carry them out, as far as circumstances and my ability would enable me. But I saw that my course must be influenced by the position which the two great contending parties might take in reference to the question. I did not doubt that the opposition would rally either on a national bank, or a combination of state banks, with Mr. Biddle's at the head, but I was wholly uncertain what course the administration would adopt, and remained so until the message of the president was received and read by the secretary at his table. When I saw he went for a divorce, I never hesitated a moment. Not only my opinions and principles long entertained, and, as I have shown, fully expressed years ago, but the highest political motives, left me no alternative. I perceived, at once, that the object, to accomplish which we had acted in concert with the opposition, had ceased; executive usurpations had come to an end for the present; and that the struggle with the administration was no longer for power but to save themselves. I also clearly saw that if we should unite with the opposition in their attack on the administration, the victory over them in the position they occupied, would be a victory over us and our principles. It required no sagacity to see that such would be the result. It was as plain as day. The administration had taken position, as I have shown, on the very ground I occupied in 1834, and which the whole state rights party had taken at the same time in the other house, as its journals will prove. The opposition, under the banner of the bank, were moving against them for the very reason that they had taken the ground they did.

Now, I ask, what would have been the result if we had joined in the attack? No one can now doubt that the victory over those in power would have been certain and decisive, nor would the consequences have been the least doubtful. The first fruit would have been a national bank. The principles of the opposition, and the very object of the attack would have necessarily led to that. We would have been not only too feeble to resist, but would have been committed by joining in the attack with its avowed object to go for one, while those who support the administration would have been scattered in the winds. We should then have had a bank—that is clear; nor is it less certain, that in its train there would have followed all the consequences which have and ever will follow, when tried—high duties, overflowing revenue, extravagant expenditures, large surpluses; in a word, all those disastrous consequences which have well near overthrown our institutions, and involved the country in its present difficulties. The influence of the institution, the known principles and policy of the opposition, and the utter prostration of the administration party, and the absorption of ours, would have led to these results as certainly as we exist.

I now appeal, senators, to your candor and justice, and ask, could I, having all these consequences before me, with my known opinions and that of the party to which I belong, and to which only I owe fidelity, have acted differently from what I did? Would not any other course have justly exposed me to the charge of having abandoned my principles and party, with which I am now accused so unjustly? Nay, would it not have been worse than folly—been madness in me to have taken any other? And yet, the grounds which I have assumed in this exposition are the very reasons assigned in my letter, and which the senator has perverted most unfairly and unjustly into the pitiful, personal and selfish reason, which he has attributed to me. Confirmative of what I say, I again appeal to the record. The secretary will read the paragraph marked in my Edgefield letter, to which, I presume, the senator alluded.

"As soon as I saw this state of things, I clearly perceived that a very important question was presented for our determination, which we were compelled to decide forthwith—shall we continue our joint attack with the nationals with those in power, in the new position which they have been compelled to occupy? It was clear, with our joint forces, we could utterly overthrow and demolish them, but it was not less clear that the victory would enure not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of our allies and their cause. They were the most numerous and powerful, and the point of assault on the position which the party to be assailed had taken in relation to the banks would have greatly strengthened the settled principles and policy of the national party, and weakened, in the same degree, ours. They are, and ever have been, the decided advocates of a national bank, and are now in favor of one with a capital so ample as to be sufficient to control the state institutions, and to regulate the currency and exchanges of the country. To join them, with their avowed object in the attack to overthrow those in power, on the ground they occupied against a bank, would, of course, not only have placed the government and country in their hands without opposition, but would have committed us, beyond the possibility of extrication, for a bank, and absorbed our party in the ranks of the national republicans. The first fruits of the victory would have been an overshadowing national bank, with an immense capital, not less than from fifty to a hundred millions, which would have centralized the currency and exchanges, and with them the commerce and capital of the country, in whatever section the head of the institution might be placed. The next would be the indissoluble union of the political opponents, whose principles and policy are so opposite to ours, and so dangerous to our institutions, as well as oppressive to us."

I now ask, is there any thing in this extract which will warrant the construction that the senator has attempted to force on it? Is it not manifest that the expression on which he fixes, that the victory would enure, not to us, but exclusively to the benefit of the opposition, alludes not to power or place, but to principle and policy? Can words be more plain? What then becomes of all the aspersions of the senator, his reflections about selfishness and the want of patriotism, and his allusions and illustrations to give them force and effect? They fall to the ground without deserving a notice, with his groundless accusation.

But, in so premeditated and indiscriminate an attack, it could not be expected that my motives would entirely escape, and we accordingly find the senator very charitably leaving it to time to disclose my motives for going over! I, who have changed no opinion, abandoned no principle, and deserted no party; I, who have stood still and maintained my ground against every difficulty, to be told that it is left to time to disclose my motive! The imputation sinks to the earth with the groundless charge on which it rests. I stamp it with scorn in the dust. I pick up the dart, which fell harmless at my feet. I hurl it back. What the senator charges on me unjustly, he has actually done. He went over on a memorable occasion, and did not leave it to time to disclose his motive.

The senator next tells us that I bore a character for stern fidelity, which he accompanied with remarks implying that I had forfeited it by my course on the present occasion. If he means by stern fidelity a devoted attachment to duty and principle, which nothing can overcome, the character is indeed, a high one, and, I trust not entirely unmerited. I have, at least, the authority of the senator himself for saying that it belonged to me before the present occasion, and it is, of course, incumbent on him to show that I have since forfeited it. He will find this task a herculean one. It would be by far more easy to show the opposite, that, instead of forfeiting, I have strengthened my title to the character; instead of abandoning any principles, I have firmly adhered to them, and that, too, under the most appalling difficulties. If I were to select an instance in the whole course of my life on which, above all others, to rest my claim to the character which the senator attributed to me, it would be this very one, which he has selected to prove that I have forfeited it. I acted with the full knowledge of the difficulties I had to encounter, and the responsibility I must incur. I saw a great and powerful party, probably the most powerful in the country eagerly seizing on the catastrophe which had befallen the currency, and the consequent embarrassments that followed, to displace those in power; against whom they had been long contending. I saw that, to stand between them and their object, I must necessarily incur their deep and lasting displeasure. I also saw that, to maintain the administration in the position they had taken, to separate the government from the banks, I would draw down on me, with the exception of some of the southern banks, the whole weight of that extensive, concentrated, and powerful interest—the most powerful by far of any in the whole community; and thus I would unite against me a combination of political and moneyed influence almost irresistible. Nor was this all. I could not but see that, however pure and disinterested my motives, and however consistent my course with all I had ever said or done, I would be exposed to the very charges and aspersions which I am now repelling. The ease with which they could be made, and the temptation to make them, I saw were too great to be resisted by the party morality of the day, as groundless as I have demonstrated them to be. But there was another consequence that I could not but foresee, far more painful to me than all others. I but too clearly saw that, in so sudden and complex a juncture, called on as I was to decide on my course instantly, as it were, on the field of battle, without consultation, or explaining my reasons, I would estrange for a time many of my political friends, who had passed through with me so many trials and difficulties, and for whom I feel a brother's love. But I saw before me the path of duty, and, though rugged, and hedged on all sides with these and many other difficulties, I did not hesitate a moment to take it. Yes, alone, as the senator sneeringly says. After I had made up my mind as to my course, in a conversation with a friend about the responsibility I would assume, he remarked that my own state might desert me. I replied that it was not impossible; but the result has proved that I underestimated the intelligence and patriotism of my virtuous and noble state. I ask her pardon for the distrust implied in my answer; but I ask with assurance it will be granted, on the grounds I shall put it—that in being prepared to sacrifice her confidence, as dear to me as light and life, rather than disobey, on this great question, the dictates of my judgment and conscience, I proved myself worthy of being her representative.

But, if the senator, in attributing to me stern fidelity, meant, not devotion to principle, but to party, and especially the party of which he is so prominent a member, my answer is, that I never belonged to his party, nor owed it any fidelity; and, of course, could forfeit, in reference to it, no character for fidelity. It is true, we acted in concert against what we believed to be the usurpations of the executive; and it is true, that, during the time, I saw much to esteem in those with whom I acted, and contracted friendly relations with many which I shall not be the first to forget. It is also true that a common party designation was applied to the opposition in the aggregate, not, however, with my approbation; but it is no less true that it was universally known that it consisted of two distinct parties, dissimilar in principle and policy, except in relation to the object for which they had united: the national republican party, and the portion of the state rights party which had separated from the administration, on the ground that it had departed from the true principles of the original party. That I belonged exclusively to that detached portion, and to neither the opposition nor administration party, I prove by my explicit declaration, contained in one of the extracts read from my speech on the currency in 1834. That the party generally, and the state which I represent in part, stood aloof from both of the parties, may be established from the fact that they refused to mingle in the party and political contests of the day. My state withheld her electoral vote in two successive presidential elections; and, rather than to bestow it on either the senator from Kentucky, or the distinguished citizen whom he opposed, in the first of those elections, she threw her vote on a patriotic citizen of Virginia, since deceased, of her own politics, but who was not a candidate; and, in the last she refused to give it to the worthy senator from Tennessee near me, (Judge White,) though his principles and views of policy approach so much nearer to hers than that of the party to which the senator from Kentucky belongs. But, suppose the fact was otherwise, and that the two parties had blended so as to form one, and that I owed to the united party as much fidelity as I do to that to which I exclusively belonged; even on that supposition, no conception of party fidelity could have controlled my course on the present occasion. I am not among those who pay no regard to party obligations; on the contrary, I place fidelity to party among the political virtues, but I assign it to a limited sphere. I confine it to matters of detail and arrangement, and to minor questions of policy. Beyond that, on all questions involving principles, or measures calculated to affect materially the permanent interests of the country, I look only to God and country.

And here, Mr. President, I avail myself of the opportunity to declare my present political position, so that there may be no mistake hereafter. I belong to the old republican state rights party of '98. To that, and that alone, I owe fidelity, and by that I shall stand through every change in spite of every difficulty. Its creed is to be found in the Kentucky resolutions, and Virginia resolutions and report, and its policy is to confine the action of this government within the narrowest limits compatible with the peace and security of these states, and the objects for which the union was expressly formed. I, as one of that party, shall support all who support its principles and policy, and oppose all who oppose them. I have given, and shall continue to give, the administration a hearty and sincere support on the great question now under discussion; because I regard it as in strict conformity to our creed and policy, and shall do every thing in my power to sustain them under the great responsibility which they have assumed. But let me tell those who are more interested in sustaining them than myself, that the danger which threatens them lies not here, but in another quarter. This measure will tend to uphold them, if they stand fast and adhere to it with fidelity. But, if they wish to know where the danger is, let them look to the fiscal department of the government. I said, years ago, that we were committing an error the reverse of the great and dangerous one that was committed in 1833, and to which we owe our present difficulties, and all we have since experienced. Then, we raised the revenue greatly, when the expenditures were about to be reduced by the discharge of the public debt; and now, we have doubled the disbursements, when the revenue is rapidly decreasing; an error, although probably not so fatal to the country, will prove, if immediate and vigorous measures be not adopted, far more so to those in power. The country will not, and ought not, to bear the creation of a new debt, beyond what may be temporarily necessary to meet the present embarrassment, and any attempt to increase the duties must and ought to prove fatal to those who may make it, so long as the expenditures may, by economy and accountability, be brought within the limits of the revenue.

But the senator did not confine his attack to my conduct and motives in reference to the present question. In his eagerness to weaken the cause I support, by destroying confidence in me, he made an indiscriminate attack on my intellectual faculties, which he characterized as metaphysical, eccentric, too much of genius, and too little common sense, and of course wanting a sound and practical judgment.

Mr. President, according to my opinion, there is nothing of which those who are endowed with superior mental faculties ought to be more cautious than to reproach those with their deficiency to whom Providence has been less liberal. The faculties of our mind are the immediate gift of our Creator, for which we are no farther responsible than for their proper cultivation, according to our opportunities, and their proper application to control and regulate our actions. Thus thinking, I trust I shall be the last to assume superiority on my part, or reproach any one with inferiority on his; but those who do not regard the rule, when applied to others, cannot expect it to be observed when applied to themselves. The critic must expect to be criticized, and he who points out the faults of others, to have his own pointed out.

I cannot retort on the senator the charge of being metaphysical. I cannot accuse him of possessing the powers of analysis and generalization, those high faculties of the mind (called metaphysical by those who do not possess them) which decompose and resolve into their elements the complex masses of ideas that exist in the world of mind, as chemistry does the bodies that surround us in the material world; and without which those deep and hidden causes which are in constant action, and producing such mighty changes in the condition of society, would operate unseen and undetected. The absence of these higher qualities of the mind is conspicuous throughout the whole course of the senator's public life. To this it may be traced that he prefers the spacious to the solid, and the plausible to the true. To the same cause, combined with an ardent temperament, it is owing that we ever find him mounted on some popular and favorite measure which he whips along, cheered by shouts of the multitude, and never dismounts till he has rode it down. Thus, at one time, we find him mounted on the protective system, which he rode down; at another, on internal improvement; and now he is mounted on a bank, which will surely share the same fate, unless those who are immediately interested shall stop him in his headlong career. It is not the fault of his mind to seize on a few prominent and striking advantages and to pursue them eagerly without looking to consequences. Thus, in the case of the protective system, he was struck with the advantages of manufactures, and, believing that high duties was the proper mode of protecting them, he pushed forward the system without seeing that he was enriching one portion of the country at the expense of the other, corrupting the one and alienating the other; and, finally, dividing the community into two great hostile interests, which terminated in the overthrow of the system itself. So, now, he looks only to uniform currency and a bank as a means of securing it, without once reflecting how far the banking system has progressed, and the difficulties that impede its farther progress; that banking and politics are running together to their mutual destruction; and that the only possible mode of saving his favorite system is to separate it from the government.

To the defects of understanding, which the senator attributes to me, I make no reply. It is for others, and not me, to determine the portion of understanding which it has pleased the author of my being to bestow on me. It is, however, fortunate for me, that the standard by which I shall be judged is not the false, prejudiced, and, as I have shown, unfounded opinion which the senator has expressed, but my acts. They furnish materials, neither few nor scant, to form a just estimate of my mental faculties. I have now been more than twenty-six years continuously in the service of this government, in various stations, and have taken part in almost all the great questions which have agitated this country during this long and important period. Throughout the whole I have never followed events, but have taken my stand in advance, openly and freely, avowing my opinions on all questions, and leaving it to time and experience to condemn or approve my course. Thus acting, I have often, and on great questions, separated from those with whom I usually acted, and if I am really so defective in sound and practical judgement as the senator represents, the proof, if to be found any where, must be found in such instances, or where I have acted on my sole responsibility. Now, I ask, in which of the many instances of the kind is such proof to be found. It is not my intention to call to the recollection of the senate all such; but that you, senators, may judge for yourselves, it is due, in justice to myself, that I should suggest a few of the most prominent, which at the time were regarded as the senator now considers the present; and then, as now, because, where duty is involved, I would not submit to party trammels.

I go back to the commencement of my public life, the war session, as it was usually called, of 1812, when I first took my seat in the other house, a young man, without experience to guide me, and I shall select, as the first instance, the navy. At that time the administration and the party to which I was strongly attached were decidedly opposed to this important arm of service. It was considered anti-republican to support it; but acting with my then distinguished colleague, Mr. Cheves, who led the way, I did not hesitate to give it my hearty support, regardless of party ties. Does this instance sustain the charge of the senator?

The next I shall select is the restrictive system of that day; the embargo, the non-importation and non-intercourse acts. This, too, was a party measure, which had been long and warmly contested, and of course the lines of party well drawn. Young and inexperienced as I was, I saw its defects and readily opposed it, almost alone of my party. The second or third speech I made, after I took my seat, was in open denunciation of the system; and I may refer to the grounds I then assumed, the truth of which have been confirmed by time and experience, with pride and confidence. This will scarcely be selected by the senator to make good his charge.

I pass over other instances, and come to Mr. Dallas's bank of 1814-1815. That too, was a party measure. Banking was then comparatively but little understood, and it may seem astonishing at this time, that such a project should ever have received any countenance or support. It proposed to create a bank of $50,000,000, to consist almost entirely of what was called then the war stocks; that is, the public debt created in carrying on the then war. It was provided that the bank should not pay specie during the war, and for three years after its termination, for carrying on which it was to lend the government the funds. In plain language, the government was to borrow back its own credit from the bank, and pay to the institution six per cent. for its use. I had scarcely ever before seriously thought of banks or banking, but I clearly saw through the operation, and the danger to the government and country, and, regardless of party ties or denunciations, I opposed and defeated it in the manner I explained at the extra session. I then subjected myself to the very charge which the senator now makes, but time has done me justice, as it will in the present instance.

Passing the intervening instance, I come down to my administration of the war department where I acted on my own judgement and responsibility. It is known to all, that the department at the time, was perfectly disorganized, with not much less than $50,000,000 of outstanding and unsettled accounts, and the greatest confusion in every branch of service. Though without experience, I prepared, shortly after I went in, the bill for its organization, and on its passage I drew up the body of rules for carrying the act into execution, both of which remain substantially unchanged to this day. After reducing the outstanding accounts to a few millions, and introducing order and accountability in every branch of service, and bringing down the expenditure of the army from four to two and a half millions annually, without subtracting a single comfort from either officer or soldier, I left the department in a condition that might well be compared to the best in any country. If I am deficient in the qualities which the senator attributes to me, here in this mass of detail and business it ought to be discovered. Will he look to this to make good his charge?

From the war department I was transferred to the chair which you now occupy. How I acquitted myself in the discharge of its duties, I leave it to the body to decide, without adding a word. The station, from its leisure, gave me a good opportunity to study the genius of the prominent measure of the day, called then the American system, of which I profited. I soon perceived where its errors lay, and how it would operate. I clearly saw its desolating effects in one section, and corrupting influence in the other; and when I saw that it could not be arrested here, I fell back on my own state, and a blow was given to a system destined to destroy our institutions, if not overthrown, which brought it to the ground. This brings me down to the present times, and where passions and prejudices are yet too strong to make an appeal, with any prospect of a fair and impartial verdict. I then transfer this, and all my subsequent acts, including the present, to the tribunal of posterity, with a perfect confidence that nothing will be found in what I have said or done, to impeach my integrity or understanding.

I have now, senators, repelled the attacks on me. I have settled the account and cancelled the debt between me and my accuser. I have not sought this controversy, nor have I shunned it when forced on me. I have acted on the defensive, and if it is to continue, which rests with the senator, I shall throughout continue so to act. I know too well the advantage of my position to surrender it. The senator commenced the controversy, and it is but right that he should be responsible for the direction it shall hereafter take. Be his determination what it may, I stand prepared to meet him.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

May 10. Mr. Webster rose, and said that, a few days ago, one of the honorable members from Maine presented certain proceedings of the legislature of Maine upon the important subject of the northeastern boundary. It is generally known (said Mr. W.) that the commonwealth of Massachusetts has deep stake in this question, and her legislature is sensibly alive to its importance, and to its present state, as a question pending between the United States and England. During its late session, the subject was referred to a committee of the legislature, and a report made, which I think a very able and satisfactory exposition of the matter in controversy. On this report, the legislature adopted sundry resolutions; and I now present both the report and the resolutions, and propose that they be printed for the use of the senators.

It is my purpose, sir, when the subject shall be called up, as I understand it will be in a few days, to say something upon it. The honorable member from Maine will naturally take a lead on this subject, so far as any thing is to be said or done here; but I propose also to take some little part, for the purpose of explaining to the senate, if I can, the true question existing between the two countries, and its great magnitude and importance to the states concerned. It has become indispensably necessary, in my opinion, that the two houses of congress should be induced to give to the subject their immediate and serious attention.

Mr. Williams gave notice that he should ask leave to-morrow to bring in a bill for the survey of the northeastern boundary.

Mr. Buchanan presented the memorial of the trustees of the university of Pennsylvania, asking congress to grant a portion of the public domain to that institution, and to others of a similar character for the purpose of promoting the cause of education, and moved that it be printed, and referred to the committee on public lands; which was ordered accordingly.

Several petitions, memorials, &c. were presented and appropriately referred.

A message was received from the president of the United States, through Mr. A. Van Buren, his private secretary, representing the treasury to be almost wholly destitute of available means, and recommending the prompt passage of some measure of relief by congress, and especially an authority for the secretary of the treasury to reissue the $10,000,000 of treasury notes authorized by congress at the extra session. The message was accompanied by a report made to the executive by the secretary of the treasury, giving the details of the embarrassments of the treasury. Both documents were read, referred to the committee on finance, and ordered to be printed. [For the message &c. see page 175.]

The Vice President presented from the war department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of March 30th, a report of the commissioner of Indian affairs on the subject of money allowed to the Indians. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Niles, the committee on the library were instructed to inquire whether there was any thing now due to Hezekiah Orcutt for the bust of chief justice Ellsworth, and, if so, to bring in a bill for his relief.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on commerce, to whom had been referred two senate resolutions relating to light-houses, made a report on the subject which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Rives gave notice that he should to-morrow, ask leave to introduce a bill to reorganize the marine cops.

The senate took up, on its third reading, the bill to construct a hospital in the city of Washington. Mr. Niles spoke briefly against the bill, but inaudible to the reporter. Mr. Roane spoke in reply to Mr. Niles, and in favor of the bill.

Mr. Morris argued at some length against the constitutional power of congress to pass the bill on the general ground that they had no power to make appropriations in the District for local purposes. Mr. Buchanan opposed the bill exclusively on the ground of the present destitute condition of the treasury. He moved that the bill be postponed to the first Monday in December, next, and called for the yeas and nays on the question, which were ordered. Mr. Williams spoke in favor of the bill, and in reply to Mr. Niles, who had made a statement which he thought incorrect. Mr. Calhoun opposed the bill, both on the ground of its constitutionality and expediency.

The bill was postponed to the first day of the next session by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Nicholas, Niles, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Tipton, Wall, White, Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Linn, Lumpkin, Merrick, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Trotter, Webster, Williams, Young—21.

The bill to authorize the sale of the bonds given to the government for stock in the late Bank of the U. States, was read a third time, and passed, and sent to the other house for concurrence.

Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill to prevent the counterfeiting of treasury notes. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Benton moved, as a substitute for the bill, to extend the charters of certain banks named therein (all the banks) to the 4th day of March, 1839, provided said banks should not issue notes of a less denomination than $5; that they should not pay out the notes of non-specie-paying banks; that they should redeem all their notes of $5 when required, after the 1st of July next; and should resume specie payments in full on the 1st of September next.

Mr. Roane was understood to speak in opposition to this amendment, and in favor of the bill as it was.

Mr. Hubbard also opposed the amendment, and sent an amendment of his own to the table; the import of which was developed only by the remark of Mr. H. that it proposed to extend farther the existing charters of the banks.

Mr. Tipton spoke with much earnestness in favor of the bill as it was. He said it had been prepared with great care by the committee, and there would be danger of defeating the whole measure if it should be materially altered. Five months of the session were gone, this measure being put off from time to time, and now it already began to be said that too much time was gone for this bill to pass. Mr. T. spoke feelingly of the uncertainty and distractions produced in the District by the delays of congress to legislate in due time on District concerns. He commended one of the banks as being one of the few that had resumed specie payments.

Mr. Knight said he hoped we should not postpone this question, but act on it at this time. He did not agree with the senator from Indiana in regard to one of the banks of this city—he meant the bank that had been paying specie for the last five or six months. I do not (said Mr. K.) consider the conduct of that bank any more meritorious than the others. What would have been the condition of the citizens of this District had the other banks called in their bills, and issued none? Why, sir, many of the citizens would have been bankrupt; they would not have had a circulating medium for the transacting of their business, and of course could not pay the demands against them. As to the banks being able to redeem all their bills in circulation, there can be no doubt of that fact. Let the people pay a small part of what they owe the banks, and the banks will be able to redeem all their bills. If the debtors will pay ten per cent. of what they owe to the banks in gold and silver the banks will pay all their paper in circulation without the least delay; but, until this is done, it is better to let them go on as they now do; the public will be safe, the banks will sustain the business of the community, and no loss will accrue to any body. But to break them up, and compel them to close their business, would only injure the men and business of the District, and do no good to others.—Therefore, it seems to me the better course would be to continue their present charters for a limited time, which may be done by striking out all the amendment of the senator from Missouri except the first clause, and alter its date to the time that shall be agreed on, and this is all that may be necessary at this time. The banks then may go on, and they will resume specie payments as soon as the people are able to pay them. I will not make the motion to amend the amendment, but will only suggest it for the consideration of the senate.

Mr. Benton uttered a strong and earnest condemnation of those banks which had resumed specie payments. They had no notes out of their own, and were helping to circulate the notes of other and non-specie-paying banks. He considered them as the worst and most culpable of all, and Mr. B. was not to be bamboozled by any such pretence of resuming specie payments.

Mr. Tipton again spoke earnestly in favor of giving these banks a fair opportunity to resume with the other banks of the country, without destroying themselves and distressing the community. He entreated the senate not to give this bill the go-by, but to act upon it promptly and definitively. He expressed some surprise at Mr. B.'s condemnation of specie-paying banks.

Mr. Benton reiterated that condemnation in strong and unqualified terms.

Mr. Grundy commended the Bank of Washington, so far as it redeemed its own paper when it was presented. In doing this it only fulfilled its engagement; and it was uncertain whether it was to be condemned for aiding in circulating the bills of other banks. If it did it in the course of its useful and necessary business, it was still in the way of its duty; but if it did it under an engagement to benefit other banks by a circulation of their notes, it was highly censurable. Mr. G. spoke also in favor of delaying action on this subject till congress could see whether these banks would actually resume specie payments. He was wholly opposed to acting at all at this time on the subject.

Mr. Hubbard spoke in vindication of specie-paying banks, in reply to Mr. Benton. He opposed, also, the continuance of the banks for twenty years, as proposed by the bill, and advocated their continuance for a shorter period, till congress should have time to consider and determine what ought to be done.

Mr. Niles spoke earnestly against the bill, as sanctioning the violation of law, and as enlisting congress under the banner of non-resumption, which he described as already triumphant over the laws and the country.

Mr. Davis spoke in opposition to all measures of delay or postponement on this subject. The committees of this house and the other had examined the condition of these banks, and, on the whole, had become entirely satisfied that they were right. If congress were not now prepared to act, Mr. D. regretted it, for they ought to be prepared. A kind of rod in pickle had for some time been held over these banks, and it had operated to produce very great injury to the banks themselves, and through them to the community. Restrictive and menacing propositions had been made in congress from time to time, and a determination had been expressed to carry them into effect. This, of itself, had imposed restraint upon the operations of the banks, so as to prevent their affording the necessary facilities for business, and had thus distressed and embarrassed the community, and, in some cases, had produced bankruptcy. Mr. D. also, in reply to Mr. Benton, vindicated those banks which, like those in his own state, were now endeavoring to resume specie payments.

Mr. Benton explained that he meant his remarks to apply only to those banks that pretended to pay specie, when they had no notes in circulation.—Such, he said, was the case with the Bank of Washington; its specie-paying was a humbug.

Mr. Davis could not deny that it was so; he had not seen the notes of the Bank of Washington in circulation; but he insisted that, from the very nature of the case, their notes could not circulate. They would be immediately returned upon them for specie, till specie should be at par with paper, by a general resumption.

After a few further remarks from Mr. Niles, in favor of acting on high legislative principles, without regard to temporary inconvenience, and from Mr. Davis, in reply, the amendments or substitutes of Messrs. Benton and Hubbard were ordered to be printed, and the action on the bill was informally suspended, at the request of Mr. Buchanan, who wished to examine further the original bill.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session. May 11. After the presentation of memorials, &c., Mr. Moulton, on leave, introduced a bill to authorize goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States to be deposited in warehouses. Read twice, and referred.

On motion of Mr. Robbins, the secretary of the treasury was directed to inform the senate, as soon as practicable, of the amount of goods imported into the United States from May 10, 1837, to May 10, 1838, and also the amount of duties received in the same period.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the secretary of the senate was directed to deliver to the solicitor of the treasury, for the use of his office, a copy of the documents and laws on the public lands, published by Duff Green.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the bill for the relief of Hard & Longstreet was taken up, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Anthony Gale was indefinitely postponed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Niles spoke and read extracts at much length in opposition to the bill.

Mr. Buchanan said he should be pleased to vote for this bill, and he should do so if it could be brought to the form in which he thought it ought to be; but he could not vote for it in its present form. He would, therefore, offer two or three amendments, which, if not adopted, he should feel compelled to vote against the bill.

Mr. B. accordingly moved to strike out the second section of the bill, which allows to each of the banks a capital of $500,000. He thought a $3,000,000 bank capital for this District quite too much, making a direct increase of $1,200,000.—His object was to continue the capital of each bank as it now actually was.

Mr. Roane said he should rest satisfied in the end with this bill, in any form which its friends might think proper to give it. But he was opposed to this amendment. It was the design of the committee not to fix the capital at the amount actually employed, but to give room for increase in case the business of the District should require it, in consequence of the expected increase of trade with the west. But they had taken it for granted that there would be no actual increase of capital, unless the state of business should demand it. Mr. R. thought it very important that the contingent privilege should be granted to each bank, of increasing its capital, if necessary, to $500,000.

Mr. Williams was understood to speak in favor of fixing a limit suitable to the actual capital, leaving it to congress hereafter to extend that limit if it should be found necessary. He also argued in favor of allowing all individuals in a community to partake equally of the benefits of banking.

Mr. Hubbard spoke in favor of retaining the second section, and modifying it so as to reduce the capital of each bank, if thought best, from $500,000 to $335,000 which was the present actual capital of the Bank of Washington.

Mr. King said he happened to be chairman of the committee appointed to examine into the condition of the District banks at the time (1834) when some of them had suspended specie payments. He was then prejudiced against them, and therefore was disposed to examine with great strictness, whether, in suspension, they had been subject to any improper influence, and the committee were fully satisfied, after examination, that there had been no such influence; they had done all they could to continue specie payments, but had been compelled to suspend by the banks in Baltimore; they had then acted a most honorable part, by giving public notice that they would be able to redeem all their notes, and calling on the holders to make no sacrifice upon them.

Mr. K. also stated that the purchase of their own stock by the banks had been done in an honorable manner, not to enrich themselves, but they had purchased it at the market price from individuals in order to enable them to free themselves from debt.

Mr. K. also argued in favor of equalizing the capital among the different banks, if it should be thought best to reduce it.

Mr. Buchanan, in reply to Mr. Hubbard, who wished the second section to be modified so as to equalize the capital, said he wished the old stock and the old stockholders to remain as they were.

Mr. Davis advocated the bill in its original form. He thought the committee had the best means of judging what was best for the District. He argued that a large capital was both better and safer for the community; that the danger was not in a large capital, but a false capital; that it was better for the community to have banks numerous enough to admit of free competition in their efforts to accommodate the public; and that bank stock was almost invariably purchased up by the corporation, for the exclusive purpose of maintaining its credit.

Mr. Buchanan said he thought $1,000,000 of capital sufficient for the city of Washington alone.—With a population of 40,000, and without much commerce, their actual capital was now $940,000.

Mr. Merrick expressed much regret at the condition which Mr. Buchanan had attached to his vote, and he spoke with great earnestness in favor of the original bill. He argued that the amount of capital proposed by the bill was not equal in proportion to the capital in the larger cities of the country.

Mr. Webster said he was rather disposed to reduce the capital, if it could be properly done; but the reduction proposed by Mr. Buchanan would cause very great inequality, to which he could not agree.

After a few further remarks on this point by Messrs. Williams, Buchanan, Merrick, Webster and Hubbard,

Mr. Buchanan modified his motion so as to leave the second section in the bill, and to amend it by making the capital of the Bank of Washington $335,000 to be divided into 16,750 shares, of $20 dollars each, instead of a capital of $500,000, divided into 25,000 shares of the same amount.

Mr. Southard argued at considerable length, and with much earnestness, chiefly from statistical data, in favor of the bill as it was. He also commented on the apparent inconsistency of denouncing bank paper as bank rags, and then denouncing the banks for drawing in their paper. Mr. Benton spoke at much length, partly in reply, but mainly on the general subject of the bill. Mr. Southard showed that by the act of 1811 each of these banks was allowed a capital of $500,000. This bill, therefore, proposed no increase of capital.

Mr. Buchanan said his object was to continue the actual capital of the banks as they now were, and as they had themselves made them. He was opposed to allowing them any actual increase at this time.

Mr. B.'s amendment, was agreed to, as follows: YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Knight, Liun, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster—12.

Mr. Buchanan moved further to amend the bill, by requiring the banks to keep an amount of specie in their vaults equal to one-fourth of their private deposits as well as of their circulation.

Mr. Roane explained the ground on which the committee had required specie only to the amount of one fourth of the circulation.

Mr. Buchanan argued, from the practice in England and other places, that safety required specie to the amount proposed by his amendment.

On motion of Mr. Benton, who expressed a desire to obtain some additional evidence on the subject, The senate adjourned.

May 12. Several memorials, petitions, &c. in reference to the treaty with the Cherokees were presented and laid on the table.

A resolution before offered by Mr. Hubbard was taken up, and modified by the mover to the following import:

Resolved, That no original paper relative to any private claims shall be withdrawn from the files of the senate after they shall have been referred to committees and reported upon; but the secretary of the senate, when required, shall give certified copies of the same, for the same fees as are now charged for similar duties in the state department; which fees shall be placed by the secretary to the credit of the contingent fund of the senate.

Mr. Sevier objected to this increase of duty on the part of the secretary, without allowing him any additional compensation.

Mr. Hubbard remarked that the oversight of this was one of the appropriate duties of the secretary as such, for which he received a regular salary. He would of course be authorized to employ another clerk, if he should have occasion for more assistance.

Mr. Clayton suggested the propriety of furnishing the copies required free of expense to the withdrawers, as they had heretofore withdrawn their original papers without expense.

Mr. Hubbard would prefer this to the withdrawal of the original papers; the detention of which he insisted was of great importance.

Mr. Davis spoke strongly in favor of the resolution as calculated to prevent the maturing and bolstering of fraudulent claims. He believed, if the resolution should be adopted, very few copies of the papers would be called for, whether or not any charge for them should be made.

The resolution, as stated above, was then agreed to.

The senate took up the bill to prevent the counterfeiting of treasury notes, and other obligations and securities of the government.

Mr. Preston objected strongly to the second section of the bill, which provides that no person accused shall escape conviction, as by the common law, on account of the mere want of literal, technical or formal accuracy. He argued that this principle of the common law often rescued the innocent from the impetuosity of power, and he was unwilling that this principle of the common law should in this way be invaded. Mr. Wall stated that this principle had been given up in England and in this country to a considerable extent, as often affording an escape for rogues. Mr. Preston said it was better that ten rogues should escape than that one innocent person should suffer. He regarded these technicalities, difficulties, and delays in prosecutions as among the encroachments of liberty which he was unwilling to abandon.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, and with the assent of Mr. Wall, the above described second section of the bill was stricken out, and the bill so amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Hard & Longstreet was read a third time, earnestly opposed by Mr. King and Mr. Morris, as earnestly advocated by Mr. Preston, also by Mr. Robinson, and was then passed without division. On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate held a short executive session. After the executive session, Mr. Buchanan (having called up the bill for that purpose) modified his motion of yesterday in regard to specie in the bank of Washington, so as to require it, after the 1st of January next, to have an amount of specie "equal to at least one-fourth of its circulation and average private deposits, excluding special deposits." This provision is of course designed to be made general.

The senate then adjourned.

May 14. Mr. Webster presented the memorial of the citizens of Stoneham, in Massachusetts, relative to the Cherokee treaty, and praying congress not to enforce that treaty.

Mr. W. said it was evident that a very general feeling existed in the country, that injustice had been done to the Cherokees; that the treaty was never assented to by the tribe; that it was founded in injustice, and obtained by fraud and bribery; and that it is due to honor, justice, and national character, that the whole proceedings should be revised, in a spirit of fairness and equity, and all done that can be done to do right to these people. He fervently hoped those who had the power over the case would give their immediate and serious attention to the subject.

The memorial was laid on the table.

Mr. McKean presented a memorial from citizens of Bedford county, Pennsylvania, complaining of the great inconvenience by reason of the regulations of the general post office department requiring the payment of postage to be made in specie; that, owing to the scarcity of specie now in circulation, there is not a sufficiency to be obtained for that purpose; and that all the small change in specie is concentrated in the post office, to the injury of the citizens generally; and praying that a law may be passed compelling the postmasters throughout the United States to receive current bank notes in payment of postage. Referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

Mr. McK. also presented seven memorials, signed by a large number of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against carrying into effect the treaty of New Echota, made with the Cherokee Indians. Laid on the table.

Mr. Prentiss presented the memorial of a number of citizens of Montpelier, Vermont, remonstrating against the execution of the Cherokee treaty. Laid on the table.

Mr. Swift presented the petition of Andrew Norton. Referred.

Mr. Norvell presented the petitions of Benjamin F. Potts and another individual. Referred.

Mr. Williams asked leave, in pursuance of previous notice, to introduce a bill for the survey of the northeastern boundary of the United States.

Mr. W. accompanied his motion for leave by a history of the circumstances to which the bill (according with the treaty on which the United States rely) owed its origin, and made some remarks in favor of its passage, speaking, in all, about an hour and a half.

Mr. Webster said he had already expressed a desire to say something on this subject, but he would prefer another occasion. With the consent of the senator from Maine, he would therefore now move to lay his motion for leave to bring in a bill on this subject on the table for the present, with a view to call it up in a day or two. Mr. Williams' motion for leave was accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. Webster said that since he had last addressed the senate on this subject, he had received, in a more formal shape, the resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts in relation to the northeastern boundary, which he would now present, and move that they be laid on the table and ordered to be printed; which was done accordingly.

Attached to the report of the committee of the Massachusetts legislature, on the subject of the northeastern boundary, were two maps relating to the same subject; which, on motion of Mr. Webster, were ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Rives, the bill for the relief of Vespasian Ellis was taken up, amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

The question being on Mr. Buchanan's amendment, requiring the Bank of Washington to keep an amount of specie equal to one-fourth of its circulation and of the average amount of its private deposits, excluding special deposits, Mr. Webster said, in relation to this amendment, and to all similar propositions, that it was their object to create a certain relation between specie in the banks and the debts of the banks as shown by the amount of their private deposits, which, in his opinion, was not the true one; and could not be regarded so much as a security that the banks would pay all their debts, as for another purpose. Banks might have a very large amount of specie in proportion to their deposits and circulation, and yet not be able to pay their debts, and vice versa. The amount of specie in banks was to some extent a security for their soundness; but Mr. W. thought the primary object of it was or ought to be to require a certain proportion of specie to be always in the vaults of the banks, to prevent an excessive issue of paper.

Mr. Benton spoke at much length in favor of the largest proportion between the specie in the banks and all their liabilities, and moved to strike the word "private" from Mr. Buchanan's amendment.

Mr. Buchanan said he did not think they ought to endeavor to make model banks of the small banks in this District. If Mr. B. were at home, he would be in favor of acting on the rule of the Bank of England, of having one dollar in specie for every three of their circulation and deposits. But he thought the rule too severe, under the circumstances, for the banks of this District, and he should therefore vote against the amendment. Mr. Benton's amendment was lost—Ayes 13, noes 15.

Mr. Webster said he was convinced, by his own observations and those of others, that the Bank of England had, on this subject, acted on an erroneous principle. Experience had shown fully that the mere convertibility of bank paper was no absolute security for the soundness and safety of the bank. What then was the security? He thought the only reasonable and perpetual security was to maintain a direct relation between the specie in the banks and their circulation, and this was much less a security than the debts of the banks would be all paid, than as a security that the issues of paper would not run beyond a certain limit.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, spoke in favor of Mr. Buchanan's amendment, and argued that banks were just as much bound to redeem their general deposits as their bills in circulation.

Mr. Buchanan spoke in reply to Mr. Webster, urging that although the amendment would not provide absolute security that the banks would be able to pay their debts, it would yet tend to increase that security.

Mr. Hubbard also argued in favor of the amendment from statistical premises relating to the proportion of the specie and liabilities of banks in various states.

Mr. Rives spoke at much length, and with great earnestness, in favor of something more indulgent than this amendment, to the banks in this District, or rather to the people themselves, for whose benefit alone they were or ought to be legislating. He showed, from statistics compiled by Mr. Gallatin, that in 1829, when banks and banking were rearded as in a high state of security, the proportion of specie to notes and deposits was far below what was proposed by this amendment. He also showed, by a report of Samuel Jones Lloyd, that in the case of the Bank of England, though it proposed to have one in specie for three in liabilities of deposits and currency, yet the average actual proportion was only as one to eight. Mr. R. was in favor of high security in this respect, but he wished to make it practicable in fact as well as in law.

Mr. Buchanan spoke in reply to Mr. Rives, and earnestly in favor of his amendment. He was unwilling to be guided in legislation by these general facts, resulting from a strong desire of profit by banking. He mentioned several states in which the present average was the same or nearly the same as that proposed by his amendment. The amendment, he maintained, was a practicable proposition, for the banks, though desirous to make the best bargain they could, would gladly receive their charters even with this provision.

Without any further action, the senate adjourned.

May 15. The Vice President presented a report from the treasury department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of the 9th March last, in relation to the clerks employed in that department. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Davis presented the memorial of Jacob Cummings and others, citizens of Southboro', Massachusetts, setting forth their reasons for believing the treaty with the Cherokees to be illegal, and praying, if said treaty is enforced, it may be done with humanity.

Also the memorial of David Daggett and 439 others, of New Haven, in the state of Connecticut, setting forth their belief that the Cherokees never assented to the treaty of New Echota, and praying that the honor of the nation may not be stained, and the retribution of heaven provoked, by enforcing the conditions of that instrument against the will of the Cherokees.

Also a like memorial of 27 citizens of Hamden, Connecticut.

Also a like memorial of 72 citizens of Durham, Connecticut.

Mr. Davis also presented the memorial of citizens of Orange county, New York, upon the same subject.

Mr. McKean also presented remonstrances on the same subject from citizens of Pennsylvania. All laid on the table.

Mr. Lumpkin here rose and said he held in his hand a letter from John Ridge, a full blooded native Cherokee, which contained much interesting information in relation to the true condition of the Cherokees who had emigrated west of the Mississippi, and asked that the letter might be read. No objection having been made, he read the letter and then thanked the senate for their indulgence, &c. Mr. Davis, when Mr. L. had concluded, presented another remonstrance of the same kind, and then commented upon the letter just read—this gave rise to a brief debate, which did not result in any legislative action. The debate shall have a place in our next.

Mr. Brown presented the proceedings of a meeting in North Carolina, (subject unheard.) Referred.

Mr. Niles, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill imposing a duty on starch. Read, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. Crittenden, from the committee on revolutionary claims, made unfavorable reports, which were agreed to, on the claims of various individuals, (unheard.)

Mr. Allen presented the following resolution, which, being objected to, lies over one day:

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia procure and report to the senate statements of the condition of the several banks in the District of Columbia, that have applied for an extension of their charters, in relation to the following particulars:

1. The names of the officers and directors of the banks, the amount of stock owned by each, and the debts due from each to the banks respectively, discriminating between the executive, legislative, and judicial officers of the government among them, and also between residents and non-residents.

2. The stockholders of the banks respectively, the amount of stock owned by each, and of debts due from each, discriminating as above.

3. The debtors to the banks respectively, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

4. The number of suits that the banks respectively have instituted against their debtors since the suspension of specie payments, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

The objection to an immediate decision on this resolution was made by Mr. Roane, who said he was willing that any information on the subject should be procured, but he did not like to have the bill delayed, especially as the greater portion of the information called for by the resolution, and all that was proper and of any real importance, was already on the table of the senate. Mr. R. spoke with strong disapprobation on the part of the resolution which called for an examination into the private affairs of the banks in their dealings with individuals. It could not be made without a violation of the high principles of morality.

The resolution was consequently laid on the table for to-day, and ordered to be printed.

The bills to prevent the counterfeiting of treasury notes, and for the relief Vespasian Ellis, were severally read a third time and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

The question being on Mr. Buchanan's amendment to require the banks to retain an amount of specie equal to their circulation, and to the average amount of their private deposits, excluding special deposits.

Mr. Niles spoke a long time in favor of the amendment, and in reply to Mr. Rives' remarks of yesterday.

Mr. Knight said: The senator from Connecticut is for protecting the people against extraordinary issues of bank paper. So am I. It is for the protection of the people in their business concerns that I shall vote against this amendment. I consider it best to take the circulation only as the rule to govern the specie, and not the deposits, and circulation, as proposed by the amendment. If we include the deposits also, it will cause such a fluctuation in the business of the banks as to operate on the merchants and others owing and doing business with them.—Every additional deposit will disturb the relations of those whose business is connected with these institutions. We all know that every bank has accounts with merchants whose daily business changes their situation in regard to deposits in the bank, and by the change of their accounts the proportions of the deposits and circulation are disturbed also, making it almost impossible for the banks to prevent calling on their customers in a manner that would prevent all reliance for accommodation on the banks. It is well known that most banks have a general rule in regard to the payments on notes falling due. Some cut off, as it is called, 25, others 50 per cent. and some more, when a note falls due. This is understood by the merchant, and he arranges his business accordingly. But if you make the deposits the rule of circulation, there can be no dependence on the amount that will be needed by the bank; the larger the deposit is made, the more must be paid by the person on his note to sustain the proper proportions. Suppose a bank of Philadelphia should send drafts and notes to the amount of ten thousand dollars to a bank of this district to be collected, and the bank receives the money in the bills of the Bank of Georgetown, then the bank must immediately call on its customers to pay more money in consequence of having received the deposit of the ten thousand dollars, than it otherwise would have done had circulation only been regarded. Or the bank receiving the bills of the Bank of Georgetown must immediately send for the specie, and thereby disturb the relations existing between the Bank of Georgetown and its customers. And it is this continued fluctuation and disturbance of the merchants, traders, and others in their business, which is the reason of my objection to the amendment. If the circulation only was the rule, it would be avoided, and the Bank of Philadelphia would be paid without incommencing the business community of this district.

I am not in favor of over issues of paper. I would restrict them to three for one, and am inclined to favor but two for one as the rule. Whenever there shall be a general run for specie, I do not think that any bank can stand with three paper dollars in circulation for one of specie. A sufficient number of its bills can be collected to draw all its specie from it; but two for one, and I think it would stand any run that could be made on it.

It is stated that the banks, in 1829, had but one dollar in specie for eight in circulation. That was a very hard year for the banking business of the country; and, if there had been as great demand for specie in the year 1829 as there was in 1837, I believe the banks must have failed to pay specie. One to eight is too great an extension. I am inclined to the belief that there was more specie in the banks the last year than there was in 1829, but the demand for it was much greater.

But, sir, what is the penalty if the banks should go beyond the limitation? It is not a forfeiture of the charter, but only to make the directors liable for the excess. In Rhode Island, the directors are liable for any improper conduct of the bank; and, in many of the banks, the stockholders are liable for the bills issued. There the billholders have a preference; the bills in circulation must be first paid out of the assets or effects of the bank. They have a lien, by law, on the effects of the bank, before all others. The banks of that state, as a general average, issue about three of paper to one of specie in their vaults. There may be, at times, some variation; but that is very near, as a general rule.

If this amendment should not be carried, it will be necessary to move to strike out the one-fourth part, and insert one-third, or one-half as shall be thought best, if the principle of circulation only should be adopted.

Mr. Niles spoke briefly in reply to Mr. Knight.

Mr. Benton spoke at considerable length in favor of the amendment, or something yet more rigid.

Mr. Hubbard spoke briefly against the amendment, and said he would rather increase the proportion of specie to the circulation, than to fix, as by the amendment, a part of the proportion on the deposits.

Mr. Allen, on account of the absence of Mr. Buchanan, and with a view to obtain the information called for by his resolution, moved to lay the bill on the table. Negatively as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—23.

Mr. Roane, as no one appeared desirous to speak, expressed his willingness to delay the vote on Mr. Buchanan's amendment till he should be present. The action on the bill was accordingly, by consent, suspended, and, after a short executive session,

The senate adjourned.

May 16. Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution introduced by Mr. Clay, of Ky., prohibiting discrimination in the media of the different branches of the revenue, and requiring, under suitable regulations, the reception, by the government, of the notes of sound specie-paying banks, reported the same, without amendment, accompanied by a report adverse to the resolution; which report Mr. W. stated, had not received the unanimous sanction of the committee, but accorded with the views of the majority.

The report was read by Mr. W., occupying nearly three hours. It consisted, to a great extent, of a minute history of the various kinds of money received and receivable for the public dues since the formation of the government, and of incidental and collateral subjects, partly with a view to show the expediency and propriety of the treasury (specie) order of July, 1837, and of allowing the secretary of the treasury discretionary power on this subject. It also argued that the resolution of 1816 was merely permissive. But its main direction was to oppose the resolution offered by Mr. Clay.

Mr. Allen moved the printing of 30,000, and Mr. Morris of 52,000 extra copies of the report.

These motions occasioned a debate (to be given hereafter) which terminated in the order for 30,000, by a vote of 23 to 19.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the resolution of Mr. Clay was made the special order for Monday next; after which,

Mr. Webster rose and said he would send an amendment to the chair, which he intended to offer when the resolution should come up, and which he now asked might be printed. It was as follows:

Strike out the first clause of the resolution, and insert the following: "That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds, or medium of payment, in which debts, or dues to the United States, may be paid."

This amendment, said Mr. W. is offered as a substitute for the first clause of the resolution. When the sub-treasury bill was before the Senate, I moved an amendment to it, which was in the very words of that which I now offer. The amendment was then adopted by a vote of 37 to 14.

As it seems, at least, to be doubtful whether that bill will become a law, I concur in the expediency of presenting the same provision in some other bill, or resolution. My general object on this occasion is the same as that of the mover of these resolutions: but I think this common object will be best answered by proposing the provision in the form in which I now offer it. When presenting it to the Senate, on the former occasion, I had well considered its effect on existing laws, and endeavored to limit its operation to the precise purpose in view. It met the general concurrence of the senate, as the vote showed; and I fully intended, if the sub-treasury bill should not pass, to bring forward the provision again, in the course of the session, in the same form, and as a separate measure.

There is this distinction between the resolution as it now stands and the amendment which I propose. The resolution would alter existing laws. It would either repeal the act of congress allowing Virginia land scrip to be received in payment for land, or else it would extend the receipt of such scrip to the customs. Probably the first would be the construction.

Now the amendment does not affect any existing act of congress. It leaves all such discriminations as the laws have created, to remain as they are. But it takes away from the secretary of the treasury the power of making, by his own sole authority, or continuing, such discriminations. It puts an end to the treasury order of the 11th of July, 1836, and takes away all authority to make such orders in future, and here its operation stops. As there is then this difference between the resolution and the proposed amendment, and as the amendment is in the very form which the senate has already sanctioned by a very large majority, when I proposed it as an amendment to the sub-treasury bill, it will be expedient, I think, to adopt it in place of that clause of the resolution which I propose to strike out.

The amendment was ordered to be printed, and then

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, May 10. This day's proceedings was given in sufficient detail in our last, with the exception of the yeas and nays on laying the report of the committee on the late duel, with the accompanying documents, on the table. They were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Cambreleng, William B. Campbell, John Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushman, Deberry, DeGraff, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Halsted, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, William H. Williams, and Yorke—76.

The following was the vote on printing the report of the majority and minority.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beattie, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Borden, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Clowney, Coffin, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cray, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Duncan, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, R. White, John White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams, Joseph L. Williams, Christopher H. Williams, and Yorke—74.

The gentlemen who voted against printing the evidence and journal of the committee, were Messrs. Hawes, Underwood, Sherrod Williams, and Christopher H. Williams.

Friday, May 11. Mr. Bouldin stated that, by an accidental error in the journal, his name had been recorded as voting on the questions taken yesterday as to laying the subject of the duel report on the table and on printing, when, in fact he had not been in the house when those questions were put. He exonerated the clerk from all intention to commit the error, which arose, doubtless, from the noise in the hall. Had he been present, he should have voted against laying the subject on the table, and in favor of the printing.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, obtained leave to offer the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished, for the information of this house, the names of the topographical and assistant topographical engineers who, during any time in 1837, have been employed on civil works of internal improvement, distinguishing, first, such works as may be required to be erected by the general government pursuant to acts of congress; second, such civil works as may be prosecuted by the state government or under the authority of incorporated companies, specifying under each class the description and location of each particular work.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished, for the information of the house, a statement in such form as will exhibit at one view the sums expended in 1837 on the several objects of internal improvement, specifying the description, use and location of each work; in what state or territory situated; the amount expended on each object; the name of the officer, superintendent, or agent employed; the amount of compensation of every description allowed him, whether an officer of any corps of the army, or a civilian; if the latter, specify his profession and avocation, and when employed by the government.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished for the information of this house, the names of the topographical engineers who have been serving with the army in Florida, during the recent campaign. Also, the names of such officers of that corps as may now be employed, or are intended to be employed the ensuing season, on any civil works of internal improvement; specifying the description and location of each work; distinguishing, also, such as may be under the direction of the general government from those prosecuted by the states or by incorporated companies.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished for the information of this house the names of all the civil engineers and superintendents or agents now employed or intended to be employed in 1839, on civil works of internal improvement of any kind whatever, specifying the description and location of each work, in what state or territory situated, the amount contemplated to be expended on each object, the amount or rate of compensation allowed or to be allowed to each civil engineer, superintendent, or agent; and, if compensation be allowed at this time, state when the pay commenced, the funds from which drawn, and whether the rates be a per diem or a per annum.

The resolutions are of a nature which, under the rules, lie on the table for one day.

Mr. Graves rose to ask the leave of the house to submit a motion to print twenty thousand extra copies of the evidence and journal of the select committee raised on the 28th of February. The reason of his asking for the printing this large number was, that he understood that tens of thousands of the report of the majority of that committee had been printed on private account, and circulated under the franks of members of this house in every quarter of the union. He thought, in justice to himself and others, that this evidence should be given to the public to counteract the injurious effect of the report of the majority of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Pennybacker obtained leave to offer the following for consideration.

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to inform this house if the annuities engaged to be paid by the United States, in specie, to the Ottawa and Chippewa nations of Indians, by the fourth section of the treaty concluded between the said United States and said nations of Indians on the 28th day of March, 1836, have been paid; and if paid, whether they were paid in specie or not; and if not paid, the reasons why. And that he be further directed to communicate to the house any information that he may possess in regard to the purchase, by the agent of the government, for the use of the Indians, of large quantities of goods from Suydam, Jackson & Co. of the city of New York the qualities and prices of the goods so purchased whether good and at reasonable prices, and the kind of money and manner in which they were paid for by the government; and whether any of the said goods are on the hands of the government, and where.

This resolution also was agreed to.

Mr. Fairfield said that as the house had ordered the printing of 20,000 copies of the evidence and journal of the select committee on the late duel, he would now move that 20,000 copies of the report of the majority and minority be also printed.

Mr. Graves said that, although he should have preferred that the evidence and journal alone should be printed, he had no objection that the report should be included, if such were the pleasure of the house.

Mr. Fairfield now withdrew his motion, and moved a reconsideration of the vote on Mr. Graves' motion. The reconsideration was agreed to.

Mr. Graves then said that, in order to test the sense of the house, he would first make a motion for the printing of the evidence and journal only; and if that should be voted down, he would then enlarge his motion so as to cover the reports also. He accordingly moved for the printing of the evidence and journal.

Mr. Fairfield moved to amend the motion of Mr. Graves so as to include the reports.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, disclaiming all intention of entering into the merits of the question appealed to the house to say if it were just that after determining not to try these gentlemen, it was just to order the printing of 20,000 copies of a document which was, in substance against them? Mr. C. had no personal feeling on the subject.

Mr. Graves said that he had always regarded the report of the majority as, in substance, an argument against himself, and of course had no desire that it should be sent forth under the authority of the house but he had rather that this should be done than the evidence should not be printed.

Mr. Parker, of New York, denied that the house had determined not to enter on the trials of the individuals concerned in the late duel; it had merely laid the subject on the table, whence it might be taken at any time, as he hoped it would. As to the argument that the report of the majority was an argument against the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Graves,) it was to be accompanied by the report of the minorities—one of which, at least, was as much an argument in his favor. He was for printing both, and sending the whole to the people.

Mr. Whittlesey had never voted for the printing of more than 10,000 extra copies of any document. He hoped the motion would be so amended as to reduce the proposed number to 10,000.

Mr. Harlan inquired of Mr. Fairfield whether it was in his knowledge that a very large edition of the report of the majority of the select committee on the late duel had been printed in this city on private account; and, if so, whether he could say how large a number?

Mr. Fairfield replied that he did not admit any right in the gentleman from Kentucky to question him on this subject. He had, however, no objection to state that he did understand that an edition had been so printed, but of what number it consisted he was not informed. He was understood to add that he had himself franked a number of copies.

Mr. Hopkins, (of Va.,) moved to lay the resolution to print upon the table.

On this motion Mr. Boon demanded the yeas and nays, which being ordered, were taken, and stood as follows: Yeas 57, nays 119.

So the house refused to lay the motion to print an extra number of copies of the evidence and journal of the committee, with Mr. Fairfield's amendment thereto, on the table.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, then addressed the house in opposition to the amendment, and continued his remarks until they were cut short by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. Cambreleng now moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the tion; but, after some conversation, on the appeal of Mr. Whittlesey, consented to withdraw the motion for the present.

Reports of committees were then called for, when the following among other reports were presented. Mr. Curtis, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill making appropriations for the improvement of certain harbors therein mentioned, and for surveys of certain harbors therein mentioned for 1838.

Mr. Boon, from the same committee, reported a bill to grant to the states and incorporated companies engaged in the construction of roads and canals the right of way through the public lands of the United States, without amendment.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to amend the act entitled "an act for the punishment of frauds committed on the government of the United States, approved March 1823," and to provide for the punishment of frauds committed on pensioners of the United States.

Mr. Wagener, from the committee on the militia, reported a bill more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States.

Mr. McKay, offered the following resolution: Resolved, That the map of the seat of war in Florida, prepared in the topographical bureau, be reduced and printed under the direction of the bureau, at the use of congress.

Mr. Paynter, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill making an appropriation for the building of a dry dock at Philadelphia.

Mr. Bronson, from the committee on the territories, reported a resolution, setting apart the 29th and 30th of May inst. for the consideration of business relating to the territories; which resolution was rejected.

Also, a bill to enable the people of East Wisconsin to form a constitution and state government, and for the admission of each state into the union.

Also, a bill to authorize the people of Florida to form a constitution and state government, and to provide for the admission of said state into the union.

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on the public buildings and grounds, made a report against the petition of the laborers employed on the public buildings in the city of Washington, for regulating the daily hours of labor; against the resolution of the house of the 26th of March last, instructing the committee to inquire into the expediency of leasing the public grounds west of the capitol, for the purposes of draining, fencing, &c.

Mr. Cushing gave notice that he would, at an early day, move to commit the president's message, on the subject of the northwestern territory of the United States, to the committee on foreign affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the river Columbia, for the defence and occupation of the territory of the United States watered by said river; and also to consider the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the intermeddling of the officers or subjects of foreign powers with the Indians of the United States.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Ingham in the chair,) on the bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to re-issue the amount of treasury notes paid in.

Mr. Cambreleng addressed the committee, in exposition of the views of the committee and of the administration in support of this bill, and in sustenance of its financial plans and conduct generally.

Mr. Cushing replied, in a full and able argument upon the subject.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, followed, in decided and warm opposition to the bill. Before getting through with what he had to say, he gave way to a motion for the committee's rising for this day; and the committee rose, and the house adjourned at half past four o'clock.

Saturday, May 12. After a desultory debate, 3,000 copies of the report of the secretary of war upon the survey of the Alleghany river, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Hopkins asked leave to offer the following joint resolution.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States, in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to re-issue, to the amount of $2,000,000, the treasury notes authorized by the act approved on 12th day of October, 1837, entitled "an act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," under the restrictions, conditions, and limitations therein prescribed.

Mr. Hopkins notified the house that it was his object to move its reference to the committee of the whole on the state of the union. Mr. Thomas objected. Mr. Hopkins moved that the rules be suspended, in order to enable him to offer this joint resolution. Mr. Reed demanded the yeas and nays. Ordered.

Mr. Campbell asked if this proposition could not be offered as an amendment to the bill under consideration at present, in the committee of the whole. The Chair responded affirmatively.

Mr. Hopkins' motion to suspend the rules was rejected, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Buchanan, Wm. B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Carter, Casey, Chambers, Chapman, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Coffin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, J. Garland, R. Garland, Graves, Halsted, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Herod, Hopkins, J. Jackson, H. Johnson, Kilgore, Lincoln, J. M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Mitchell, Morgan, Noyes, Patterson, Peck, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sheffer, Southgate, Stuart, Stone, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Underwood, J. White, D. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Yorke—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Bronson, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, Deberry, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Everett, Farrington, Fairfield, Fillmore, Fry, Glascock, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Griffin, Halsey, Hammond, Hamer, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, R. M. T. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kennedy, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Marvin, May, McKay, R. McClellan, Abraham McClellan, Milligan, Miller, Moore, M. Morris, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Potts, Polter, Prentiss, Rariden, Reilly, Rencher, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Augustin H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Sibley, Snyder, Spencer, Stanly, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Thompson, Titus, Toucey, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, Elisha Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams, Yell—107.

Mr. Bell then asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report to this house, forthwith, a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to raise, by law, the sum of $7,000,000, to supply any immediate demand upon the treasury to meet which there are no available means on hand.

Mr. Cambreleng objected. Mr. Bell moved that the rules be suspended, to enable him to offer it. Mr. Cambreleng demanded the yeas and nays. Ordered.

The motion to suspend the rules (requiring a vote of two-thirds) was rejected, by the following vote: Yeas 82, nays 24.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, (Mr. Ingham in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the following bill:

A bill to carry into effect an act approved the twelfth day of October, eighteen hundred and thirty-seven, "to authorize the issuing of treasury notes."

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of an act, entitled "an act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes, approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be, issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the treasury and cancelled.

Mr. Thompson resumed and concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill; and the debate was further continued by Messrs. Rhett and Menefee; after which, Mr. Southgate said he wished to address the committee upon this question; and he moved that the committee (at 4 o'clock) do now rise. The count was made by tellers, and resulted as follows. Ayes 80, nays 97. So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. Southgate then proceeded in opposition to the bill, and was followed by Mr. Hopkins, who moved a substitute for the whole bill, empowering the president of the United States to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum of $10,000,000, at a rate of interest of 6 per cent. payable quarterly, and reimbursed at the will of the government; to be applied, in addition to the moneys now in the treasury, or which may be received therein from other sources, to defray the expenses of the government, and to be transferable by stock. The foregoing was the substance of the first section of Mr. H's amendment. The remainder was of great length, substantially the same as the project of Mr. Rives' in the senate, being a revival of the state bank system, by twenty-five banks, to be selected by the secretary of the treasury, and approved of by the senate. During the reading of this amendment, Mr. Cambreleng raised a question of order as to the admissibility of the amendment, under the bill before the committee. Mr. Bell was of the opinion that it was strictly in order, inasmuch as it went to the present supply and future regulation of the treasury. Mr. Hopkins contended that the proposition he had made was in order. He was unwilling to vote a dollar until some mode of keeping safely and disbursing safely the public money should be established. Mr. Adams defended the motion as strictly regular. The debate on the question of order was continued by Messrs. Cambreleng, Haynes, and Mercer; and then, the Chair decided the amendment to be out of order.

The debate was then continued by Messrs. Bell and Cambreleng, when Mr. Halsted moved that the committee rise. Decided by tellers as follows: Yeas 88, nays 93. So the committee (at a quarter after 6 o'clock) refused to rise.

Mr. Robertson offered an amendment, embracing the substance of the first clause of the amendment before offered by his colleague, (Mr. Hopkins.)

This amendment was supported by Mr. Robertson, and then,

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected by a vote of 64 yeas to 86 nays. So the committee (at three quarters past 6 o'clock) refused to rise.

Mr. Mason, of Virginia, proceeded until 7 o'clock when he gave way to Mr. Menefee, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected, 60 yeas, 84 noes; and Mr. Mason continued his remarks until half past 7 o'clock, when he gave way to Mr. Hopkins, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected by a vote of 79 yeas to 85 noes; and Mr. Mason continued his remarks until after 8 o'clock; when he yielded to Mr. Legare, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was lost by a vote of 81 yeas to 88 noes.

Mr. Mason resumed, and finished.

Mr. Stuart next spoke, and moved an amendment, of which the reporter could not obtain a copy.

The debate was further continued by Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson until a quarter before 9 o'clock, when he gave way to Mr. Chambers, of Kentucky, who moved that the committee rise. This motion was decided by the following vote: 89 yeas, 88 noes.

The Chair announced the vote, and said the motion to rise was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Lewis asked how the chair votes.

Mr. Ingham (the chairman) said he voted in the negative.

Mr. Hopkins took exception to the regularity of this, the chair having announced the vote, and decided that it was carried in the affirmative, before he voted.

At this point, the motion was renewed, and another count (at nine o'clock) was ordered; which resulted as follows: 92 yeas, 84 noes.

Mr. Robertson, recapitulating the facts above stated, insisted that, by the announcement of the chair, the committee had determined to rise. The committee were sitting irregularly.

Messrs. Curtis, Duncan, Adams, and W. C. Johnson spoke to this point, and the Chair decided that it was now too late to make that point.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, then resumed the floor, and continued his remarks upon the bill and amendments until twenty minutes past nine o'clock when he again gave way to Mr. Chambers, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected by the following vote: 90 yeas, 89 nays; the chair voting in the negative.

Mr. Yorke then moved that the committee rise. The Chair decided that that motion was not then in order.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, then resumed and continued his remarks until half past nine, when he gave way to Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, who appealed to the oldest members of the house, whether any good were ever done by sitting out a debate on Saturday night. He moved that the committee rise.

This motion was negatived by a vote of 88 yeas to 90 noes.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, resumed and continued his remarks until a quarter before ten o'clock, when he gave way to Mr. Mitchell, who moved that the committee rise; which motion was lost by the vote of 83 yeas to 91 noes; and Mr. Johnson went on till five minutes before ten o'clock, when he gave way to Mr. Halsted, who moved that the committee rise: yeas 89, noes 90.

Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, resumed, and, at five minutes after ten, gave way to Mr. Dunn, who moved that the committee rise: 87 ayes, 89 noes; and Mr. Johnson resumed the floor, who gave notice that he should not again give way to a motion to rise. The next that should be made he would make himself. After speaking a few moments, he moved that the committee rise, which he withdrew at the request of Mr. Harper, of Ohio, who made some remarks in opposition to the bill, as reported by the chairman of the committee of ways and means, and at a quarter before eleven o'clock gave way to Mr. Coffin, who moved that the committee rise 86 ayes, 87 noes.

Mr. Briggs, one of the tellers, then announced that two other gentlemen had asked to be counted in the affirmative since the house was divided, but before the vote was announced to the chair.

Much confusion here arose, and the chair, at length, ordered another count, which was decided as follows: Ayes 88, noes 91.

Mr. Harper resumed the floor, and continued his remarks till 20 minutes before 12 o'clock, when he gave way to Mr. Thomas, who proposed to rise now and come to the determination to go through with the subject on Monday, at all events. [Cries of no! no! !].

Mr. Hawes then moved (a quarter before 12) that the committee rise. Yeas 85, nays 87.

Mr. Harper resumed and continued until (at 5 minutes before 12) he gave way to Mr. Robertson, who appealed to gentlemen who professed to have regard for the sabbath, not to violate their creed by compelling the house to sit on that day. By doing so, they would bring the credit of the country into contempt. If, however, the chairman of the committee of ways and means would say that the government could not get on for one day, he would consent to this course. Not otherwise. He moved that the committee rise. Ayes 80, noes 88.

Mr. Harper proceeded until 5 minutes after 12 o'clock, when Mr. Chambers rose to order. He made the point that, it being the Sabbath day, the house ought not to do business.

The Chairman decided that it was in order to sit after 12 o'clock, if the committee so desired.

Mr. Chambers took an appeal.

Mr. Pope did not deny that Sunday was a legislative day, if the house should make it so. But the speaker ought to take the chair and decide this point. He would therefore, for this purpose, move that the committee rise. (This was a quarter after 12 o'clock.) Yeas 88, nays 82. The chair voted in the negative, and the motion was lost.

Mr. Reed spoke to the question of order raised by Mr. Chambers. At the very close of the session, as a matter of necessity, the house has sometimes sat during the sabbath hours, but there is no such necessity now. He hoped the decision of the chair would not be sustained.

Mr. Cushman contended that no appeal lay from this decision of the chair.

Mr. Pope submitted to the candor of the chair if it was proper for him to vote to sustain his own decision, upon an appeal taken therefrom. His object was not to embarrass the course of this bill, but he did think that those who objected to bills like these had a right to be heard to give their views thereupon, and to deliberate upon the public business, and decide upon it calmly and candidly. He would not vote to legislate on the sabbath day, unless imperiously required by the exigencies of the country. He hoped an opportunity would be given to the house to record their votes by yeas and nays on this question; and, therefore, hoped that the committee would rise.

Mr. Thompson thought the rule giving the speaker the power to vote in such cases did not apply to the case of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. Duncan said a few words in reply to Messrs. Pope and Thompson.

Mr. Pope urged that, upon the score of delicacy and propriety, the chairman ought not to vote in such a case.

Mr. Underwood was of opinion that an appeal from the decision of the chair was not to be negatived by the chair voting so as to produce a tie.

The Chairman maintained the propriety of his course, as sanctioned by usage and precedent.

Mr. Pope moved that the committee rise. He wanted the question to be settled whether or not the house would legislate on the sabbath. (This division took place at twenty-five minutes before one o'clock.) Yeas 83, nays 82. The chair voted again in the negative.

Mr. Haynes spoke to the question of appeal. It was the privilege of every member of the house to vote on all questions.

Mr. Thomas suggested that nothing could be effected by deciding that questions in either way. It was not a question of order, but a question of words, patriotism, and propriety.

Mr. Everett hoped that those who held the opinion that the house, under present circumstances, ought not to sit on the sabbath, would with him retire from the hall. He should do so with perfect respect to the house, and should not be found in it again until Monday at 11 o'clock, unless brought in in the custody of the sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. Briggs thought it was impossible to get ahead at all in the present mode of doing business. The two parties to this question were trying their strength, without any prospect of success to either. He hoped that the committee would consent to rise, and come together with better feelings upon another day.

Mr. Morgan was in favor of rising and adjourning. He believed no good could come of a longer session to-night. He would be among the last to adopt this course on any other night; but he now felt constrained to move that the committee rise. (Ten minutes before one.) Yeas 82, nays 76. So the committee decided to rise.

The Speaker took the chair at five minutes before one o'clock, and Mr. Briggs moved that the house do now adjourn.

The yeas and nays were demanded by several voices, and ordered.

The house, at a quarter past one o'clock on Sunday morning, decided to adjourn by the following vote: Yeas 85, nays 72.

And then the house adjourned.

Monday May 11. Mr. Boon asked the consent of the house to submit the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, there shall be no discrimination in the kind or description of currency receivable by the government, for customs, for the sale of the public lands, or for any debt or duty due or owing to the United States.

Mr. Williams of Kentucky raised the question of order against the introduction of this resolution, on the ground that there were already two resolutions of a similar character before the house; one offered by a gentleman from Ohio, and the other by himself, on the 16th ultimo.

The Chair said if that was the case, the resolution could not be entertained.

Mr. Boon explained that he had offered this resolution in obedience to what he knew to be the will of his constituents, and, further, in compliance with the joint resolution of the legislature of the state of Indiana. Mr. Bronson said, if it was in order, he would move a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of considering this resolution. The Chair ruled it not to be so, but suggested that it would be in order to move a suspension, to take up the other resolution. Mr. Bronson doubted if there was a resolution identical with this before the house. The chair referred to it and showed the object to be the same.

Mr. Boon said he was perfectly willing to remove the obstacle to the present consideration of the subject, by withdrawing the resolution he had offered. Leave being granted, he accordingly withdrew it.

Mr. Boon now renewing his request, and objection being again made—Mr. Bronson moved for a suspension of the rules to enable Mr. Boon to offer it.

On which motion Mr. Briggs demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Cambreleng remonstrated with Mr. Boon, and asked him not to press the motion.

Mr. Boon insisting, the yeas and nays were taken on suspending the rules, and decided as follows: Yeas 95 nays 53. There not being two thirds, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Cambreleng now moved to suspend the rules in order that the house might immediately resume, in committee of the whole, the consideration of the bill which was in discussion on Sunday morning, when the house adjourned.

On this motion Mr. Turney demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Mr. Harlan asked of Mr. Cambreleng whether it was the purpose of himself and his friends to press through that bill this day?

Mr. Cambreleng said he could not tell what the house would be disposed to do.

The question was then taken on Mr. Cambreleng's motion that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union to resume the consideration of the treasury note bill, and resulted as follows: Yeas 132, nays 50.

The house accordingly went into committee (Mr. Ingham again in the chair.)

Mr. Harper, who had the floor from Sunday morning, resumed and concluded his remarks in decided opposition to the bill.

Mr. Hawes, of Kentucky, next obtained the floor and took the same side of the question; but, before he had proceeded far he was taken suddenly ill, and disabled from speech or action. Much confusion ensued in the house. Mr. H. was taken to one of the great south windows of the hall—where, being bled, he soon recovered so far as to be able to retire from the hall.

Mr. Dunn, of Indiana, succeeded, and entered at large into an argumentative speech, in the course of which he traced the conduct of the administration from the beginning toward the banks, arguing to show that its policy was utterly hostile to them, and insisting that the present measure was intended to supersede them by an issue of government paper.

Mr. Goode took the floor, and was going on with some remarks in opposition to the bill when he was interrupted by Mr. William, of Kentucky, who rose to a point of order, and inquired if there was a quorum present. Mr. W. moved that the committee rise, in order to have a call of the house, for he wished to get out of that place before night.

Mr. Goode begged the gentleman to withdraw his motion, and allow him to proceed. He would not detain the committee long, and not having before expressed his opinions on the subject of the present bill, and the subjects immediately connected with it, he felt bound to do so, and would rather do it then than at such an hour as that at which the house adjourned on Sunday morning.

Mr. Williams consented to withdraw his motion, again repeating that he wanted to go home before midnight.

Mr. Goode then went on at some length into an examination of the messages of the president at the special and present sessions, and into a history of the various propositions of the secretary of the treasury, in order to show that the pretence that something was necessary to be done to relieve the wants of the treasury, and the manner pointed out to obtain that relief, all ended in the prosecution of a plan to establish a sub-treasury, or government bank. He was willing to afford the government all the money that was necessary to carry on its operations, and he would, at any time, vote for supplies; but he was opposed to the sub-treasury, and the issuing of treasury notes. He hoped that the bill would be put into a shape that would enable him to support it; but in its present shape he could not vote for it, for a great many reasons, which he then went on at large to assign.

Mr. Sergeant, of Pennsylvania, then took the floor, and, after a severe examination of the speech with which Mr. Cambreleng had introduced the bill, went into an argument in opposition to the measure proposed by the bill.

He yielded to a motion for the rising of the committee, which failed: Ayes 79 noes 85. Mr. S. then resumed, and further addressed the committee in conclusion. Mr. Tillinghast then appealed to the house, stating that, from the number of gentlemen who wished to address the committee on the bill, it would be impossible to get a vote on the bill to-night, and thereupon, at half past 5 o'clock, moved that the committee rise. The motion was rejected: Ayes 90, noes 94. Mr. Tillinghast then addressed the committee in opposition to the bill, and, having proceeded till five minutes after six o'clock, yielded to another motion, by Mr. Davies, for the rising of the committee. This motion was negatived: Ayes 87, noes 93. Mr. Tillinghast continued his argument, and spoke till twenty minutes before seven, when, Mr. Robertson moved that the committee rise, proposing that it be with the understanding that the bill should be gotten out of committee to-morrow. The motion was carried: Ayes 91, noes 86. So the committee rose at 7 o'clock, and reported progress.

A motion being made to adjourn, the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. Bronson, but the house refused to order them; and thereupon adjourned.

Tuesday, May 15. The Chair laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the navy, in reply to the resolution of the house of the 31st of March last, calling for the names of all pension agents, the authority by which such agents were appointed, copies of commissions issued to such agents, &c.

It appears by the said report, that there was at the time of the last settlement with the several agents for paying navy pensions, an unexpended balance of $103,658 47 remaining in their hands. Settlements have been made with all of them, except one or two, since the commencement of the present year.

Committees were then called on for reports when a number were received, chiefly on private claims, which will be noticed hereafter.

Mr. Boon said that under the peculiar circumstances of the case, he felt constrained again to offer the same resolution which he had proposed to offer yesterday, and which the house had refused to receive.

The Chair stated that, on examination, he found another resolution had been offered, on the same subject, by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. S. Williams,) which lay on the table; in consequence of which, it would not be in order for the gentleman from Indiana to offer another; but he could move that the house take up the resolution now on the table.

The following resolution, moved by Mr. S. Williams on the 16th of April last, was then read:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for the secretary of the treasury, or any other officer of this government, to continue in force or make any general or special order making a distinction or discrimination in the medium or kind of currency in which the different branches of the revenue (either from the sales of the public lands or from any other source) of the United States shall be collected."

Objection being made to its consideration at this time, Mr. Boon moved to suspend the rules to allow of its being considered. On this motion Mr. Williams demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Bronson inquired whether the two resolutions were identically the same. The Chair thought them the same in substance.

Mr. Casey moved a call of the house.

Mr. Boon stated a difference between his resolution and that of Mr. Williams, in this, viz. that Mr. W.'s resolution specified the particular kind of money that should be received; whereas his own only required that no discrimination should be made in the kind of money to be received, but did not say what that should be.

The Chair still adhered to the decision that the resolution of Mr. Boon was not in order.

The question on suspending the rules to take up the resolution of Mr. Williams was then put, and decided by yeas and nays in the negative, as follows—(not two-thirds:)

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Wm. B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, William B. Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, R. Garland, Goode, William Graham, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Halsted, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, J. Jackson, Kilgore, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, M. Morris, C. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Snyder, Southgate, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Vanderveer, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, D. Williams, Sherrod Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Yell, Yorke—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Brodhead, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Clowney, Craig, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Edwards, Farrington, I. Fletcher, Fry, J. Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Griffin, Harrison, Hopkins, Haynes, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Keim, Keimble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, J. M. Mason, Martin, McKay, R. McClellan, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Miller, Morgan, Parker, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikio, Phelps, Potter, Pratt, Reilly, Rhett, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, Spencer, Stuart, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, T. T. Whittlesey, Jared W. Williams—76.

Mr. Boon gave notice he should renew his motion every day until the house should act upon it.

Mr. Southgate presented the following, which lies on the table one day:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report and bill reported by the committee on the militia be printed.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Ingham in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the reissue of treasury notes.

The house was addressed at length by Mr. Tillinghast, Mr. Cushman, Mr. Biddle, Mr. Bell, and Mr. Randolph, upon the merits of the bill.

Mr. Randolph having concluded his remarks, loud calls were heard all over the hall for the rising of the committee. Mr. Hoffman, of New York, said that he had been desirous of addressing the committee on the subject of this bill; but, as he understood that an arrangement or mutual understanding had been agreed upon, that the committee should rise this evening and report the bill, he was willing to waive the delivery of his remarks at this time, reserving them until the bill should come into the house. Mr. Pope said that he too had the same desire, but would follow the example of the gentleman from New York. As he had had some instrumentality in bringing about the understanding to which the gentleman alluded, he hoped it would be acted on, and that the bill would now be reported. Mr. Stuart, of Virginia, withdrew the amendment he had offered. Mr. W. Cost Johnson expressed a desire for a decision before the rising of the committee, upon the amendment still pending. Mr. Russell said that, if the question was to be taken on that amendment, he had a proviso to append to it; without which he should object to its adoption. Mr. Rencher said he also had an amendment to offer. Mr. Menefee wished to offer an amendment as a substitute for that of Mr. Stuart. Mr. Robertson proposed that all the amendments should be printed, and the question on them deferred till the bill came into the house. Mr. Cambreleng reminded the gentleman that all amendments which did not go to enlarge the amount of money in the bill could as well be offered in the house as in committee.

Mr. Wise, said that two gentlemen had given notice of their wish to speak on this bill; and he believed that ten times two had the same desire. He would now caution all such gentlemen not to trust to any general understanding, informally entered into, but to speak at once; for to-morrow the bill would be in the house, and they would have the previous question sprung upon them.

Mr. Owens, of Georgia, moved that the committee do now rise and report the bill. Mr. Adams gave notice of a purpose to move to amend the title of the bill.

The question being put on rising and reporting the bill, it was carried by a very large majority. Whereupon, the committee, at twenty minutes before eight, rose, and reported the bill to the house, without amendment.

On the suggestion of Mr. Mercer, it was agreed that all gentlemen having amendments to offer should bring them to the clerk's table, that they might be printed, and laid on the tables of the members to-morrow, in time for the action of the house.

The Chair laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting information required by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 30th ultimo, in relation to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

And then the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 16. Mr. Boon moved to suspend the rules for one hour to take up the following resolution of Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, being nearly identical with that offered by himself a few days since:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill making it unlawful for the secretary of the treasury, or any other officer of this government, to continue in force or make any general or special order making a distinction or discrimination in the medium or kind of currency in which the different branches of the revenue (either from the sales of the public lands or from any other source) of the United States shall be collected."

Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, gave notice that, as some had perhaps voted against this motion yesterday, under the apprehension that the proposition offered by himself differed materially from that of Mr. Boon, he should, if the House agreed to take it up, modify it so as to make it identical with that of Mr. Boon.

Mr. Grennell demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend. No quorum voted on this proposition, the division being 52 to 42.

Mr. Briggs demanded a call of the House. Ordered.

The House was called till nearly the end of the roll, when, on motion, the call was suspended, and the question was put on the motion of Mr. Boon, to suspend the rules for one hour, in order to take up the above resolution, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Heman Allen, J. W. Allen, Bell, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, W. B. Carter, Casey, Chambers, Cheatham, Clark, Cleveland, Coffin, Corwin, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darling, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, Rice Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, R. M. T. Hunter, William Cost Johnson, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Marvin, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Mitchell, Montgomery, Mathias Morris, Calvary Morris, Noyes, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, A. H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Vanderveer, J. White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Yell, Yorke—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Cambreleng, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Davee, Dromgoole, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Glascock, Grant, Griffin, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Hopkins, Hubley, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Keim, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Martin, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Miller, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Owens, Parker, Pennybacker, Petrikio, Phelps, Potter, Prentiss, Reilly, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, Shepler, Stuart, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, T. T. Whittlesey, J. W. Williams, Worthington—70.

So, there not being two-thirds in favor, the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. Curtis, of New York, gave notice that, on the first occasion when it shall be in order, he should introduce a bill, with the leave of the House, "to authorize the granting of a drawback of duty upon foreign coals, when exported and consumed on board of vessels propelled by steam power."

Sundry bills on the speaker's table were read and committed, and then the house, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, took up the treasury note bill.

Mr. Cambreleng offered two amendments, providing for the restriction and limitation of the operation of this bill in the same way as the bill of October last, to which it referred, and adding the same provisions which that bill contains, as to the counterfeiting of the treasury notes.

Mr. Robertson's amendment, offered in committee, proposing a loan, under certain restrictions, instead of the re-issue of the treasury notes, came first in order, as modified by the mover.

Mr. Hoffman opposed the bill as reported; and replied at length to the arguments of Messrs. Rhett and Cambreleng in favor of it.

Some conversation ensued between Messrs. Rhett, Hoffman, Thompson, Legare, and Cambreleng, upon local points incidentally introduced into the debate; after which,

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, went at length into a defence of the bill as reported.

Mr. Wise followed on the same bill in a speech of considerable length, in which he insisted, in the course of his argument, that, with all its boast of means, the government was bankrupt. In the close of his speech he indulged in some pleasantry on the devices of the old continental money and new treasury notes, as well as a caricature of the latter, which excited much mirth in the house.

Mr. Bynum then addressed the house with much zeal in a general defence of the administration. Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, expressed a wish to address the house, and as a test of the wishes of the house, moved an adjournment. On this motion Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Garland thereupon withdrew his motion, and proceeded in a general speech against the bill, and especially in reply to Messrs. Bynum and Rhett. He was giving his reasons for preferring a loan, when, at 8 o'clock, he yielded the floor for a motion for adjournment. On this motion Mr. Haynes demanded the yeas and nays, which, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 64, nays 125. So the house refused to adjourn. Mr. Garland then resumed, and having concluded, Mr. Cushman, of New Hampshire, moved the previous question. Mr. Craig demanded a call of the house, which was agreed to: Ayes 83, noes 52. The house was accordingly called. Mr. Pope then moved that all further proceedings in the call be suspended, but the motion was lost: Ayes 76, noes 77. The absentees were called, when it appeared that 199 members had answered to their names. On motion of Mr. Grant, the further prosecution of the call was dispensed with. The vote was then taken on seconding the previous question, and carried: Ayes 98, noes 95. So the demand for the previous question was seconded by the house. The previous question being put, viz. "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. Bell demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows, viz:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grant, Grey, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, R. McClellan, A. The speaker voting in the affirmative, the previous question was carried by his casting vote.

The main question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Batty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Bynum, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Fry, Gallup, James Garland, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, T. So the bill was ordered to the third reading; it was then read a third time; and the question being, shall the bill pass?

Mr. S. Williams moved that the bill be recommended to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, with instructions to report a bill to authorize the sale of the bonds given and executed by the Bank of the United States to the government for the government stock and interest in the late Bank of the United States; and, in the event said bonds cannot be sold in time to obtain the necessary funds for the purposes and actual wants of the government, to authorize the issuing of two millions of treasury notes for the immediate wants of the government, and to authorize a loan for a sum of money that may be required for the necessary and actual wants of the government until said sale can be effected.

The previous question was moved by Mr. Cushman, and demanded by a majority of members, present, when the main question was ordered to be put, (which was, shall the bill pass?) by yeas 106 nays 99. The main question was then put, viz. shall the bill now pass?

Mr. Rariden now moved a reconsideration of the vote on the previous question, but the chair decided that it was not in order. Mr. Bell suggested that this question of order had never yet been decided. The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and carried. Mr. Adams moved to amend the title of the bill by striking out "to carry into effect the act approved 12th October, 1837," which was agreed to. Mr. Fletcher moved to add "to meet the current expenses of the government. Mr. Rariden now gave notice that he would move to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill, with a view to having the question taken on the amendment proposing a loan.

The house then adjourned at 10 o'clock.

Thursday, May 17. Mr. Rariden rose and moved to reconsider the vote of last night on the final passage of the treasury note bill. The Chair said that this motion would come up in order after the morning hour, unless the house decided to take it up at that time. Objections being made, a motion to suspend the rules, so as to take up this motion, was made by Mr. Griffin, of S. C. and rejected.

Mr. Russell asked for the suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed the 23d of June, 1836, as prohibits receiving in payment for dues to the government, and disbursing the same, the bills of specie-paying banks which issue notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars; and, also, so much of the second section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836, as prohibits the offering in payment by any officer or department of the government the notes or bills of specie-paying banks of a less denomination than ten dollars."

The house refused to suspend the rules by the following vote: Yeas 56, nays 127. Mr. Russell gave notice that he should offer that resolution daily, until the house would act upon it. Mr. Cushman asked the house to suspend the rules for thirty minutes to go into the consideration of the senate bill on this subject. Refused.

Mr. Boon again asked for the suspension of the rules to take up the resolution of Mr. Sherrod Williams, prohibiting discrimination in the receipt of the media of payment of public dues. Refused.

Reports were now presented. Several upon private claims having been presented and disposed of, the bill from the Senate, in the case of Hazel and Stonestreet, came up for consideration. It was moved that this bill be made the order of this day in committee of the whole. Mr. Briggs made some statements with regard to the pressing nature of the claim, and the necessity of its early passage. Mr. Adams asked if there was any report? He understood that this was still ordering the postmaster general to settle a certain account in preference to others. Messrs. Briggs and Thompson explained the character of the claim. Mr. Underwood and Mr. Adams opposed the motion. Mr. U. was opposed to giving any one private claim preference over another, while there were many pressing cases on the calendar of revolutionary claims. He moved to make the bill the order of the day for to-morrow, and give it its proper place on the calendar. Mr. Adams thought it an irregular procedure to carry such a bill by acclamation. It was, in effect, ordering the postmaster general to settle an account without the forms of law. He was in favor of the motion of Mr. Underwood. Before any question could be taken, the morning hour expired, and Mr. Cambreleng called for the orders of the day.

The motion of Mr. Rariden to reconsider the vote whereby this bill was passed last night came first in order.

Mr. Rariden explained that he was induced to move the reconsideration of the final vote on this bill more on account of his political friends than on his own account. Although he greatly preferred a direct loan for the supply of the wants of the treasury to the issue of treasury notes, yet, objectionable as that method of supply was, he had, and perhaps would again feel it his duty to go for it in preference to embarrassing the action of the government for want of means. But he must be allowed to say he preferred the supply in a medium whose circulation would not necessarily be confined to the importing cities. But he would take this occasion to say to his political friends, that he considered the time of this house now of more importance to this nation than the difference in the means proposed for supplying the treasury, and that his main object in moving the reconsideration was that a full vote of the house might be had, or other means proposed for its relief. For himself, he preferred the proposition or amendment proposed by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Stuart,) which proposed a reissue of treasury paper to an amount equal to the immediate wants of the government, and the residue needful to be obtained by a direct loan; and, if it was in his power, he would confine his motion for reconsideration to that specific object; but it was not, and he would now say to his political friends that, if this vote should be reconsidered, and another tedious discussion spring up upon any of the amendments proposed as a substitute to the bill, (each of which had been very fully discussed already,) he should feel it his duty, upon the recurrence of such a debate, to vote with the friends of the administration for the previous question, and then to vote for the bill in its present shape. But he hoped it would be the last time he would ever be called upon to vote a supply in this form.

Mr. Boon moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider. Mr. Rives asked what would be the effect of a motion to lay the motion on the table? Would it carry the bill, necessarily, with it? The Chair had considered this, but, the previous question pending, this was not the time to decide it. Mr. Williams, of N. C. moved a call of the house; which was ordered, and the roll was called through. Before the roll was called a second time, Mr. Cushing said he was sick of seeing the time of the house and country consumed in calls of the house, while members did not choose to attend to their public duties. He moved to suspend the call. Mr. Petrikin demanded the yeas and nays on this motion. Mr. Cushing withdrew the motion; and the call proceeded. 215 members answered to their names. The doors were then closed. Mr. Curtis moved to suspend the call. Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered. The motion to suspend the call was decided in the affirmative by the following vote: Yeas 117, nays 84. So the proceedings under the call were suspended, and the doors were opened. The question then recurred on seconding the previous question, and was decided by tellers, thus: Ayes 119, noes not counted. The question, Shall the main question [to reconsider] be now put? then recurred. Mr. Gray demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the house decided, by the following vote, that the main question be put: Yeas 141, nays 64. The question then recurred, Shall the vote upon the final passage of the bill be reconsidered? The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, W. B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, J. Garland, R. NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushman, Davee, DeGraff, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Glascock, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hammond, Hamer, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Howard, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, R. McClellan, A. McClellan, McClure, Miller, Montgomery, More, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Pickens, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Reilly, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Vandever, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, T. T. Whittlesey, J. W. Williams, Worthington, Yell—103.

The Chair voted in the negative, thus making the yeas and nays equal in number. So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

On motion of Mr. Jones, of Wisconsin, Tuesday and Wednesday, the 5th and 6th of June, were set apart for the consideration of territorial business.

Mr. Cushing called up his resolution, calling for information with regard to this subject; which he supported at length. He continued the course of his remarks, which were suspended for a time by a very interesting explanation by Mr. Adams, in relation to the negotiation of the Florida treaty, our claims on the Perdido, &c.; of all which, together with Mr. C's speech, we shall present a full report hereafter. Mr. C. had not concluded his speech when, at half past 4 o'clock, he yielded to a motion for adjournment, and the house thereupon adjourned.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 13.—Vol. IV.]

WASHINGTON CITY, MAY 26, 1838.

[Vol. LIV.—Whole No. 1,391.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

THE HON. LEVI WOODBURY, secretary of the treasury, was on Friday the 18th inst. unanimously nominated as chief justice of the superior court of the state of New Hampshire, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of the late judge Richardson—and subsequent accounts state that the nomination has been confirmed.

CONNECTICUT. Dennis Kimberly esq. (W.) has been elected a senator in congress from the state of Connecticut for six years from the 3d of March next, in place of the hon. J. M. Niles, whose term of service will then expire. The vote was for Kimberly 97, Niles, 33,—majority for Kimberly 59.

CHEROKEE TREATY. It will be seen by the message of the president, and the letter of the secretary of war (inserted in the proceedings of the senate,) to Messrs. Ross, Gunter, &c. comprising the Cherokee delegation in this city, that the late treaty has assumed a new feature. The subject has already caused an exciting discussion in both houses, and we give place to the following from the "Globe" that our readers may understand the whole ground upon which the executive has proceeded.

OFFICIAL.

From the "Globe" of Wednesday, the 23d instant.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of war to major general Scott, dated

Department of War, May 23, 1838.

SIR: You will receive herewith, a copy of proposals made by the department to the Cherokee delegation now in this city, which, it is believed, will be accepted by them. You are, therefore, hereby authorized to enter into an agreement with the agent of the nation for the removal of their people. The expenses attending the emigration of the Cherokees are now fully ascertained by past experience, and it is presumed you will find no difficulty in making such an arrangement as, while it will secure their comfortable removal in the manner most agreeable to their chiefs and head men, will effectually protect the interests of the United States, and prevent all unnecessary delay or useless expenditures.

Whether the removal of this people is to be continued by the military force under your command, or to be conducted by their own agents, care must be taken that it be carried on continuously, and as speedily as may be consistent with their health and comfort. It must commence in that part of the territory which has been granted or sold by the states to whose jurisdiction it belongs, in order that the several proprietors of the land may be put in possession of their estates with as little delay as possible. These proposals have been laid before congress for the purpose of obtaining such legislative provisions as they require; but it is not intended thereby to retard the execution of the treaty, and you will therefore pursue the measures you have already adopted, until the agents of the nation are ready to take charge of the future emigration of their people; nor will you then permit any unnecessary delay in their operations.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

Major general Winfield Scott, Athens, Tennessee.

OFFICIAL.

From the "Globe" of Thursday, the 24th instant.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of war to the governors of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina.

Department of War, May 23, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith to your excellency, a copy of a proposed arrangement with John Ross, and other chiefs and head-men of the Cherokee nation, now in this city. Your excellency will perceive in these proposals, that the government, while it seeks to procure the co-operation of the delegation in the peaceable removal of the Cherokees, has carefully abstained from compromising the rights and interests of the states concerned in the execution of the treaty. It is not supposed that it will require so long a period as two years to remove the remaining Cherokees to their new homes west of the Mississippi, but whatever term of time may be necessary to their comfortable emigration, the department relies upon the generosity of the states interested not to press their claims so long as they are satisfied that due diligence is used by the agents of the nation, to effect this desirable object as speedily as practicable.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

To the governors of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina.

THE CHEROKEES. From the Milledgeville Journal of May 15th. We regret to learn that violence has been already committed by the Cherokees within our limits. Dr. John Bruster, late surveyor general of the state, has fallen a victim to their hostility. His ferryman was killed, it is stated, a few hours previous, at the ferry from whence they proceeded to his house. His body was pierced by four balls.

Company H. and portions of companies D. E. and F. 1st regiment of artillery, under command of major Kirby, arrived here May 15, and proceeded to Charleston. They are destined for the Cherokee country.

Officers. Captain Norman, lieutenants McLean, Rutledge, Ainsworth, Mackall, and Dr. Mott. [Savannah Georgian.]

The New Orleans Picayune states that a considerable body of United States troops arrived there from Florida on the 17th instant. There were five companies of infantry and two of artillery—making in all 352 men. The following officers also arrived:

Brigadier general W. K. Armstrong, 3d artillery; brevet major H. Wilson, 4th infantry; lieuts. H. Gardner, 3d artillery, K. C. Buchanan, 4th infantry; A. Conkling, 2d artillery; Geo. Lincoln, 4th infantry; W. W. Chapman, 2d artillery; R. A. Luther, do; Armstrong, do; Morgan, do; Woodbridge, do; E. A. Ogden, 1st infantry; surgeons H. A. Stinneck, R. B. Wood, and assistant surgeon Suter. Both officers and men are in fine health and spirits.

An Act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the government.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States is hereby authorized to cause treasury notes to be issued, according to the provisions of, and subject to all the conditions, limitations and restrictions contained in an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of treasury notes," approved the twelfth day of October last, in place of such notes as have been, or may be issued under the authority of the act aforesaid, and which have been, or may hereafter be, paid into the treasury and cancelled.

NON-RESUMPTION. We are sorry to say that the hopes entertained recently that the Pennsylvania Bank of the United States would speedily resume specie payments, are very much dissipated. It is now supposed that such an event will not happen until the rising of congress, or the autumn, or even later. As a general resumption south and west depends on the movements of this bank in a great measure, the state of expectation respecting its future course has an important effect on all funds of the non-resuming states. In consequence of the opinion now entertained all such funds are dull, and have fallen in price materially.

[Jour. of Commerce]

NEW YORK MONEY MARKET, May 24. The upward tendency which has for several days existed in the stock market, appears to have partially subsided, the sales yesterday having generally been made at a decline on the prices of the day previous; the reaction however, had not any effect on the amount of business transacted, which was very large. Treasury notes continue at par.

A fair business has been done in sterling exchange, for transmission by the packet sailing this morning for Liverpool, at 7 1/2 per cent. premium, establishing an advance of about half per cent. on previous sales. On France 5f 35c was generally obtained.

The New York American quotes U. S. Bank stock at $119 a $120.

LATE FROM FLORIDA. A letter received in Charleston, dated Black Creek, May 16, says: An express arrived here, day before yesterday, stating that Alligator, who had been sent out about a month since by gen. Taylor, had returned with 317 Indians, men, women, and children, and the impression is that there will be no more campaigning, as it is supposed that all of the Indians will come in in the course of the summer. The John McLean has just arrived here from Fort Mellon, which post is to be broken up; that at Volusia is already abandoned. The McLean brings soldiers, horses, boats, &c. The Charleston is expected to-day from the same place.

UPPER CANADA. From the Toronto Herald of the 12th inst. This day Charles Durand received sentence of death, to be hanged on the 24th instant. The remainder of the prisoners not yet tried, to the number of fifty four, were then called up, when the chief justice, in his usual able and eloquent style, addressed them on the enormity of the crime in which they were engaged, and enjoined upon them henceforward to live in peace and social harmony, setting forth the happy results of such a course of conduct, which he finished, by informing them that, in consideration of the energetic efforts which had been used to corrupt their minds, and in remembrance of their former loyalty and good conduct, they were pardoned. The only condition which was required of them was to give security for their good behavior for three years, themselves in £300 pounds, each and two sureties each of £100.

TEXAS. Gen. Hunt, the Texan minister, left this city for Texas on Wednesday last. This gentleman made a very favorable impression on all who formed his acquaintance during his residence here. It is not expected that he will immediately return to resume his functions near this government.

Fairfax Callet, esq. has been left charge d'affaires ad interim. [Globe.]

The senate of Texas has rejected the resolution of the house of representatives proposing to withdraw the proposition for the annexation of Texas to the United States. The ground of exception was, that the proposition was made by the vote of the people. It was said that president Houston would himself take the responsibility of recalling it.

The loan bill, as amended, unanimously passed the senate, April 30. By one of the provisions of this bill it provided that the "money raised upon the bonds must be deposited in the United States Bank at Philadelphia, the Manhattan Bank at New York, or the Union Bank of Louisiana, subject to the orders of the government."

VIRGINIA LOAN. The Richmond Enquirer states that the state 6 per cent. loan of $400,000, advertised for on the 21st inst. was taken by Messrs. Jaquelin, Taylor & co. of that city, at a premium of 81 per cent.

KENTUCKY BONDS. New York, May 24. We learn that Mr. Bullock, secretary of state of Kentucky, and agent for the negotiation of $1,250,000 of the bonds of that state, has succeeded in effecting a disposition of them on favorable terms.

We understand that the purchaser is ultimately to dispose of them in the European market, converting them into sterling bonds, and making the interest and principal payable in London. [Cour. and Enquirer.]

NEGRO SUFFRAGE. The house of representatives of Connecticut, by a vote of 165 to 33, have refused to recommend the expunging of the word "white" in that clause of the constitution which specifies who shall be entitled to vote.

SERIOUS TORNADO. We learn from the Baltimore Chronicle, that on Tuesday afternoon, that city was visited by a storm of wind and rain, which, although of but short duration, was of extraordinary violence, and occasioned very considerable damage. It commenced about seven o'clock, passing over the city from the south west to the north east, carrying off in its progress the roofs and chimnies of houses, and scattering their fragments over the streets. As an evidence of the violence of the storm the Chronicle states that the zinc roof upon the new Christ Church was, to a great extent, torn off, and rolled up, as if by the operation of some powerful machinery.

THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE, third son of the King of France, attended by several French officers, arrived in Washington on Thursday last, via Richmond, in the steamboat Sidney. He is an officer on board the line of battle ship Hercules, which, with the sloop of war Favorite, arrived in Hampton Roads on Monday last.

COM. MELANTHON WOOLSEY, a highly distinguished officer of the navy, died at Ithica, N. Y., on Saturday last, in the 60th year of his age. He received a lieutenant's commission, April 9th, 1800, and was appointed captain, April 27th, 1816.

A bill of indictment for murder has been found by the grand jury of Pulaski county, Arkansas, against John Wilson, the speaker of the house of assembly of that State, who left the chair and murdered Joseph J. Anthony, a member, on the floor of the house.

MISSISSIPPI ELECTION. We have before us returns from all the counties, except two, in which the majorities only are reported, which give Prentiss 12,249, Word 11,531—majority over Claiborne, 273—Claiborne 11,306, and Davis 10,921. In July last, the vote for Claiborne was 11,193, Prentiss 7,161.

MR. ADAMS' OPINION OF FUNDAMENTALITY. A letter of the hon. John Quincy Adams has just been made public, in which, (refusing to accept an invitation to attend a meeting in the city of New York,) that veteran statesman uses the following language:

"My public duties will detain me here probably through the whole month of May. During the session of congress, I do not hold myself at liberty to absent myself voluntarily from the house, a single day: Such is my estimate of the representative duty, confirmed by a positive rule of the house itself, not the less obligatory for being little observed."

BOARD OF VISITERS. Military Academy. The following named gentlemen have been invited by the secretary of war to attend as a board of visitors the annual examination of the cadets of the U. S. military academy at West Point, to commence on the first Monday in June, 1838.

Connecticut—Professor Thomas Hubbard.

New York—Gen. Ducoudray Holstein, Rev'd G. M. Johnson, professor Wm. M. Holland, Jas. Shea, and Medad Butler, esqrs.

Pennsylvania—Dr. J. B. Ard, Thomas B. McElwee, John C. Plummer, and Thomas Ross, esqrs.

Maryland—Daniel Murray, esqr. and professor J. T. Ducatel.

Virginia—John E. Page, Hugh A. Garland, and Alexander Rives, esqrs.

North Carolina—J. F. Burgwin, esq.

South Carolina—Gen. George McDuffie, professors F. Leiber, and — Holbrook.

Georgia—C. J. McDonald, esq.

Kentucky—Judge James.

NEW MILITIA LAW. The bill reported by the committee on the militia of the house of representatives, proposing material alterations in the present system, excites much interest. The principal alteration is in the time of service. The law of 1792 requires every able bodied white male citizen, between the age of 18 and 45, to perform military duty. The present bill limits the ages between 21 and 40. The reasons that influenced the committee to assume the age of 21, were, that the power to exact the services of minors was extremely questionable, and that their service in time of peace was not required. Limiting the age to 40 was considered proper, upon the ground that the increase of the militia, by the rapid increase of population, would make it entirely too unwieldy; and would release a portion from a burden not required by the country at the present time. They classify the militia into the active and general militia. The active militia to be composed of a tenth part of the whole number; the remainder to form the general militia. The active militia are to be selected from the whole body of the militia, by the states; the whole control being with the states, so that ample justice may be done to all interested. It is claimed that on this plan, the government will have at all time a certain portion of militia to take the field in her defence, in a state of discipline equal to regulars; also that it will be a most effectual argument against the increase of a standing army. The bill requires the active militia to be encamped for the period of six consecutive days annually, to improve in practical military science. The tour of duty is fixed at nine months. The active militia will amount to about 250,000 men, not inferior in drill to the regular army, and ready to take the field at a moment's warning. The bill asks an appropriation of ten millions. [Alex. Gaz.]

MEXICO AND FRANCE. The following are the terms of settlement proposed by Baron Deffaudis, on the part of the French government to the government of Mexico:

1. The sum of $600,000 to be paid before the 15th of May, on board any French vessel of war in sight of Vera Cruz, to be distributed by the French government among the Frenchmen who have sustained wrongs in Mexico. These are arranged in three classes. 1. Those who have been plundered, or had property destroyed, during the civil disturbances. 2. Those who have had forced loans imposed upon them. 3. Those to whom justice has been refused or who have been wronged by unjust and arbitrary decisions.

2. General Gomez, who ordered the execution of two Frenchmen in Tampico, Messrs. Denwissent and Saussieu, to be deprived of his grade, and to pay $20,000 to the families of the victims.

3. Col. Pardo, commandant of Colima, for assaulting and wounding M. G. Dulany, to be deprived of his commission, and pay $9,660 to M. Dulany.

4. Senor Tamayo, judge of Mexico, for his unjust sentence against M. Lemoine, to be deprived of office. M. Lemoine to be released from prison, and be paid an indemnification of two thousand dollars.

5. The sum of $50,000 to be paid the families of the Frenchmen murdered in Arenzingo.

The various sums above specified to be paid in addition to the gross sum of $600,000, mentioned in the first article.

The Baron Deffaudis farther requires that "the Mexican government will bind itself in the most precise and solemn manner, under the condition on the other hand of the most perfect reciprocity, with respect to its agents, citizens, commerce, and navigation on the part of France.

"1. To secure constantly in the territory of the republic, to the diplomatic and consular agents, to the commerce and navigation of France, the enjoyment in all respects of the treatment of the most favored nation, excepting, however, certain rights, personal and political, reserved by the constitution of the country to the citizens of the new republics formed in the ancient Spanish America.

"2. Not to impose in any case, in future, upon the subjects of his majesty, either contributions of war of any kind, or taxes equal or analogous to them, known by the denomination of empressitos forzosos, whatever might be their destination.

"3. Lastly. Never to curtail in the least the legal facility which the French citizens have hitherto enjoyed, to trade in retail in the same manner as the Mexicans, without granting to the former sufficient indemnification."

CHEROKEE TREATY.

In senate May 15, 1838.

Mr. Davis of Massachusetts and Mr. Mc Kean of Pennsylvania having presented several memorials, remonstrances &c. against the enforcement of the treaty with the Cherokees.

Mr. Lumpkin said he held in his hand a letter addressed to him by John Ridge, from the Cherokee country west of the Mississippi. He was a full-blooded native Cherokee. The letter contained much interesting information in regard to the true condition of the Cherokee people who had emigrated west of the Mississippi river. Mr. Ridge had been in that country twelve months, had explored and examined it, and the letter gave a full account in respect to the true condition of those people. But this was not all. The declarations of other intelligent persons corroborated what Mr. Ridge had stated on this subject.

This letter, Mr. L. said, had come as from an individual, but it contained a full and complete refutation of all those petitions which, morning after morning, were pouring in upon the senate, from persons who knew nothing of the real condition of these people, or of the subject on which they were arraying others, in a way which must have a most deleterious effect on the country, and on the unfortunate remnant of these Indian people, and which might end in a manner afflictive to all persons of sensibility and humanity.

Mr. L. asked that the letter might be read; it contained statements of facts which could be established in courts of justice, and which were calculated to have an important bearing on this question.

Mr. L. then read the letter, no objection being made; and, after a brief statement of the happy and contented condition of the Cherokees west of the Mississippi, it proceeded with matter and reflections principally derogatory to John Ross, of the Cherokee nation, and his encouragers and coadjutors.

Mr. L. said he was grateful for the indulgence which the senate had granted him. He felt it due to the subject and the country to do thus much, and he felt very confident that if those people who were sending petitions here knew better what they were doing, every good principle of human nature would impel them to a different course. They were proceeding under the sacred name of the holy religion of the Bible; and if Mr. L. revered any thing, it was the religion of the Bible. But he looked forward to the results of the passing tendencies to unite and blend that religion with the politics of the country, with fear and trembling. But he would not now consume the time of the senate. His sole objects was to prevent the evil which he saw growing out of the course taken on this subject.

Mr. Davis presented another remonstrance of the same kind, from a number of inhabitants of New Windsor, Ontario county, New York, which was laid on the table.

While up, Mr. D. said he would speak a word or two in reply to the senator from Georgia. That senator had seen fit to read a private letter for the information of the senate, and Mr. D. was happy to be informed in any way in regard to the state of facts as they existed on this subject, and he would not have said one word in reply if the senator had not alleged that this letter refuted the statements of the remonstrants. Mr. D. had looked over the memorials which he had presented, and he had heard the letter and if the senator had been better informed in regard to the contents of both, he would not have been led to the conclusion that the letter touched the subject of the memorials at all. The memorialists did not go into the inquiry as to the liberality of this treaty, nor of the richness and pleasantness of the country to which these people were removed, and, as far as Mr. D. knew, they made no question about this. But whether it were so or not, was not at all the matter in question. The remonstrants insisted that the treaty was procured by fraudulent and improper means, and that it was made and procured without the assent of the Cherokees; and they then drew this inference, that if the treaty was made without the assent of the nation, it ought not to be obligatory, and consequently ought not to be enforced without their consent. Mr. D. had uniformly concurred in the opinion that this was no treaty; but as the sense of the senate was otherwise, and as the constitutional majority had declared it a law of the land, Mr. D. deemed it his duty to acquiesce, and he had sent these memorials to the table without examining this matter expecting that the government would go on with the treaty, but hoping that it would be done in the spirit of humanity. The memorialists were, many of them, gentlemen of the highest respectability in the country for intelligence, moral worth, humanity, and every thing that went to exalt human beings. The senator had not done them justice, for all they asked was that the treaty might not be enforced against the will of the Cherokees.

Mr. D. was not disposed to enter into the question of the merits or demerits of John Ross. The remonstrants had derived their information on this subject not from him, but from documents published here. They had seen the remonstrance now on the files of the senate from more than 16,000 of that nation, stating to the senate and to the country that the treaty had been made without the assent of that nation by a few unauthorized individuals, and that they were therefore not bound by it. Mr. D. felt it his duty to say thus much, in order to do justice to the remonstrants.

Mr. Lumpkin said he denied wholly that this letter was reproachful. It spoke of the remonstrants as deluded, bewildered, and misled; and it was true that they were so; and that the senator himself was under a misapprehension, Mr. L. would show by calling his attention to one fact, which was, that it was well known by Mr. L. and by others here, that there were not 16,000 Cherokees east of the Mississippi, men, women, children, and infants included. This showed the deception and delusion under which the remonstrants acted, and evinced that these good people, as well as their respectable organ here, were under a mistaken impression.

In regard to the language of the remonstrants, Mr. L. had examined one of the memorials, and there was no comparison between the reproachful terms used by them against this government, and all its respectable authorities; there was nothing in the letter to compare with it. But we had fallen on times when privileges of this kind were all on one side; the senate received reproaches to degrade the government; but the moment reproach was cast on the people who took these liberties, it was like disturbing a hornet's nest. Mr. L. denied that this letter contained any reproach or abuse; it was a statement of facts; and Mr. L.'s object in reading it was nothing more nor less than to prevent these people from meddling with matters which they knew nothing about, and to prevent the destruction of those people in whose behalf they erringly acted; his design was for good, and not for evil.

Mr. Davis said it was a well-known fact that whatever was the number of the Cherokees east of the Mississippi, the great mass of the nation was opposed to the treaty. This fact was notorious.

Mr. Lumpkin said he had no doubt but a large majority of the whole Cherokee people were under such an influence, from the impression made on their minds, that they would have expressed their dissent to the treaty when it was made. But yet there was no doubt that a large majority of those who were capable of reflecting and judging correctly rejoiced in the treaty, and a large majority of the people who were re-settled under the treaty were now happy and contented in their present home. But was it the custom of the United States, when making important treaties with foreign nations, to consult every man, woman, child, and sucking baby, on the subject? It was not, and never had been; and Mr. L. believed that a large portion of the intelligent Cherokees had been consulted, and were in favor of the treaty.

The subject was here dropped.

RIOTS IN PHILADELPHIA.

From the National Gazette of May 17.

We have received an account of a riot which took place last evening, outside of the large new building called the "Pennsylvania Hall," lately opened in this city for scientific and political discussions and lectures, including the discussion of the question of abolitionism. As there is a part of the communication which is calculated to bring about a renewal of disgraceful scenes, we shall omit its detail, giving its substance. Last evening the hall was crowded with about three thousand persons, to hear a lecture by Mr. Garrison and others. Of the audience about one-half were females. It was promiscuously composed of white and black people.

At the close of Mr. Garrison's address, a mob outside was very noisy. Mrs. Maria W. Chapman, of Boston, then addressed the meeting for several minutes. She was followed by Mrs. Angelica E. Grimké Weld, Lucretia Mott, of this city, and Abby Kelly. In the mean time the mob increased and became more unruly, and threw various missiles at the windows. No further injury was done than breaking the glass, as the blinds inside protected the audience. At a quarter before ten the company retired amid the cries and groans of the mob, who blocked up the street on every side. One black man was knocked down with a club.

The proprietors of the hall have called upon the city to pay the amount of damages done. The police will, we trust, use every exertion to discover and punish the rioters; and, in the mean time, nothing should be done to excite popular outrage. For the present, Philadelphia has been sufficiently disgraced by a single riot.

From the United States Gazette.

Destruction of the Pennsylvania Hall. In another part of this paper will be found an account from the National Gazette, of violence done to the Pennsylvania Hall, on Wednesday evening. During most of the day, yesterday, large numbers of persons were standing round the hall, and it was evident that there was a purpose of injury.

In the afternoon the mayor went to some of the leading members of the society owning this building, and represented to them the great danger of continuing to hold their meeting, and he especially urged upon them the propriety of not assembling that evening, as he had every reason to believe that there was an organized band prepared to break up the meeting, and perhaps do injury to the building—and crowded as the walk must be by the company, this could not be done without personal injury and loss of life.

It was agreed to forego the evening meeting, and the mayor took the keys and went out and addressed the persons then in the street, stating that there would be no meeting, and requested them as good citizens to retire. The people cheered the mayor, who returned to his office, placing persons to bring information of any attempt at injury, calling around him all his disposable force, and having some volunteers.

Early in the evening notice was given that a crowd had come down the street and was attacking the north side of the hall; the mayor hastened up Fifth street to Cherry with his force, and when he met the crowd, which was dense and numerous, he sprang his rattle, and his police called upon the people to sustain the mayor, but not one person appeared to give aid. It was then seen that those who had assailed the building, had broken open the doors and lower windows—obtained entrance and were beating out the upper windows.

By this time the mayor and his police had attempted to arrest the course of destruction—but they were assailed with clubs, and almost every one severely wounded. Col. Watnough, the sheriff, also made an attempt to restore peace, and save the building, but he was attacked, severely bruised and narrowly escaped. We learn that the persons inside then gathered the benches, chairs and books in a heap, set fire to them, and then left the hall. The engines hastened to the conflagration, but the firemen were not allowed to play on the building, but directed to play upon those houses endangered by the flame, so that before ten o'clock the whole work of the hall was entirely destroyed—and shortly afterwards the crowd, which consisted of many thousands, began to disperse.

We give the above statement as we gathered it at a late hour. We have no time to indulge in any reflections upon the outrage against the laws and the city's character.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

In addition to the preceding accounts, we have reports through private channels, that the firemen were themselves indisposed to perform their duties.

It is stated that they would not play a drop of water upon the doomed building, but made use of every exertion to prevent the extension of the conflagration.

As an indication of the feeling that prevailed, it is said that the house of a poor widow adjoining having been injured to the amount of some fifty dollars, a collection for her benefit was set on foot, and money collected to the amount of four hundred and seventy dollars.

The immediate cause of this popular out-break is said to have been the ridiculous and ostentatious amalgamation of colors in Chesnut-street, during the hours of fashionable promenading.

Whites and blacks, arm-in-arm, were thronging the streets by scores, whereat the populace became greatly excited.

Such a course, on their part, was exactly calculated to create a popular commotion. The result is fearful—and deeply disgraceful to the country.

From the United States Gazette of Monday.

Early on Saturday evening the corners of the streets, in the vicinity of Dock and Second street, were occupied by groups of persons, evidently expecting some movement, though without any apparent idea whence it would proceed; but, in the course of an hour or two, crowds had assembled, and there appeared a disposition to attack the printing office of the Ledger. The mayor and a party of the police were in the building. The sheriff had a party in or near the exchange; and mounted patrols were seen passing along the streets. While the crowd were passing toward the office, the mayor came out and addressed them, as citizens, and asked them to consider that their own property might some day be similarly endangered, if they encouraged such a mode of illegal action. After some reply and rejoinder, the crowd seemed disposed to hold their ground, without proceeding to violence; when, at a late hour, there came a mounted messenger to give notice that there was an outbreaking in Sixth or Seventh street and Lombard. Thither the crowd in Dock street hastened, and the mayor, with a part of his disposable force, proceeded, in compliance with the call. The report was, that the blacks had risen upon the whites, and were beating them. We could not learn whether this had been the case, but it was certain that a pistol was fired, and, as it was believed, from the window of a house—and great consternation was manifested. The mayor is of opinion that the pistol was fired in the street, though, as he was absent at the time of the discharge, he could not tell.

Order was again restored.

From the U. S. Philadelphia Gazette, May 19.

Further disturbances. Last evening, a large number of persons gathered in Cherry street, above Tenth, in front of a school-house. The mayor was there with his police, and prevented any injury to the property.

Nearly at the same time, the very large building in Thirteenth street, above Callowhill, built for an asylum for colored children, was found to be on fire. The engines and hose collected, and the fire was put out after some injury had been sustained by the building. Immense numbers of persons were assembled, but we saw nothing of violence.

From the Philadelphia Gazette, May 18.

Great popular movement. We extract from the Pennsylvania Inquirer the following account of a tumult which took place at the Pennsylvania Hall last evening. The crowd assembled at an early hour, and proceeded at once, with a quiet resolve, to effect their purpose. The police of the city did all that could be done to quell the tumult. Our intrepid mayor, col. Swift, repaired to the spot about half past eight o'clock, at the head of the entire body of the police. The crowd quietly opened to allow him to pass to the hall, but the instant that the officers endeavored to arrest those engaged in the work of destruction, the populace fell upon them, and the police force was, of course, defeated and scattered. No police could, unless backed by a military force, have averted the destruction of the hall. The crowd must have comprised from twenty-five to thirty thousand men, generally respectable and well-dressed, and determined, almost to a man, to protect from interruption the immediate agents in the destruction of the building. The whole affair took place without unnecessary violence or noise. The firemen seemed fully to participate in the feelings of the assembled populace, and though the surrounding houses were completely protected, not a drop of water fell upon the building devoted to destruction. We saw no drunken persons in the crowd, and heard no fights except the brief conflict with the police. Of course, every good citizen, every one who desires to see the supremacy of the laws maintained, must regret and reprobate proceedings of this character. It must, however, be admitted that the excitement which has led to this unhappy affair is wide-spread and intense.

From the Pennsylvania Inquirer

Destruction of Pennsylvania Hall. The popular excitement growing out of the dedication of Pennsylvania Hall, and the attending circumstances, reached a fearful pitch throughout yesterday. The tumult of the previous night was the theme of all tongues; a thousand extravagant stories were circulated, and the apprehension became general that the night would not pass by without a still more fearful and exciting scene. During the day the hall was open, and, as we believe, one or two lectures were delivered. At noon, from 100 to 200 persons congregated in front of the building; and the number continued to increase, and the sensation to become stronger, until towards sundown, when thousands from every section of the city and county, poured in dense masses towards the scene; and by 8 o'clock there must have been a concourse of ten thousand persons of all classes, sexes, ages, and conditions. The mayor, we are told, made his appearance at an early hour, and closed the doors of the hall; notwithstanding it was understood that a society would meet there in the evening, for the purpose of discussion. We need scarcely state that, as the crowd increased, the excitement waxed warmer. The first demonstrations of attack were made upon the windows, which were thrown at from numerous hands and from every direction. This movement was followed up by an attempt to force the doors, which, at first did not succeed; the efforts, however, were soon redoubled, and an entrance speedily effected. The next step was breaking the seats, galleries, and furniture in the interior. The fragments, it is said, were hastily gathered together in the centre of the hall, and a torch applied. The gas pipes were cut, and fire communicated to the streams that issued forth. These are the statements of the night; for, with the conflicting rumors in circulation, it was impossible to discover any authenticated account of the more deliberate preliminary steps. The alarm of fire was speedily given, and the vast multitude re-echoed the cry. The state-house bell also rang out, and the engines and firemen poured in with their apparatus, which they speedily put in readiness for action.

The crowd by this time had swollen to an immense magnitude, and not only Sixth street, from Arch to Race, presented a dense mass of human beings, but all the streets and alleys adjacent were thronged with eager and excited spectators. The alarm soon spread through the city—a few hasty particulars passed from mouth to mouth, and the apprehension was far greater among those who had not an opportunity of witnessing the progress of the flames, than the immediate spectators of the scene.

This was natural, the hall being located in one of the most densely populated parts of our city, within a stone's throw of the Arch street theatre; and a number of frame buildings being in the immediate neighborhood, it was feared that, no matter how well-directed the efforts of the firemen, nor how liberal the supply of water, they would not be able to bound the progress of the flames. Nay, more, a conflict between the police and the crowd was apprehended; and hence many an anxious mother, or susceptible wife, dreaded the night would not pass by without the destruction of life as well as property.

Soon after nine o'clock, the whole building was wrapped in flames, which diffused a lurid light round, and, throwing their red reflections upon the multitude below, imparted a remarkable and fearful effect to the scene. Every window vomited forth its volume, and the roof cracked, smoked, and blazed before the progress of the devouring element. It was a fearful scene, and yet we never witnessed so vast a concourse so passive and so quiet, considering the circumstances of the case. The great majority appeared to be merely spectators: unwilling, by any movement whatever, either to increase the existing or provoke further excitement. The firemen were self-possessed, and took especial pains to protect and save the surrounding property. This was a task of great difficulty, but one in which, as we believe, they proved fully successful. Torrents of water descended; and as fast as the strength of one body of men gave way, their places were instantly supplied by another.

We saw several colored persons in the outskirts of the crowd; but, as far as our observation extended, no effort was made to molest them. We were told, however, that several were driven from the ground. The fire raged furiously until all the wood work of the building was destroyed. The roof fell in about ten o'clock; and as the flames subsided, the throng gradually dispersed.

DEBATE BETWEEN MESSRS. CLAY AND CALHOUN.

In senate of the United States, March 10, 1838.

Mr. CLAY rose immediately upon the resumption by Mr. Calhoun of his seat, and addressed the senate as follows:

Indisposition, Mr. President, under which I am laboring, would have prevented my attendance in the senate to-day upon any less interesting occasion than that of listening to the promised reply of the senator from South Carolina. (Mr. Calhoun.) Having done so, respectfully and attentively, I shall not ask for two or three weeks to concoct and digest what I have to say. Invulnerable to any attack from any quarter, self-eased and self-poised, I feel perfectly ready to respond to such parts of the speech of the honorable senator as appear to require any notice from me.

The senator commenced by a complaint of the omissions in my speech. I presume he means my speech as published.

[Here Mr. Calhoun rose, and said that his allusion was to the omissions of the senator from Kentucky as delivered—omissions to answer parts of his argument.]

Mr. Clay continued. I have given way once for an explanation; I shall permit no other interruption. I did not interfere with the senator from South Carolina during the delivery of his speech, and he will have ample opportunity to reply when I have done.

Sir, the senator from South Carolina habitually complains of omissions and of misrepresentations of his speeches whenever his argument happens to be refuted. Now, I clearly understood him, and I think so did the whole senate, to assert, in the outset of his former speech, that there was but a single alternative, the bill or the substitute. And I supposed his object to be to drive my friends and myself to the acceptance of one or the other branch of it. By way of excluding any other course, he assumed that we had abandoned all thought of establishing a Bank of the United States. Since, I have shown that there was another course, which is, to do nothing, far preferable to the bill, the senator says that it was very obvious!

Another allegation of the senator is, that I have misrepresented him with respect to the power of the general government to contract with state banks. It seems that he did not intend to assert broadly that there existed an inability on the part of this government to make any such contract whatever, but it is the particular contract contained in the substitute which, he thinks, cannot be constitutionally made. The contract proposed in the bill with the state banks, being approved by the senator, is all perfectly constitutional and right! The senator goes for his own thunder, and against that of every body else. There was yet another contract with the state banks which had commanded the cordial approbation of the senator, and that is contained in the deposit act of 1836. I think, Mr. President, it will be difficult for the ingenuity even of the senator from South Carolina to maintain a competency to make those two contracts, and an inability to authorize that which is provided for in the substitute.

I am also accused of misrepresenting the senator in respect to the reception of redeemable bank notes for the term of six years, as provided for in the bill. He thinks it entirely constitutional to make such a limited arrangement, whilst it would be, in his opinion, wholly inadmissible to continue for any indefinite time to receive such notes. The complaint of the senator is, that I did not state the circumstances, conditions, and qualifications under which he proposes this temporary reception of bank notes. I do not think, Mr. President, that they can vary, in the smallest degree, the question of power. If, as contended for by the senator, the constitution prohibits the reception of bank notes in dues to the government, the prohibition extends as well to a term of six years as to any indefinite time. The senator seems to me to have some peculiar constitutional notions. The instrument in his hands is perfectly flexible and perpetually varying. He confounds expediency and constitutionality, and blends them so together, that it is difficult to discriminate the one from the other. He argued that we are so connected with the banks that we must ease off gradually, and not suddenly discontinue the use of their paper.

Now, sir, if my memory serve me, the senator commenced his speech at the extra session by announcing that there was a total rupture between the government and the banks by the suspension of specie payments. The disconnection still exists in fact and in law. The bill, which the senator so warmly espouses, makes a contingent revival of it. In 1816, also, the connexion had altogether ceased in point of law. Then the senator proposed a bank of the United States. In both cases, if I understand him, he proceeds on the ground of practical inconvenience. Now, sir, I cannot for my life concur in making the constitution this nose of wax. It does or does not authorize a bank of the United States. It does or does not authorize the reception of the notes of local banks. If the defect of authority for the one or the other exist, it applies to all times, and under all circumstances. No considerations of utility or present convenience can possibly put in the constitution a power which we do not find there. The doctrine of the senator in 1816 was, as he now states it, that bank notes being in fact received by the executive, although contrary to law, it was constitutional to create a bank of the United States. And in 1834, finding that bank which was constitutional in its inception, but had become unconstitutional in its progress, yet in existence, it was quite constitutional to propose, as the senator did, to continue it twelve years longer! That is, it is not unconstitutional to prolong the existence of an unconstitutional bank twelve years, but would be very unconstitutional to create a new bank! Let us suppose that, prior to the expiration of the twelve years, a state of things should arise which would require a further continuance of the bank for another term of twelve years, might it not be done upon the principles of the senator? And thus continued indefinitely? But Mr. President, I will not dwell longer on the alleged misconceptions, on my part, or misrepresentations of the speech of the senator. The senate heard us both, and our speeches are both published to the world. Mine has been prepared under my supervision. I recognize, and am willing to abide by, it, just as it is; and I acquiesce most cheerfully in whatever judgment the senate and the public may pronounce.

As to the personal part of the speech of the senator from South Carolina, I must take the occasion to say that no man is more sincerely anxious to avoid all personal controversy than myself. And I may confidently appeal to the whole course of my life for the confirmation of that disposition. No man cherishes less than I do feelings of resentment; none forgets or forgives an injury sooner than I do. The duty which I had to perform in animadverting upon the public conduct and course of the senator from South Carolina was painful in the extreme; but it was, nevertheless, a public duty, and I shrink from the performance of no duty required at my hands by my country. It was painful, because I had long served in the public councils with the senator from South Carolina, admired his genius, and for a great while had been upon terms of intimacy with him. Throughout my whole acquaintance with him, I have constantly struggled to think well of him, and to ascribe to him public virtues. Even after his famous summer set at the extra session, on more than one occasion I defended his motives when he was assailed, and insisted that it was uncharitable to attribute to him others than those which he himself avowed. This I continued to do, until I read this most extraordinary and exceptionable letter: [Here Mr. Clay held up and exhibited to the senate the Edgefield letter, dated at Fort Hill, November 3, 1837:] a letter of which I cannot speak in merited terms, without a departure from the respect which I owe to the senate and to myself. When I read that letter, sir, its unblushing avowals, and its unjust reproaches cast upon my friends and myself, I was most reluctantly compelled to change my opinion of the honorable senator from South Carolina. One so distinguished as he is cannot expect to be indulged with speaking as he pleases of others, without a reciprocal privilege. He cannot suppose that he may set to the right or the left, cut in and out, and chatter, among principles and parties as often as he pleases, without animadversion. I did, indeed, understand the senator to say, in his former speech, that we, the whigs, were unwise and unpatriotic in not uniting with him in supporting the bill under consideration. But in that Edgefield letter, among the motives which he assigns for leaving us, I understand him to declare that he could not "back and sustain those in such opposition, in whose wisdom, firmness, and patriotism I have no reason to confide."

After having written and published to the world such a letter as that, and after what has fallen from

* Mr. Calhoun insists that this paragraph in his letter does not apply to the whigs, but to the administration party. The clause is very ambiguous, and is susceptible of either interpretation? But if he really meant that he had no confidence in "the wisdom, firmness and patriotism" of that party, how could he unite with it to establish a novel and important system, confessedly fraught with prodigious consequences, which was to be entrusted to their execution?

the senator, in the progress of this debate, towards my political friends, does he imagine that he can persuade himself and the country that he really occupies, on this occasion, a defensive attitude? In that letter he says:

"I clearly saw that our bold and vigorous attacks had made a deep and successful impression. State interposition had overthrown the protective tariff, and with it the American system, and put a stop to the congressional usurpation; and the joint attacks of our party, and that of our old opponents, the national republicans, had effectually brought down the power of the executive, and arrested its encroachments for the present. It was for that purpose we had united. True to our principle of opposition to the encroachment of power, from whatever quarter it might come, we did not hesitate, after overthrowing the protective system, and arresting legislative usurpation, to join the authors of that system, in order to arrest the encroachments of the executive, although we differed as widely as the poles on almost every other question, and regarded the usurpation of the executive but as a necessary consequence of the principles and policy of our new allies."

State interposition!—that is as I understand the senator from South Carolina, nullification, he asserts, overthrew the protective tariff and the American system. And can that senator, knowing what he knows, and what I know, deliberately make such an assertion here? I had heard similar boasts before, but did not regard them, until I saw them coupled in this letter with the imputation of a purpose on the part of my friends to disregard the compromise, and revive the high tariff. Nullification, Mr. President, overthrew the protective policy! No, sir. The compromise was not extorted by the terror of nullification. Among other more important motives that influenced its passage, it was a compassionate concession to the imprudence and impotency of nullification! The danger from nullification itself excited no more apprehension than would be felt by seeing a regiment of a thousand boys, of five or six years of age, decorated in brilliant uniforms, with their gaudy plumes and tiny muskets, marching up to assault a corps of 50,000 grenadiers, six feet high. At the commencement of the session of 1832, the senator from South Carolina was in any condition other than that of dictating terms. Those of us who were then here must recollect well his taggard looks and his anxious and depressed countenance. A highly estimable friend of mine, Mr. J. M. Clayton, of Delaware, alluding to the possibility of a rupture with South Carolina, and declarations of president Jackson with respect to certain distinguished individuals whom he had denounced and proscribed, said to me, on more than one occasion, referring to the senator from South Carolina and some of his colleagues, "They are clever fellows, and it will never do to let old Jackson hang them." Sir, this disclosure is extorted from me by the senator.

So far from nullification having overthrown the protective policy, in assenting to the compromise it expressly sanctioned the constitutional power, which it had so strongly controverted, and perpetuated it. There is protection from one end to the other in the compromise act; modified and limited, it is true, but protection nevertheless. There is protection, adequate and abundant protection, until the year 1842, and protection indefinitely beyond it. Until that year, the biennial reduction of duties is slow and moderate, such as was perfectly satisfactory to the manufacturers. Now, if the system were altogether unconstitutional, as had been contended, how could the senator vote for a bill which continued it for nine years? Then, beyond that period, there is the provision for cash duties, home valuations, a long and liberal list of free articles, carefully made out by my friend from Rhode Island, (Mr. Knight,) expressly for the benefit of the manufacturers, and the power of discrimination, reserved also for their benefit, within the maximum rate of duty fixed in the act. In the consultations between the senator and myself in respect to the compromise act, on every point upon which I insisted he gave way. He was for a shorter term than nine years, and more rapid reduction. I insisted, and he yielded. He was for fifteen instead of twenty per cent. as the maximum duty, but yielded. He was against any discrimination within the limited range of duties for the benefit of the manufacturers, but consented. To the last he protested against home valuation, but finally gave way. Such is the compromise act; and the senate will see with what propriety the senator can assert that nullification had overthrown the protective tariff and the American system. Nullification! which asserted the extraordinary principle that one of twenty-four members of a confederacy, by its separate action, could subvert and set aside the expressed will of the whole! Nullification! a strange, impracticable, incomprehensible doctrine, that partakes of the character of the metaphysical school of German philosophy, or would be worthy of the puzzling theological controversies of the middle ages.

The American system, Mr. President, now so much derided, why I know not, unless it be because it is American, has advanced this country in the arts and in prosperity, at least half a century. I believed, and still believe it, eminently advantageous to all parts of the Union, and injurious really to none. In its origin it was denounced because it was alleged that it would dry up all the sources of our revenue from imports. Whoever will take the trouble to examine the early debates upon the subject, will find that to have been the prominent and strong ground of opposition. The prediction being falsified, its opponents changed their position, and charged it with being the parent cause of the late great surplus in the public revenue. That surplus was in fact chiefly produced by the operation of the land system, and if the land bill which I introduced some years ago had been passed (a bill by the bye to which the senator from South Carolina was opposed,) we should have avoided all perplexity in the disposal of that surplus, because there would have been none.

No one, Mr. President, in the commencement of the protective policy, ever supposed that it was to be perpetual. We hoped and believed that temporary protection extended to our infant manufactures would bring them up, and enable them to withstand competition with those of Europe. We thought, as the wise French minister did, who, when urged by a British minister to consent to the equal introduction into the two countries of their respective productions, replied that free trade might be very well for a country whose manufactures had reached perfection, but was not entirely adapted to a country which wished to build up its manufactures. If the protective policy were entirely to cease in 1842, it would have existed 26 years from 1816, or 18 from 1824, quite as long as, at either of those periods, its friends supposed might be necessary. But it does not cease then, and I sincerely hope that the provisions contained in the compromise act for its benefit beyond that period, will be found sufficient for the preservation of all our interesting manufactures. For one, I am willing to adhere to, and abide by, the compromise in all its provisions, present and prospective, if its fair operation is undisturbed.

The senate well knows that I have been constantly in favor of a strict and faithful adherence to the compromise act. I have watched and defended it on all occasions. I desire to see it faithfully and inviolably maintained. The senator, too, from South Carolina, alleging that the south were the weaker party, has hitherto united with me in sustaining it. Nevertheless, he has left us, as he tells us in his Edgefield letter, because he apprehended that our principles would lead us to the revival of a high tariff. How stands the matter with the other party? It is known that the present chief magistrate voted for the bill of 1828, after, as has been asserted, having advised such a concoction of it as to ensure its defeat, and having held out to the southern delegation the hope that it would be defeated. On that occasion a late distinguished senator from Virginia is reported to have said that he had deceived them once, and that was his fault, but if he ever deceived them again it would be theirs. The present chairman, in the senate, of the committee on finance, was a member of the committee on manufactures in the house of representatives which prepared that bill of 1828, and we all know that both he and other leading members of the administration party have again and again declared that they held themselves no more bound by the compromise act than by any ordinary act of legislation. It will be also recollected that at the very last annual session a test vote on my motion was given in respect to the compromise act, when every political friend that I have except the venerable senator from Tennessee, (who, for particular reasons, voted against us, but who assured me at the time that he had no intention of disturbing substantially the act,) voted for adherence to it, and every friend of the administration, with one or two exceptions, voted against it. Here, Mr. President, are the eyes and noses:

On motion of Mr. Clay to recommit the bill, with instructions "to strike out of the bill all articles which at present pay a duty equal to twenty per cent. ad valorem, or upwards, as embraced by the act of the 2d March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act," it was determined in the negative.

Those who voted in the affirmative are: Messrs. Bayard, Black, Calhoun, Clay, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Ewing, of Ohio, Hendricks, Kent, Knight, McKean, Moore, Morris, Prentiss, Preston, Robbins, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Tomlinson, Wall, Webster—24.

Those who voted in the negative are: Messrs. Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Ewing, of Illinois, Fulton, Hubbard, King, of Alabama, King, of Georgia, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Page, Parker, Rives, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Strange, Tallmadge, Walker, White, Wright—25.

Thus we perceive that the senator from South Carolina has left us, who have shown a disposition to maintain inviolably the compromise act, on which he has so often professed to believe that the security of the south depended, and has gone to the other party, which has exhibited a direct contrary disposition to disregard it. And who can doubt that, if it were necessary to the party in power to secure their places, they would revive the tariff much higher than it ever has been.

I have never desired, sir, to force any opinions of my own upon the people of this country, contrary to their will. I form my opinions from the best lights which I can command, and freely announce them. If they are unacceptable, at any time, to the country, I cheerfully acquiesce. With respect to internal improvements, that other part of the American system, which the senator says he left us from an apprehension of its being revived, the state of the country is greatly altered since the power was first asserted and exercised. In my own state, and within a few years, we have completed and put in progress most of the improvements which are desirable there. And, in all the states, large and liberal appropriations of their own means, and great advances in their various works, have been made. When the land bill was under consideration, I stated that its passage would fully satisfy every reasonable expectation of the several states, in respect to means to be drawn from the general government, in regard to internal improvements. Since that period, a measure has been adopted, nearly equivalent to the passage of the land bill, by which about $30,000,000 have been placed in the power of the states, subject to their application to objects of internal improvements. And if, as I hope may prove to be the case, the land bill should at some future day be passed, scarcely another wish can remain as to the application of the means of the general government to works of internal improvement. In point of fact, larger appropriations have been made to that object by the present friends of the senator from South Carolina than by any preceding administration. He had, therefore, no motive to leave us and join them, from any apprehensions which he could justly entertain with respect to that system of policy.

The senator from South Carolina proceeds, in his Edgefield letter, to say:

"I clearly perceived that a very important question was presented for our determination, which we were compelled to decide forthwith: shall we continue our joint attack with the nationals on those in power, in the new position which they have been compelled to occupy? It was clear that, with our joint forces, we could utterly overthrow and demolish them. But it was not less clear that the victory would enure not to us but exclusively to the benefit of our allies and their cause."

Thus it appears that in a common struggle for the benefit of our whole country, the senator was calculating upon the party advantages which would result from success. He quit us because he apprehended that he and his party would be absorbed by us. Well, what is to be their fate in his new alliance? Is there no absorption there? Is there no danger that the senator and his party will be absorbed by the administration party? Or does he hope to absorb that? Another motive avowed in the letter, for his desertion of us, is that "it would also give us the chance of effecting what is still more important to us, the union of the entire south." What sort of an union of the south does the senator wish? Is not the south already united as a part of the common confederacy? Does he want any other union of it? I wish he would explicitly state. I should be glad, also, if he would define what he means by the south. He sometimes talks of the plantation or staple states. Maryland is partly a staple state. Virginia and North Carolina more so. And Kentucky and Tennessee have also staple productions. Are all these states parts of his south? I fear, Mr. President, that the political geography of the senator comprehends a much larger south than that south which is the object of his particular solicitude; and that, to find the latter, we should have to go to South Carolina; and, upon our arrival there, trace him to Fort Hill. This is the disinterested senator from South Carolina!

But he has left no party, and joined no party! No! None. With the daily evidences before us of his frequent association, counselling and acting with the other party, he would tax our credulity too much to require us to believe that he has formed no connexion with it. He may stand upon his reserved rights, but they must be mentally reserved, for they are not obvious to the senses. Abandoned no party? Why this letter proclaims his having quitted us, and assigns his reasons for doing it; one of which is, that we are in favor of that national bank which the senator himself has sustained about 24 years of the 27 that he has been in public life. Whatever impression the senator may endeavor to make without the senate upon the country at large, no man within the senate, who has eyes to see, or ears to hear, can mistake his present position and party connexion. If, in the speech which I addressed to the senate on a former day, there had been a single fact stated which was not perfectly true, or an inference drawn which was not fully warranted, or any description of his situation which was incorrect, no man would enjoy greater pleasure than I should do in rectifying the error. If, in the picture which I portrayed of the senator and his course, there be any thing which can justly give him dissatisfaction, he must look to the original and not to the painter. The conduct of an eminent public man is a fair subject for exposure and animadversion. When I addressed the senate before, I had just perused this letter. I recollected all its reproaches and imputations against us, and those which were made or implied in the speech of the honorable senator were also fresh in my memory. Does he expect to be allowed to cast such imputations, and make such reproaches against others without retaliation? Holding myself amenable for my public conduct, I choose to animadvert upon his, and upon that of others, whenever circumstances, in my judgment, render it necessary, and I do it under all just responsibility which belongs to the exercise of such a privilege.

The senator has thought proper to exercise a corresponding privilege towards myself, and, without being very specific, has taken upon himself to impute to me the charge of going over upon some occasion, and that in a manner which left my motive no matter of conjecture. If the senator mean to allude to the stale and refuted calumny of George Kremer, I assure him I can hear it without the slightest emotion; and if he can find any fragment of that rent banner to cover his own aberrations, he is perfectly at liberty to enjoy all the shelter which it affords. In my case there was no going over about it; I was a member of the house of representatives, and had to give a vote for one of three candidates for the presidency. Mr. Crawford's unfortunate physical condition placed him out of the question. The choice was, therefore, limited to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, or to the distinguished inhabitant of the hermitage. I could give but one vote, and, accordingly, as I stated on a former occasion, I gave the vote which, before I left Kentucky, I communicated to my colleague (Mr. Crittenden,) it was my intention to give in the contingency which happened. I have never for one moment regretted the vote I then gave. It is true, that the legislature of Kentucky had requested the representatives from that state to vote for General Jackson; but my own immediate constituents, I knew well, were opposed to his election, and it was their will, and not that of the legislature, according to every principle applicable to the doctrine of instructions, which I was to deposit in the ballot-box. It is their glory and my own never to have concurred in the elevation of Gen. Jackson. They ratified and confirmed my vote, and every representative that they have sent to congress since, including my friend, the present member, has concurred with me in opposition to the election and administration of General Jackson.

If my information be not entirely incorrect, and there was any going over in the presidential election which terminated in February, 1825, the senator from South Carolina, and not I, went over. I have understood that the senator, when he ceased to be in favor of himself, that is, after the memorable movement made in Philadelphia by the present minister to Russia, withdrawing his name from the canvass, was the known supporter of the election of Mr. Adams. What motives induced him afterwards to unite in the election of General Jackson, I know not. It is not my habit to impute to others uncharitable motives, and I leave the senator to settle that account with his own conscience and his country. No, sir, I have no reproaches to make myself, and feel perfectly invulnerable to any attack from others, on account of any part which I took in the election of 1825. And I look back with entire and conscious satisfaction upon the whole course of the arduous administration which ensued.

The senator from South Carolina thinks it is my misfortune to be always riding some hobby, and that I stick to it till I ride it down. I think it is his never to stick to one long enough. He is like a courier, who, riding from post to post, with relays of fresh horses, when he changes his steed, seems to forget altogether the last which he had mounted. Now, it is a part of my pride and pleasure to say, that I never in my life changed my deliberate opinion upon any great measure of national policy but once, and that was 22 years ago, on the question of the power to establish a bank of the United States. The change was wrought by the sad and disastrous experience of the want of such an institution growing out of the calamities of war. It was a change which I made in common with Mr. Madison, two governors of Virginia, and the great body of that republican party to which I have ever belonged.

No, sir, the senator from South Carolina is free from all reproach of sticking to hobbies. He was for a bank of the United States in 1816. He proposed, supported, and with his accustomed ability, carried through the charter. He sustained it upon the admitted grounds of its constitutionality, of which he never once breathed the expression of a doubt. During the twenty years of its continuance no scruple ever escaped from him as to the power to create it. And in 1834, when it was about to expire, he deliberately advocated the renewal of its charter for a term of 12 years more. However profound he may suppose the power of analysis to be, and whatever opinion he may entertain of his own metaphysical faculty, can he imagine that any plain, practical, common sense man can ever comprehend how it is constitutional to prolong an unconstitutional bank for the space of twelve years? He may surround such a proposition with as many circumstances and conditions as he pleases; he may dress it up and decorate it with as much drapery, and encompass it with as many distinctions and qualifications as his imagination can invent; it comes at last to this: a bank of the United States is constitutional or it is not. If it is unconstitutional in its origin, it is unconstitutional throughout every subsequent stage of its existence. And if it be admissible to continue such an unconstitutional institution for one term of twelve years, it may be continued another and another, to the end of time.

The distinguished senator sticks long to no hobby. He was once gaily mounted on that of internal improvements. We rode that double, the senator sitting before, and I behind him. He quietly slipped off, leaving me to hold the bridle. He introduced and carried through congress in 1816, the bill setting apart the large bonus of the Bank of the United States for internal improvements.—His speech delivered on that occasion does not intimate the smallest question as to the constitutional power of the government, but proceeds upon the assumption of its being incontestable. When he was subsequently in the department of war, he made to congress a brilliant report sketching as splendid and magnificent a scheme of internal improvements for the entire nation as ever was presented to the admiration and wonder of mankind. Where is he now? For myself, I am just where I was then, as to the existence of the power, although I am willing to admit that the altered condition of the country has lessened the degree of necessity for its exercise. During the progress of the land bill, it may be remembered that I said, "pass this bill, and you will forever settle the power of the government over internal improvements." Although that measure unfortunately failed, for reasons already stated, there is now little or no occasion for the aid and interposition of the general government. But the power remains in the constitution; and if it be not practically exercised, it will be like other dormant powers contained in the same instrument. And in respect to the power to protect American industry, it is just as much now in the constitution as it was in 1816, when the senator from South Carolina espoused the policy with so much zeal and ability: just as fixed there as it was regarded from the commencement of the government down to 1820 or 1822, when for the first time it was controverted. Under its beneficent operation, thousands have been enabled to obtain a competency, many to acquire wealth, who otherwise would never have known either. No patriot heart can fail to expand with exultation at the blessings which it has diffused. It has placed us in equal competition with some of the powers most advanced in civilization; and in spite of all that has been insidiously done against the interest, and which is still doing, our cherished manufactures will, I trust, stand up and maintain themselves against the unnatural hostility at home, and all jealous rivalry abroad.

The senator from South Carolina gets tired of his hobbies too soon. The whole country was filled with just alarm at the fearful strides of executive power; and, judging from the tone of the senator's speeches, and the strenuousness of his exertions, no one was more anxious than he, but a few short months ago, to reduce it within safe and constitutional limits. But he suddenly goes over to a party which maintains to the very letter the whole extent of the power ever claimed by the executive department—maintains that in a free, intelligent, and responsible government, every subordinate executive officer is bound implicitly to obey the will of the president, and that he may exercise at his discretion the tremendous power of dismission, not only without assigning reasons, but without the smallest practical or available responsibility for its exercise! His efforts have not only ceased to restrain and circumscribe the power, but he supports a measure which will give to it a vast augmentation. I repeat what I have so often said, that if this executive bank is to be sanctioned by congress, it will be the utter destruction of all other banks in the country. We shall have, in fact, ultimately but one bank, and that a treasury bank, exclusively controlled by the executive, emitting all the paper medium in circulation, and amassing and hoarding the greater part of the specie of the country. We shall have, in short, that perfect union of the sword and the purse, which all real patriots have ever so much dreaded. I think, when the honorable senator undertakes to establish his own consistency, he assumes an herculean task, beyond his powers, great and gigantic as he believes them to be. He may have all the speeches he has ever delivered read to us in an audible voice, by the secretary, and call upon the senate attentively to hear them, beginning with his speech in favor of a bank of the United States in 1816, down to his speech against a bank of the United States, delivered the other day, and he will have made no progress in his task. I do not speak this in any unkind spirit, but I will tell the honorable senator when he will be consistent. He will be so, when he resolves henceforward, during the residue of his life, never to pronounce the word again. We began our public career nearly together; we remained together throughout the war and down to the peace. We agreed as to a bank of the United States—as to a protective tariff—as to internal improvements—and lately, as to those arbitrary and violent measures which characterised the administration of General Jackson. No two prominent public men ever agreed better together in respect to important measures of national policy. We concur now in nothing. We separate forever. The senator sometimes says, that he is going to fall back upon the republican party of 1827. Then it is the entire south which he would unite. Then it is the republican party of '98. He professes to rally on Mr. Madison's resolutions; but he and Mr. Madison never could agree about their true import. The senator deduced nullification from those resolutions. But nullification never entered into the head of Mr. Madison. That pure and enlightened patriot never could comprehend how a confederacy of 26 states could get along at all, if any one of its members could, at its pleasure, set aside and nullify the will of the whole. The senator too, professes to belong to the republican party of '98, but I fear we should differ as much about its real tenets and doctrines as we do in respect to any constitutional question. The senator has allowed himself to use some expressions not very customary or parliamentary in deliberative assemblies; I shall not imitate his example in the employment of them. But I beg leave to assure him of my feelings of perfect and entire reciprocity.

The senator appeals to his present party, rallies his new allies, and cries out to them that victory is ahead, to which he will lead them. Pass the bill, he exclaims, and decide the long vexed question, and thus put an end to all controversy. But does the senator and do any of his friends suppose that if their bill should pass this senate by a majority of one or two votes, and the other house by a similar majority, it will pour oil on the troubled waters, and give peace to this distracted country. No, sir, no. The upturned business, the embarrassment, and the threatened ruin of the community, are not to be restored to order and prosperity in that way. I know that in other countries, and in other times, it has been a common calculation with tyranny that when the tyrant nods, his will is to be obeyed and submission to ensue. But senators need not "lay that flattering unction to their souls." The people of this country are too enlightened, too well acquainted with their interests and rights, and too firmly resolved at all hazards to maintain them, quietly to submit to a measure fraught with such ruin and danger to their liberties as this is. The supporters of this bill seem determined, if they can, to reverse the great principle, which lies at the foundation of all our institutions. That principle is, that the popular will flows from the people into the legislative halls, and controls, directs, and modifies all measures, intended for the advancement of their happiness. But this bill treats the known will of the people with sovereign contempt, and substitutes the will of the servant for the will of the master. It proceeds upon the fallacious assumption that the servants of the people know better than the people themselves what will best promote their happiness. It is in vain that you put on the screws, and attempt to force from them reluctant acquiescence by cutting off every other prospect of relief. It is in vain that you pronounce your veto against a national bank, and promulgate to the world your solemn declaration that the people shall not have one, although it should be manifest that there is a clear majority of them demanding it. It is in vain that you should denounce, and lay your unhalloved hands on the domestic institutions of the states, endeared to them by long habit and cherished affection. Do not deceive yourselves. There may be those who are bold while here, acting in the sunshine of executive power; but when they return to their constituents, whose will or whose instructions they have defied, they will find in their frowns, their indignation and their maledictions, that the power of the people is superior to the power and influence of their most exalted magistrate, whether in office or in retirement.

[When Mr. CLAY resumed his seat, Mr. CALHOUN and Mr. PRESTON both rose. The Chair gave the floor to]

Mr. Preston, who said that nothing could be more unexpected or painful to him, than the necessity under which he found himself of interrupting, for a moment, the discussion between the senator from Kentucky, and his colleague. He well knew that in the general expectation of the public, and by the acquiescence of the senate, the day and the occasion were appropriated to, and set apart for those gentlemen, and he had taken his seat, not doubting that he should listen in silence, to which his health, as well as all the proprieties of the occasion seemed to consign him. But, (said Mr. Preston,) no condition of my health, no dread of violating an expected order of proceeding, no rule or ceremonious observance, can compel me to silence under the remarks of the senator from Kentucky, in regard to my state. If they had been personal to myself, I might submit in silence, or postpone a reply for a more fit occasion, without breaking in upon the unity of the present scene; but the honorable senator has thought proper to indulge a course of remarks upon certain recent and conspicuous acts of my state, pressed, as it seems to me, unnecessarily into this discussion, which I will at once resent and repel. And besides, there is, in my present relation to my state, peculiar obligations of duty, affection, and gratitude, which makes her defence more my business and my pleasure, than at any former time. It is generally known that it is my misfortune to differ with her legislature in regard to important questions connected with the finances of this government, and that it has expressed that difference in formal resolutions. It is not so generally known that, with an elevation and generosity characteristic of the state, it at the same moment soothed the pain which this difference of opinion could not but create, by an express exclusion of all censure upon her public functionaries, who entertained different views. Already bound to South Carolina by every obligation of duty and affection which can bind a citizen and a servant, these obligations are enhanced and strengthened by this noble and touching act of kindness and generosity, which makes it my privilege, on this occasion, to supersede my colleague in the defence of our state, and to take to my own hands the willing task.

I have remained silent when vulgar wittings have sought to amuse themselves, or others, by a poor jest on nullification; and I have heard, without emotion, the efforts of underling politicians, who, ever and anon, supply a vacuity of sense by a puny and innocent tirade against South Carolina. Such things are to be expected from such quarters, and may be well submitted to in silence and indifference; but when these poor topics are rescued from contempt in the only way by which this can be effected, by that adventitious consequence derived from the dignity and position of him who uses them, they become worthy of animadversion, not on their own account, but on account of the party resorting to them.

In the contest which South Carolina waged with this government, whether she was right or wrong, no man of right mind, who knows the circumstances, will perceive matter for jest or ridicule. Her course is now history. She acted in patriotism and honor. Her principles were openly asserted, her purposes holdly avowed; wrong or right, she fearlessly assumed her ground, calmly arrayed herself against the whole power of this government, sternly retorted the frowns of a tyrant, armed as he was by the eager haste of a servile legislature, with all the power of the country, in or out of the constitution; and when the personal passions of the Chief Magistrate, ministered to and inflamed by the ready zeal of the most thoroughly devoted party which this country ever saw, were joined and sustained by the greediness of the manufacturing interest in measures of military violence, were there any symptoms of irresolution, of giving back, amongst us? Did the honorable senator see any sign of fear at home, or hesitancy amongst those who so well and so nobly represented us here? Did we not hurl back the proclamation in the teeth of those who issued it? Did we not upon this floor answer argument by argument, and threat by scorn, while at home the state armed herself to repel force by force? Did any one who looked upon the scene in this senate, and our actors in it; did any one who looked to us at home, even from this distance, see any where the bearing of men, whose names could be mentioned, except in the vulgar violence of pampered power, in any connection with an ignominious death, or whose conduct and destiny could in any event be associated but with honor and respect? Slaughtered we might have been, crushed and overwhelmed, perhaps, but the honorable senator did not understand the occasion, nor does he know the people of whom he speaks, if he believes that the crisis of 1833, could have been passed but by war or concession on the part of this government—compromise, if the word be more palatable.

Well, sir, the compromise bill was passed, and went forth with healing on its wings. It was hailed as the harbinger of peace, and was understood to be the result of mutual concessions, made in a high spirit of patriotism, for the purpose of smothering the heats which threatened the country. In such a spirit, unquestionably, we acceded to the compromise, surrendering, for its sake, a portion of our interests, which in justice might have been insisted on; and, in such a spirit, we supposed the honorable senator, as the representative of the manufacturing interest, and given his consent to the arrangement. These high and holy purposes I attributed to the honorable gentleman, and to those who acted with him, on that occasion. I thought him entitled to the glory of having acted from no personal motive, from nothing that savored of party feeling, but from a broad patriotism, or the broader principles of that code which promises blessings to the peace-makers. And on this high ground, I have always understood the gentleman then placed himself; but his declarations to-day show that he is discontented with that position, and he prefers to have it known that his object was to drive a good bargain for the manufacturers; and that his views of peace did not extend beyond saving a good fellow, or two from an ignominious death. That he did not believe that danger existed, or that South Carolina intended aught but child's play. The honorable senator has a right to establish the relation in which he stands to the transactions of that day, and to correct the history of them, which had falsely, as it now appears, assigned so different, and, in my judgment, so much nobler an attitude to the honorable senator. He now permits it to be understood, that when he seemed to compromise with South Carolina, it was, in fact, but securing the tariff against general Jackson; and that when he talked of the harmony of the union, and the peace of the land, he did not, in fact, consider either in the slightest danger. In all this he was totally mistaken; as much mistaken in regard to us, as we were to him. We were anxious to avoid, but not afraid to meet a collision. We, at least, were in earnest, when we said we were willing to fight for our cause, or to compromise for peace. We were resolute and armed; and when the honorable senator speaks of that period in the light tone he has assumed, he treats it in a way inconsistent with the true character of the crisis, with his own dignity, and with the dignity of this chamber.

Mr. Clay. I am happy, although the senator from South Carolina (Mr. Preston) has totally misconceived me, to have been the occasion of the very eloquent vindication of his own state, which he has just pronounced. He complains of my allusion to nullification. His complaint ought not to be of me, but of his colleague, (Mr. Calhoun,) whose exultation at the supposed overthrow of the protective policy, through the instrumentality of nullification, has reluctantly extorted from me an exposition of the truth. But Mr. President, nothing was further from my purpose than to cast the slightest imputation upon the gallant and patriotic state of South Carolina, or any of her citizens. In my opinion she was eminently wrong in that memorable contest; but I never doubted her sincerity, or her gallantry. I never doubted that in the land of Marion, of Sumpter, and of Pickens, there were many of their descendants equally noble and brave, and that the people of South Carolina would, upon all proper occasions, maintain the high character which they have so justly acquired. And among the nullifiers themselves, I personally know, that there are many as high minded, as brave, and as patriotic, as any part of the American people. I would as soon go to them to find friends on whom I could confidently rely, in any possible emergency, as to any men upon earth. But the senator must excuse me for believing that South Carolina alone could not have beaten all the rest of the United States, and for thinking that, I justly described the inequality of such a contest in the parallel which I drew of the relative strength of the two parties. Nor did I, in the allusion which I made to what passed at the session of 1832-3, between my excellent friend (John M. Clayton) and myself, intend to intimate that the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) or any of his colleagues, deserved the ignominious death with which they had been menaced. Neither of us thought they did; but we had heard the current reports of the threats of President Jackson to apply it to certain gentlemen in South Carolina, the senator from South Carolina himself (Mr. Calhoun) among them, and hence the remark of Mr. Clayton.

Equally has the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston) misapprehended me in another respect. I did not say, or intimate, that it was a leading or principal motive in the compromise act to save his colleague and others from the halter. I stated that although I had no dread of the power of South Carolina alone, I did not know how far, if a civil war were once kindled, the flames might extend, and whether from sympathy other southern states might not during its progress become involved in the contest. The motives for the passage of the compromise act were, 1st. to prevent a civil war, and to protect South Carolina from impending danger; 2d. to preserve the tariff, threatened with a total overthrow, which would have taken place at the next session, to insure stability, during a long term of years, to the policy of protection, and to save the manufacturers from the absolute ruin and prostration with which they were menaced; and, 3d. to avoid the necessity of placing a large army, and vast military resources, at the disposal of President Jackson, animated as he was by a spirit of resentment and vengeance towards South Carolina and some of her most prominent citizens. I had no confidence in the discretion of the President, and I was unwilling to see him invested with an immense military power, of the prudent use of which I saw no adequate security.

Such was the combination of motives which prompted me to propose, and I have no doubt actuated my friends in sanctioning the compromise act. I trust now, sir, that the senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Preston,) will see that I made no attack upon his state, or its citizens, which required of him his vindication. If the contest had not happily been averted, I have no doubt that the people of South Carolina would have fought with as much firmness, resolution, and bravery, as any people ever did; but I can but believe, that the issue of it could not have been doubtful, and must have been, inevitably, most disastrous to her gallant sons and her fair fields.

Mr. Calhoun rose in rejoinder. The senator from Kentucky says that the sentiments contained in my Edgefield letter, then met his view for the first time, and that he read that document with equal pain and amazement. Now, it does happen that I expressed those self-same sentiments, just as strongly in 1834, in a speech which was received with unbounded applause by that gentleman's own party, and of which a vast number of copies were published and circulated throughout the United States. The speech is on the Secretary's table, and I will thank him to read the extract I have marked.

The secretary of the senate here read as follows:

"A very few words will place this point beyond controversy. To the interposition of the state of South Carolina we are indebted for the adjustment of the tariff question; without it, all the influence of the senator from Kentucky, over the manufacturing interest, great as it deservedly is, would have been wholly incompetent, if he had even thought proper to exert it, to adjust the question. The attempt would have prostrated him, and those who acted with him, and not the system. It was the separate act of the state that gave him the place to stand upon; created the necessity for the adjustment, and disposed the minds of all to compromise. Now, I put the solemn question to all who hear me, if the tariff had not then been adjusted—if it was now an open question—what hope of successful resistance against the usurpation of the executive, on the part of this or any other branch of the government, could be entertained? Let it not be said that this is the result of accident—of an unforeseen contingency. It was clearly perceived, and openly stated, that no successful resistance could be made to the corruption and encroachments of the executive, while the tariff question remained open—while it separated the north from the south, and wasted the energy of the honest and patriotic portions of the community against each other, the joint effort of which is indispensably necessary to expel those from authority, who are converting the entire powers of government into a corrupt electioneering machine; and that, without separate state interposition, the adjustment was impossible. The truth of this position rests not upon the accidental state of things, but on a profound principle growing out of the nature of government and party struggles in a free state. History and reflection teach us, that when great interests come into conflict, and the passions and the prejudices of men are roused, such struggles can never be composed by the influence of any individual, however great; and if there be not, somewhere in the system, some high constitutional power to arrest their progress, and compel the parties to adjust the difference, they go on till the state falls by corruption or violence."

Such was the language I held at that time, when the events were fresh in our recollection, and the senator heard it and opened his mouth; yet now, after four years, he rises here and makes the statement we have heard. That I uttered these sentiments before, and that frequently, I am able to show by other facts. But I go further, and shall prove from the senator's own declaration the truth of what I assert. In 1832, speaking on a bill then on its passage providing for a reduction of the tariff, the senator declared in his place that he considered that bill as an ultimate adjustment of the question, and yet the whole tariff system was prostrated before the act went into effect; and what effected this prostration? Nothing but the interposition of my own little gallant state—a state of which he has spoken in such contemptuous language. It was the well-known principle of the American system, of which the senator is the author, that every article which can be manufactured at home was to be protected, and that that protection was to be extended, if possible, even to prohibition. The senator now says that he continues to think that principle a sound one; and yet the compromise act surrenders by express terms the system of protection; gives up the principle to which the senator tells us he still adheres, and to the surrender of which the senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) if I rightly remember, objected to the compromise. Now, I would ask, what was it that caused the surrender of this principle? It was because I took my stand firmly, resolutely, and refused to compromise at all, unless the principle was given up.

But the senator tells us that he is among the most constant men in this world. I am not in the habit of charging others with inconsistency; but one thing I will say, that if the gentleman has not changed his principles, he has most certainly changed his company; for, though he boasts of settling out in public life a republican of the school of '98, he is now surrounded by some of the most distinguished members of the old federal party. I do not desire to disparage that party. I always respected them as men, though I believed their political principles to be wrong. Now, either the gentleman's associates have changed, or he has; for they are now together, though belonging formerly to different and opposing parties—parties, as every one knows, directly opposed to each other in policy and principles. I repeat the assertion, that the senator's present friends were not only associated with the old federal party, but that they were distinguished members of it, and attained renown from the advocacy and defence of its principles, and, as they have now got together, I leave it to him and them to decide which has changed.

As I am charged with inconsistency, and the charge is so often repeated by the senator, I will make a brief reply on that point. As it respects the bank charter of 1816, the senator well knows that at that time the choice was between the use of state banks and a national bank, as the fiscal agent of the government. The state banks were then the fiscal agent, and it was impossible then to break the union between the government and the banks. I acquiesced in what was beyond my control, and inevitable at the time; and as I then, as now, preferred a national to the state banks, I then advocated the former against the latter, as I would now do in the same state of things.

He says I was in favor of the tariff of 1816, and took the lead in its support. He is certainly mistaken again. It was in charge of my colleague and friend, Mr. Lowndes, chairman then of the committee of ways and means, as a revenue measure only. I took no other part whatever but to deliver an off-hand speech, at the request of a friend. The question of protection, as a constitutional question, was not touched at all. It was not made, if my memory serves me, for some years after. As to protection, I believe little of it, except what all admit was incidental to revenue was contained in the act of 1816. As to my views in regard to protection at that early period, I refer to my remarks in 1813, when I opposed a renewal of the non-importation act, expressly on the ground of its giving too much protection to the manufacturers. But while I declared, in my place, that I was opposed to it on that ground, I at the same time stated that I would go as far as I could with propriety, when peace returned, to protect the capital which the war and the extreme policy of the government had turned into that channel. The senator refers to my report on internal improvement, when I was secretary of war; but, as usual with him, forgets to tell that I made it in obedience to a resolution of the house, to which I was bound to answer, and that I expressly stated I did not involve the constitutional question; of which the senator may now satisfy himself, if he will read the latter part of the report. As to the bonus bill, it grew out of the recommendation of Mr. Madison in his last message; and although I proposed that the bonus should be set apart for the purpose of internal improvement, leaving it to be determined thereafter, whether we had the power, or the constitution should be amended, in conformity to Mr. Madison's recommendation, I did not touch the question to what extent congress might possess the power; and when requested to insert a direct recognition of the power by some of the leading members, I refused, expressly on the ground that, though I believed it existed, I had not made up my mind how far it extended. As to the bill, it was perfectly constitutional in my opinion then, and which still remains unchanged, to set aside the fund proposed, and with the object intended, but which could not be used without specific appropriations thereafter.

In my opening remarks to-day, I said the senator's speech was remarkable, both for its omissions and mistakes; and the senator infers, with his usual inaccuracy, that I alluded to a difference between his spoken and printed speech, and that I was answering the latter. In this he was mistaken; I hardly ever read a speech, but reply to what is said here in debate. I know no other but the speech delivered here.

As to the arguments of each of us, I am willing to leave them to the judgment of the country; his speech and arguments, and mine, will be read with the closer attention and deeper interest in consequence of this day's occurrence. It is all I ask.

The senator supposes that some remarks in my letter alluded to the national republicans, which gave him great offence; but here again he mistakes. It alludes to those in power, and not to the national republican party, which the reading of the entire paragraph will make manifest. Will the senator send me the letter for that purpose?

"As obvious as all this must appear, I felt that I assumed a heavy responsibility in taking the course I did. It was impossible that all the circumstances and motives under which I acted could at once be generally understood, and, of course, the part I was compelled to take was liable to be misconceived and grossly misrepresented. We have been so long contending against the abuses and encroachments of the executive power as to forget that they originated in the prior abuses and encroachments of congress, and were accordingly exclusively intent on expelling from office those who had acquired and exercised their authority in a manner so dangerous, without reflecting into whose hands the power would go, and what principles and policy would gain the ascendancy. With this state of feeling on the part of our friends, I saw it was impossible to take a position which, by consequence, was calculated to cover those in power, however urgent the cause, without occasioning a shock in the first instance, and the imputation of unworthy motives, to meet which, however transient the misapprehension might be, required some resolution and firmness. But there were other and far greater causes of responsibility, to which this was as nothing. Of all the interests in the community, the banking is by far the most influential and formidable—the most active and the most concentrated and pervading; of all the points within the immense circle of this interest, there is none in relation to which the banks are more sensitive and tenacious than their union with the political power of the country. This is the source of a vast amount of their profits, and of a still larger portion of their respectability and influence. To touch their interest on this tender point is to combine all in one united and zealous opposition with some exceptions in our portion of the community, where the union of the two powers acts injuriously to banking as well as to the commercial and other greater interests of the section. To encounter so formidable an opposition, supported by a powerful political party with whom I have been acting for some years against entire power, and who regarded the union of the government and the banks as essential to the union of the states themselves, was to assume heavy responsibility under the most favorable circumstances; but to back and sustain those in such opposition, in whose wisdom, firmness, and patriotism, I have no reason to confide, and over whom I have no control, is to double that responsibility. This responsibility I have voluntarily assumed."

Mr. C. resumed. There is no doubt nor ambiguity; and I thought it so clear, that it would be impossible to misunderstand it; but it seems, in my case, that nothing is too clear for the senator to misunderstand.

After these remarkable misrepresentations, and after I have shown my sentiments in 1834, fully according with my present sentiments, the senator makes further charges, which I do not think entitled to respect. My sentiments in 1834 are my recorded sentiments now; and I am willing they should go before the public, and let them judge between the senator and myself. To them I cheerfully submit the question, without further remarks on what the senator said in reply to me; and I am the more induced to do so, as I find myself too hoarse to extend my remarks, with any satisfaction to myself or the senate.

Mr. Clay said it was very true that the senator had on other occasions, besides his Edgefield letter, claimed that the influence arising from the interference of his own state had effected the tariff compromise. Mr. C. had so stated the fact when up before. But in the Edgefield letter the senator took new ground, he denounced those with whom he had been acting as persons in whom he could have no confidence, and imputed to them the design of renewing a high tariff and patronizing extravagant expenditures, as the natural consequences of the establishment of a bank of the United States, and had presented this as a reason for his recent course. When, said Mr. C. I saw a charge like this, together with an imputation of unworthy motives, and all this deliberately written and published, I could not but feel very differently from what I should have done under a mere casual remark.

But the senator says, that if I have not changed principles, I have at least got into strange company. Why really, Mr. President, the gentleman has so recently changed his relations that he seems to have forgotten into what company he has fallen himself. [A laugh.] He says that some of my friends once belonged to the federal party. Sir, I am ready to go into an examination with the honorable senator at any time, and then we shall see if there are not more members of that same old federal party amongst those whom the senator has so recently joined, than on our side of the house. The plain truth is, that it is the old federal party with whom he is now acting. For all the former grounds of difference which distinguished that party, and were the great subjects of contention between them and the republicans, have ceased from lapse of time and change of circumstances, with the exception of one, and that is the maintenance and increase of executive power. This was a leading policy of the federal party. A strong, powerful, and energetic executive was its favorite tenet. The leading members of that party had come out of the national convention with an impression that under the new constitution the executive arm was too weak. The danger they apprehended was, that the executive would be absorbed by the legislative department of the government, and accordingly the old federal doctrine was that the executive must be upheld, that its influence must be extended and strengthened, and as a means to this that its patronage must be multiplied. And what, I pray, is at this hour the leading object of that party, which the senator has joined, but this very thing? It was maintained in the convention by Mr. Madison, that to remove a public officer without valid cause, would rightfully subject a president of the United States to impeachment. But now not only is no reason required, but the principle is maintained that no reason can be asked. A is removed and B is put in his place, because such is the pleasure of the president. In a free government, founded upon the principle of responsibility, the president of the United States is not only practically irresponsible, but does not deign to assign a reason for the exercise of one of the most important functions of government. Now, if we are to look at things and not at names, then it is certainly true, that the senator is acting with the old federal party who continues in its ancient location. If there are some of the federal party who act with us, it is because they are shocked by the extravagant pretensions of modern democrats to executive power and prerogative. I can tell the gentleman that he will find the true old democratic party who were for resisting the encroachments of power, and limiting executive patronage, on this side of the senate, and not with his new allies the Jackson Van Buren democratic party, whose leading principle is to sustain the executive and deny all power to the legislature; and which does not hold a solitary principle in common with the republican party of 1798. Yet the Senator, true to the principles of his new allies, is for uniting, by this government bank, the purse and the sword, and laying both at the feet of the executive. The senator tells us that he found banks in existence in 1816, and that he only acquiesced in their constitutionality. But, if he acquiesced in it then, why cannot he acquiesce in the same thing now? The banks at that time were not paying specie, the legal connexion between them and the government had ceased; the whole currency and business of the country were in a state of derangement, just as they are now, yet he acquiesced in a bank of the United States, and he acquiesced again in 1834. Why cannot he acquiesce in 1838? The senator is fond of the record. I should not myself have gone to it but for the infinite gravity and self-complacency with which he appeals to it in vindication of his own consistency. Let me then read a little from one of the very speeches in 1834, from which he has so liberally quoted, and called upon the Secretary to read so loud, and the senate to listen so attentively:

"But there is in my opinion a strong if not an insuperable objection against resorting to this measure, resulting from the fact that an exclusive receipt of specie in the treasury would, to give it efficacy, and to prevent extensive speculation and fraud, require an entire disconnection on the part of the government, with the banking system, in all its forms, and a resort to the strong box, as the means of preserving and guarding its funds—a means, if practicable at all in the present state of things, liable to the objection of being far less safe, economical, and efficient than the present."

Here is a strong denunciation of that very system he is now enlogising to the skies. Here he deprecates a disconnection with all banks as a most disastrous measure; and, as the strongest argument against it, says that it will necessarily lead to the antiquated policy of the strong box. Yet, now, the senator thinks the strong box system the wisest thing on earth. As to the acquiescence of the honorable senator in measures deemed by him unconstitutional, I only regret that he suddenly stopped short in his acquiescence. He was, in 1816, at the head of the finance committee, in the other house, having been put there by myself, acquiescing all the while in the doctrines of a bank, as perfectly sound, and reporting to that effect. He acquiesced for nearly twenty years, not a doubt escaping from him during the whole time. The year 1834 comes: the deposits are seized, the currency turned up side down, and the senator comes forward and proposes as a remedy a continuation of the bank of the United States for twelve years—here acquiescing once more; and, as he tells us, in order to save the country. But if the salvation of the country would justify his acquiescence in 1816 and in 1834, I can only regret that he did not find it in his heart to acquiesce once more in what would have remedied all our evils.

In regard to the tariff of 1816, has the senator forgotten the dispute at that time about the protection of the cotton manufacture? The very point of that dispute was, whether we had a right to give protection or not. He admits the truth of what I said, that the constitutional question as to the power of the government to protect our own industry was never raised before 1820 or 1822. It was but first hinted, then controverted, and soon after expanded into nullification, although the senator had supported the tariff of 1816 on the very ground that we had power. I do not now recollect distinctly his whole course in the legislature, but he certainly introduced the bonus bill in 1816, and sustained it by a speech on the subject of internal improvements, which neither expresses nor implies a doubt of the constitutional power. But why set apart a bonus if the government had no power to make internal improvements? If he wished internal improvements, but conscientiously believed them unconstitutional, why did he not introduce a resolution proposing to amend the constitution? Yet he offered no such thing. When he produced his splendid report from the war department, what did he mean? Why did he tantalize us with that bright and gorgeous picture of canals and roads, and piers and harbors, if it was unconstitutional for us to touch the plan with one of our fingers? The senator says in reply, that this report did not broach the constitutional question. True. But why? Is there any other conclusion than that he did not entertain himself any doubt about it? What a most extraordinary thing would it be, should the head of a department, in his official capacity, present a report to both houses of Congress, proposing a most elaborate plan for the internal improvement of the whole union, accompanied by estimates and statistical tables, when he believed there was no power in either house to adopt any part of it.

In conclusion, I repeat the assurance to my friend who sits near me, that I had not the most remote intention of casting the smallest reflection on his state, nor did I, in my own opinion, say any thing which could fairly be interpreted.

Mr. Osborn again rose. Hoarse as he was, he would make a brief reply. The Senator asks why I made that report to Congress? I was under an imperative call from congress, and could not avoid making it; and I believe that duty was imposed upon me by the Senator from Kentucky.

[Mr. Clay said. No.]

Mr. Calhoun: However that may be, the report was made during the session of 1815-'19, under a call of the house; and it did not involve the constitutional question.

As to the tariff of 1816, I never denied that congress have the power to impose a protective tariff for the purpose of revenue; and beyond that the tariff of 1816 did not go one inch. The question of the constitutionality of the protective tariff was never raised till some time afterwards.

As to what the senator says of executive power, I, as much as he, am opposed to its augmentation, and I will go as far in preventing it as any man in this house. I maintain that the executive and judicial authorities should have no discretionary power, and as soon as they begin to exercise such power, the matter should be taken up by congress. These opinions are well grounded in my mind, and I will go as far as any in bringing the executive to this point. But, I believe, the executive is now ostrictripped by the congressional power. He is for restricting the one. I war upon both.

The senator says I assigned as a reason of my course at the extra session that I suspected that he and the gentlemen with whom he acted would revive the tariff. I spoke not of the tariff, but a national bank. I believe that banks naturally and assuredly ally themselves to taxes on the community. The higher the taxes the greater their profits; and so it is with regard to a surplus and the government disbursements. If the banking power is on the side of a national bank, I see in that what may lead to all the consequences which I have described; and I oppose institutions that are likely to lead to such results. When the bank should receive the money of the government, it would ally itself to taxation, and it ought to be resisted on that ground. I am very glad that the question is now fairly met. The fate of the country depends on the point of separation; if there be a separation between the government and banks, the banks will be on the republican side in opposition to taxes; if they unite, they will be in favor of the exercise of the taxing power.

The senator says I acquiesced in the use of the banks because the banks existed. I did so because the connexion existed. The banks were already used as depositories of the government, and it was impossible at once to reverse that state of things.—I went on the ground that the banks were a necessary evil. The state banks exist; and would not be a madman that would annihilate them because their respective bills are uncurrent in distant parts of the country? The work of creating them is done, and cannot be reversed; when once done, it is done forever.

We have a law in South Carolina which makes it penal for magistrates to marry, and the penalty is a fine of £100. I was engaged in a case of this sort in court; and although the marriage was illegal, it was not reversed. And yet the senator considers to be necessarily absurd what I hold to be incontrovertible, that time must be taken even to reverse an unconstitutional act, (practice;) and it may not only be unconstitutional, but wise to do so. Suppose the tariff, in its objectionable features, unconstitutional as I deem them, had been arrested at an individual blow; millions on millions of property would have been sacrificed. And look at all the banks; if they were stopped at once, as the senator would require, if they are unconstitutional, what would not be the consequences? Mr. C. said he would not further occupy the time of the senate.

Mr. Clay. I agree that it is unnecessary to consume the time of the senate; but when I was up I omitted to close the Edgefield letter.

Mr. Calhoun (still standing,) desired to notice one point farther. He was formerly decided in favor of separating the banks and the government, but it was impossible then to make it, and it would have been followed by nothing but disaster. The senator says the separation already exists; but it is only contingent; whenever the banks resume, the connexion will be legally restored. In 1834 I objected to the sub-treasury project, and I thought it not as safe as the system now before us. But it turns out that it was more safe, as appears from the argument of the senator from Delaware, (Mr. Bayard) I was then under the impression that the banks were more safe, but it proves otherwise.

Mr. Clay said, if the senator would review his speech again, he would see there a plain and explicit denunciation of a sub-treasury system.

The distinguished senator from South Carolina (I had almost said my friend from South Carolina, so lately and so abruptly has he bursted all amicable relations between us, independent of his habit of change, I think, when he finds into what federal doctrines and federal company he has gotten, he will be disposed soon to feel regret and to return to us,) has not, I am persuaded, weighed sufficiently the import of the unkind imputations contained in his Edgefield letter towards his former allies—imputations that their principles are dangerous to our institutions, and of their want of firmness and patriotism. I have read that singular letter again and again, with inexpressible surprise and regret, more, however, if he will allow me to say so, on his own than on our account.

It is undoubtedly true, Mr. President, that the sudden destruction of any unconstitutional system or measure, which has been long in operation, may lead to serious if not ruinous consequences. But that cannot alter at all the question of constitutional power. If practical inconvenience can authorize you to prolong an unconstitutional system, it may justify its creation; and then all constitutional authority will be merged in considerations of expediency. With respect to the senator's observation that banks are the natural allies to the protective policy, and to lavish expenditures, I beg leave to oppose fact to the theory. The banks are generally owned or controlled by the mercantile class, and that class was always opposed to the protective policy. We found it our most formidable opponent. The merchants were in favor of the foreign trade, and were unwilling to see any of its sources dried up. Break down our manufactures, and our importations would increase, and must continue to increase so long as we could find means to pay for them. There are some merchants who, like the senator from North Carolina, (Mr. Strange,) and my lord Chatham, I believe it was wished that not a hob-nail should be made in America. The merchants, too, were generally opposed to the late war, and, undoubtedly, seasons of peace are most favorable to commercial enterprise, as they are to the happiness and prosperity of communities.

Mr. President, I am done; and I sincerely hope that the adjustment of the account between the senator and myself, just made, may be as satisfactory to him as I assure him and the senate it is perfectly so to me.

Mr. Calhoun. I have more to say, but will forbear, as the senator appears desirous of having the last word.

Mr. Clay. Not at all.

The senate then adjourned.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

May 17. Mr. Wright presented a memorial from a large number of merchants of the city of New York, praying such an alteration of the revenue laws as to allow a drawback on foreign coal exported for consumption in steam-vessels. Referred.

The following resolution, offered by Mr. Allen on Tuesday last, was taken up:

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia procure and report to the senate statements of the condition of the several bank in the District of Columbia that have applied for an extension of their charters, in regard to the following particulars:

1. The name of the officers and directors of the banks, the amount of stock owned by each, and the debts due from each to the banks respectively, discriminating between the executive, legislative, and judicial officers of the government among them and also between residents and non-residents.

2. The stockholders of the banks respectively, the amount of stock owned by each, and of the debt due from each, discriminating as above.

3. The debtors to the banks respectively, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

4. The number of suits that the banks respectively have instituted against their debtors since the suspension of specie payments, and the amount due from each, discriminating as above.

Mr. Roane, with a view to prevent the delay of the bill which the passage of this resolution would require, and also to prevent what he deemed a call for improper information, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

This motion not being debatable, and Mr. Allen having failed in a request that the motion should be withdrawn to allow him to make a few remarks, he called for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was negatived—Ayes 17, noes 18.

Mr. Allen then said it was not his intention to enter into any discussion of the merits of the question at that time, but merely to respond to an observation of the honorable chairman, who had asserted that much of the information sought for by the resolution was already in possession of the senate. If such were the fact, he was not aware of it. Mr. A. thought it was an anomaly in American legislation to undertake to charter a whole forest of banks while they were acting in open violation of the public law of the land, and to seek to do it without any investigation into their present condition or prior conduct. Congress was asked to set a moral example, by rewarding the violators of the law, for such in fact would be the consequence of a renewal of these charters for twenty years on the terms set forth in the bill. When Congress proposed to inquire into the conduct of these institutions on prior occasions, we were told that was a matter entirely immaterial; "that the people of this District demanded their recharter." If this were so, where were the petitions to that effect? It had been stated that these banks were indispensable to the business concerns of this District, to the wants of the people; and when a resolution was offered inquiring into the facts, it was sought to be strangled in its birth. Mr. A. wished to see whether these banks were for the benefit of the District of Columbia, or for the people of other states and territories. He had been told the people here were the smallest participants. It was said there was more poverty and want in these ten miles square than in any part of this country. If so, how happened it to be where there are the greatest number of these banks? It had been said that we propose an inquiry into the private affairs of the banks? These institutions were emanations from public law, and the people had a right to know all that related to them. When they were asking for their charters, they were public institutions; but when once granted, they could the very next day take shelter under the sanctity of private concerns. He denied the right of public institutions to have any private transactions which might not be brought to light. Mr. A. was ignorant that the information he sought could effect public men; but if it did, he could not help that. He did not know a public man that owed the first dollar to any bank in the country. His object was to guard the whole community, by throwing round these institutions proper guards and proper restraints; and he, for one, was desirous, of separating the government in toto from all banks and banking connexion; and he was prompted to this by the most solemn considerations that it would be for the benefit of the country.

Mr. A. then went into the subject at some length, to show that on another occasion a resolution had passed the senate making inquiry into the conduct of a public man in connexion with banks, (a late secretary of the treasury,) which had been passed without dissenting a voice. Mr. A. alluded to Mr. Taney, and the triumphant manner in which that pure, but persecuted, statesman had vindicated his public and private conduct from all aspersion.

Mr. A. read from the minutes of the bank of the Metropolis a resolution which had passed the board, at which a judge of the supreme court was a director, declaring all transactions of the board confidential on the part of the directors and officers of the bank. Here, then, was a bank with a high public functionary in its direction, passing a law to secrete their transactions from the public eye; and was this to be tolerated, the people to remain in ignorance, and at last, in all probability made to suffer losses from the very acts of the institution?

Mr. A. cited also the stoppage of the Bank of Washington on a certain occasion when a draft had been presented for 20,000 dollars, during the prior panic, and commented, with much severity, on the business. He concluded by expressing a hope that there would be no objection to the passage of the resolution, and maintained there was sufficient justification to be found in the very document he had quoted, which had been signed by the president of the Bank of the Metropolis.

Mr. Sevier said that for the last ten years no subject in this country, so far as his knowledge extended, had been so completely exhausted in the way of argument, and want of argument, by politicians, by editors, by smatterers, and by party hacks, as the everlasting topic of banks and their abuses. The senate, I think, (said Mr. S.) will bear me witness, that for that length of time, at least, the public have been permitted to think of but little of anything else. Sir, it has been a bank fight all the time. Having arraigned, tried, convicted, and hung by the neck, as a felon, the Bank of the United States, and having no other Cæsar to encounter, we are now to be led, it seems, into a crusade against the local banks of this District. Yes, sir, upon the question of rechartering a half a dozen banks in this District, with a capital of about a million and a half of dollars, it seems that we are to have a full discussion upon the policy of banking; that we are to be entertained with violent harangues about bank gods and bank monsters, and bribery and corruption in the members of congress. These are the "raw-heads-and-bloody bones," the windmills that we have to encounter; and for what purpose? We are to reject the applications for charters, it is said, or encumber them with such onerous conditions that the stockholders will not accept of them, in order, as we have been told, that we may give the states a salutary lesson upon the subject of banking. It is desirable, it is said, to make these charters a model, an example for the states to follow. A model! an example for the states to follow! Sir, have any of the states solicited our opinions upon this subject? Have any of them asked us for models or for examples for them to follow? Have they asked us to think for them? To revise, criticise, and condemn their legislation? No, sir; they have asked no such things at our hands. They want none of our advice; for many of them think that we have already usurped many prerogatives rightfully belonging to them; and, in my opinion, they are not disposed to submit quietly to any further encroachments upon their sovereignty by us. It is possible that some of the states may be so confiding, so tame, and submissive, as to follow implicitly the advice and orders promulgated by their senators from this chamber. But I think that I can answer for one little gallant state, who carries the game-cock, among other devices, upon her coat of arms, that she will never submit to any such arrogance or usurpation; she will never so far degrade herself as to permit her senators, with impunity, to criticise, revise, or condemn her legislation. She wants no advice, or models or examples from her servants. She herself will judge of the propriety of her own legislative action. Admit that the states have acted indiscreetly, does it become us, who are their creatures, to taunt them for their misfortunes, or chide them for their want of wisdom? No, sir; I, for one, am for shaping my legislation here to correspond to the opinions and wishes of my state, so far as I understand them. I am not for scalping and tomahawking the local banking institutions. On the contrary, I am for fostering and protecting them as far as a generous, liberal policy may dictate. I do this that the states may fully understand that we are not only not hostile, but are friendly, to their banking institutions. I do this, sir, to heal the breaches that have been made in our party ranks; to regain our lost confidence in the public estimation; and, more than all, as I believe the true policy and interest of the country depend upon it, I do this to preserve the ascendancy of the democracy of the country. I believe, sir, that the false impression in the public mind, that we are hostile to the local banks, has been mainly the cause of our late political disasters. We have been beaten in nearly every quarter. Whole states have left us. And, if this false impression is still entertained, I consider that we have witnessed, not the end but the beginning of our defeats. These are my impressions; good of course, only for what they are worth. To see our party once more united, to see them again victorious, I am prepared to make any sacrifice short of principle, of duty, and of honor.

The senator from Ohio has introduced his string of resolutions, which I am now considering, with the double view of destroying the banks, and of proving that the friends of these institutions have been bribed into their support of them. Yes, sir, bribed!—bribed into their support of them. He wishes to conceal from the people his unconquerable hostility to these banks, and his efforts for their destruction, by artfully raising a hue and cry against members of congress and officers of the government. He seems to take it for granted that no man can vote for a bank charter without a bribe. He seems to think that patriotism, that disinterested action, upon such a subject, is a mere gull-trap, a popular catch, a ghost story, that may serve the valuable purpose of amusing old women and quieting little children. For myself, sir, I have no confidence in such unjust, ungenerous, and foul suspicions. I entertain a more exalted opinion of my associates in this body; and, if I wished to be personal, which I do not, I should remind the honorable senator of the old adage, that those who charge others with a want of virtue are almost invariably destitute of that commodity themselves. Sir, members of congress bribed! I detest such unfounded, stale, and hypocritical insinuations; which every honorable man has, but to hear to disbelieve and condemn. If the senator knows of any senator who has received a bribe, let him rise in his place and point his finger at the man, and not, by a sweeping, general insinuation, cast censure upon the whole body of which he is a member. Let us have no general warrants or indefinite charges. Suppose it should turn out that a member of Congress had borrowed or owes a bank, does it follow that to be in debt to such an institution is a crime? Is it a crying sin to be in debt? If it is an evidence of corruption, there are a great many corrupt sinners in our country. Whole states, even general governments, upon this principle, are corrupt and bribed communities; and Ohio among them. If the senator is for denouncing those who may happen to be in debt, let him take the bull by the horns, and denounce his own state; for Ohio is a debtor. I met her agents, a few weeks ago, in Wall street, New York, where I had gone on the same business for my own state, negotiating a loan for some millions, and with whom, Mr. President, do you suppose they negotiated their loan? They sold their state bonds to Prime, Ward and King, the money caterers for the Bank of England. Yes, sir, with the lords and ladies of Great Britain; the same from whom Mr. Nicholas Biddle obtains his loans to feed and fatten his monster. Is there any thing corrupt in this,—in borrowing money of a foreign bank? Or will the senator attempt to justify it, upon the ground that it is roguery and murder for an individual to steal from or kill another, but it is famous, brave, and heroic, if a nation or state murders thousands and robs a kingdom? It must be justified upon this principle, if upon any. Sir, I consider it no crime for either a state, a government, or citizen, who forms a part of a state or government, to borrow money of banks, or from any other quarter. Banks, like merchants, have their customers, and they will deal with them as long as it is their interest to do so, and no longer.

Sir, many gentlemen oppose banks on constitutional grounds. Those who hold these opinions I respect, and, confined to a certain description of banks, I am with them in opinion. Their opposition is of a high and manly character, and elicits respect from every quarter. Others, not entertaining constitutional scruples, oppose banks because they are so wealthy that they require no aid from them. They are disposed to turn shavers or brokers themselves, and monopolize the trade in money at usurious interest. The banks are in their way, and hence their opposition. And to those may be added another class, who are opposed to banks. These are those who have neither property, industry, nor character, and, on these accounts, are unable to effect a loan of a bank; and hence they are found cursing banks, morning, noon and night. And if we will look over the country, we shall find that this latter class frequently make up a considerable portion of the anti-bank forces. There are others, I know, belonging to neither of these classes, who are against banks upon principle; they believe banking to be wrong; and yet we often find that it so happens that some of them find it convenient sometimes to borrow small sums, for short periods, from banks. Are they corrupt?

Mr. President, when I came to my seat in the senate this morning, I had no idea of making a speech. I voted to lay the resolution upon the table, and shall vote against it on its passage. I have troubled the senate longer than I had expected. But when I heard the resolution read, and heard the senator's speech, I thought it my duty to rise in my place and enter my protest against the inquisition it proposes.

Mr. Hubbard, in reply also to some of the remarks of Mr. Allen, repelled the idea that it was criminal for a member of congress to owe a bank, or that it disqualified him in any way from voting in relation to banks. Borrowing money from a bank was a favor done to the bank itself, and was so regarded. He also urged Mr. Allen to be specified in his charges of corruption, if he actually knew any thing of such corruption.

Mr. Roane also urged the specific exposure of corruption or bribery, if there was any truth in the charge. He also argued that the fact of having borrowed money of a bank could not properly be regarded as a disqualification to vote in relation to such bank.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, in reply to an allusion of Mr. Allen to a resolution of inquiry formerly offered by Mr. C., in regard to Mr. Taney being a stockholder in the Union Bank of Baltimore, said that the object of that resolution was entirely different from that of the resolution of Mr. A. The fact of being a stockholder was not regarded at all as a matter of secrecy; but, by common consent, a veil had ever been thrown over the relations of debtors to banks; which veil, Mr. C. argued, it would be entirely improper to break through in the manner proposed by this resolution; though Mr. C. thought, and he argued accordingly, that it would be much better if banks should be chartered under the condition that they should make known the state of the private affairs of all their debtors; and the chief reason for this was, that, according to the present state of things, the banks got all the property of their bankrupt debtors, to the exclusion of other creditors. Mr. C. would vote against the resolution, not because he had any apprehension of the exposure of his own private affairs, or those of any of his friends, but because it would be doing violence to a custom which time had established.

Mr. Tipton moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion prevailed as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, Young—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Lumpkin, McKean, Niles, Robinson, Smith, of Conn., Wright—10.

The bill authorizing the re-issue of the $10,000,000 of treasury notes was received from the house, read twice, and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. Wright subsequently reported this bill from the committee without amendment, and gave notice that he should ask for its consideration to-morrow morning, immediately after the reading of the journal.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Benton took this opportunity to correct an error into which he had been led, in making, in the course of the debate on this bill, certain charges against Mr. Semmes, of Georgetown, and also against another individual in Georgetown, who had purchased $15,000 worth of stock from a widow, in the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank, which charges Mr. B. was understood fully and totally to retract.

Mr. Davis also, in the course of the subsequent debate, explained a former remark of his which had been misconstrued as derogatory to the Bank of Washington, [misconstrued, as the reporter freely testifies,] and proceeded to state again, as he had done before, that, by resuming specie payments at the time they did, that or any other bank must have rendered it impossible to keep many of their bills in circulation. Mr. D. also stated a variety of facts within his knowledge, which he deemed highly honorable to the Bank of Washington.

The question being on Mr. Buchanan's amendment to this bill, requiring the banks to retain an amount of specie equal to one-fourth of the amount of their private deposits, excluding special deposits, as well as of their circulation, the amendment was advocated by Mr. Buchanan, and opposed by Messrs. Cuthbert, Preston, Crittenden, Davis, and Hubbard, and the amendment was lost, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Hubbard, Knight, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster—21.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the proportion of the specie to the circulation of the banks was increased from one-fourth to one-third, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Ky., Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Swift, Trotter, Webster, Wright, Young—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Crittenden, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton—10.

Mr. Niles moved to amend the bill by requiring that the presidents and directors of the banks who should fail in complying with the requisitions of the bill as to the amount of specie required to be retained, should be made personally liable to the amount of all their private property, not only to the amount of the loss arising from such failure, as already required by the bill, but also to the amount of all losses which should be incurred on any account on the winding up of the affairs of the banks respectively.

This amendment was advocated by Mr. Niles and Clay, of Ala., and opposed by Messrs. Roane, Tallmadge, Grundy, Webster, and Hubbard; and before the vote was taken upon it,

The senate adjourned.

May 18. On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate then took up the bill "to authorize the issuing of treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the government."

On this bill a debate arose, (to be given hereafter,) in which Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Wright, Webster, Calhoun, Preston, Crittenden, Brown, Tallmadge, and Benton, participated. In the course of the debate Mr. Webster offered a proviso to the bill limiting the amount of treasury notes to be issued, under its provisions, to $2,000,000. He was willing to authorize an amount sufficient for the immediate wants of the government, but no more.

Mr. Preston also sent to the chair an additional section to the bill, which he proposed to offer at the proper time, in the following words:

And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury is hereby authorized and required to make requisitions upon the states according to the provisions of the act of 23d June, 1836, for such sums as the expenses of government may require.

Mr. Webster (Mr. Wright, in the course of the debate, having specified some large and immediate demand on the treasury) modified his amendment so as to extend the limit of treasury notes, to be issued under the bill, to $4,000,000.

This amendment was lost as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Preston, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—26.

Mr. Preston did not offer his amendment, because, as he was understood, he believed it would not be acceptable to a majority of the senate.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Preston, Robbins, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Webster, White—13.

The bill was then, by consent, read a third time and passed; and

The senate adjourned till Monday.

May 21. The Vice President communicated from the treasury department the annual statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States with foreign countries for 1837. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, with the usual number of extra copies, (unnamed.)

After several petitions had been presented,

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose, and stated that he wished to present a petition confided to his care, signed by a number of persons, praying for the establishment of a bank of the United States. It was similar to several other petitions which had been presented to the senate, or to the house, during the present session, praying for the same object. They afford evidence of a deep and returning conviction, among the people, of the utility of such an institution.

Whilst I am up, (continued Mr. C.) with the permission of the senate, I beg leave to submit a few observations upon this subject. There is reason to believe that much honest misconception and some misrepresentation prevail in regard to it, which I wish to correct. It had been supposed that those who are desirous of seeing a bank of the United States established are anxious that a charter should be granted to an existing state institution, which has an eminent individual at its head, and that this was the sole object of all their exertions. Now I wish, for one, to say, that I have no such purpose in view. I entertain for that gentleman very high respect. I believe him uncommonly able, profoundly skilled in finance, and truly patriotic. There is but one other person, connected with the banking institutions of the country, in whose administration of a bank of the United States I should have equal confidence with Mr. Biddle, and that is Albert Gallatin, who, I am glad to learn, at an advanced age, retains, in full vigor, the faculties of his extraordinary mind. There may be other citizens equally competent with those two gentlemen, but I do not know them, or am not acquainted with their particular qualifications.

But it is not for any existing state bank, or any particular individual at its head, that I am contending. I believe the establishment of a bank of the United States is required by the common good of the whole country; and although I might be willing, if it were practicable, to adopt an existing bank as the basis of such an institution, under all circumstances, I think it most expedient that a new bank, with power to establish branches, be created and chartered under the authority of congress. My friends (as far I know their opinions) and I are not particularly attached to this or that individual, to this or that existing bank, but to principles, to the thing itself, to the institution, to a well-organized bank of the United States, under the salutary operation of which the business of the country had so greatly prospered, and we had every reason to hope would again revive and prosper. And, presuming upon the indulgence of the senate, I will now take the liberty to suggest, for public consideration, some of those suitable conditions and restrictions under which it appears to me that it would be desirable to establish a new bank.

1. The capital not to be extravagantly large, but, at the same time, amply sufficient to enable it to perform the needful financial duties for the government; to supply a general currency of uniform value throughout the union; and to facilitate, as high as practicable, the equalization of domestic exchange. I suppose that about fifty millions would answer all those purposes. The stock might be divided between the general government and the states, according to their federal population, and individual subscribers. The portion assigned to the latter to be distributed at auction or by private subscription.

2. The corporation, in the spirit of a resolution recently adopted by the general assembly of the state, one of whose senators I have the honor to be, to receive such an organization as to blend, in fair proportions, public and private control, and combining public and private interests. And, in order to exclude (the possibility of the exercise of all foreign influence, non-resident foreigners to be prohibited not only from any share in the administration of the corporation, but from holding, directly or indirectly, any portion of its stock. Although I do not myself think this latter restriction necessary, I would make it, in deference to honest prejudices, sincerely entertained, and which no practical statesman ought entirely to disregard. The bank would thus be, in its origin, and continue, throughout its whole existence, a genuine American institution.

3. An adequate portion of the capital to be set apart in productive stocks, and placed in permanent security, beyond the reach of the corporation (with the exception of the accruing profits on those stocks,) sufficient to pay promptly, in any contingency, the amount of all such paper, under whatever form, that the bank shall put forth as a part of the general circulation. The bill or note holders, in other words, the mass of the community, ought to be protected against the possibility of the failure or the suspension of a bank. The supply of the circulating medium of a country is that faculty of a bank, the propriety of the exercise of which may be most controverted. The dealings with a bank, of those who obtain discounts, or make deposits, are voluntary and mutually advantageous, and they are comparatively few in number. But the reception of what is issued and used as a part of the circulating medium of the country is scarcely a voluntary act, and thousands take it who have no other concern whatever with the bank. The many ought to be guarded and secured by the care of the legislative authority; the vigilance of the few will secure them against loss. I think this provision is a desideratum in our American banking, and the credit of first embodying it in a legislative act is due to the state of New York.

4. Perfect publicity as to the state of the bank at all times, including, besides the usual heads of information, the names of every debtor to the bank, whether as a drawer, endorser, or surety, periodically exhibited, and open to public inspection; or, if that should be found inconvenient, the right to be secured to any citizen to ascertain at the bank the nature and extent of the responsibility of any of its customers. There is no necessity to throw any veil of secrecy around the ordinary transactions of a bank. Publicity will increase responsibility, repress favoritism, insure the negotiation of good paper, and, when individual insolvency unfortunately occurs, will deprive the bank of undue advantages now enjoyed by banks practically in the distribution of the effects of the insolvent.

5. A limitation of the dividends so as not to authorize more than — per cent. to be struck. This will check undue expansions in the circulating medium, and restrain improper extension of business in the administration of the bank.

6. A prospective reduction in the rate of interest so as to restrict the bank to six per cent. simply, or if practicable, to only five per cent. Banks now receive at the rate of near 6½ per cent. by demanding the interest in advance, and by charging for an additional day. The reduction may be effected by forbearing to exact any bonus, or, when the profits are likely to exceed the prescribed limit of the dividends, by requiring that the rate of interest shall be so lowered as that they shall not pass that limit.

7. A restriction upon the premium demanded upon post notes and checks used for remittances, so that the maximum should not be more than, say, one and a half per cent. between any two, the remotest points in the union. Although it may not be practicable to regulate foreign exchange, depending as it does upon commercial causes not within the control of any one government, I think that it is otherwise with regard to domestic exchange.

8. Every practicable provision against the exercise of improper influence, on the part of the executive upon the bank, on the part of the bank upon the elections of the country. The late Bank of the United States has been, I believe, most unjustly charged with interference in the popular elections. There is, among the public documents, evidence of its having scrupulously abstained from such interference. It never did more than to exercise the natural right of self-defence by publishing such reports, speeches, and documents as tended to place the institution and its administration in a fair point of view before the public. But the people entertain a just jealousy against the danger of any interference of a bank with the elections of the country, and every precaution ought to be taken strictly to guard against it.

This is a brief outline of such a new bank of the United States as I think, if established, would greatly conduce to the prosperity of the country. Perhaps, on full discussion and consideration, some of the conditions which I have suggested might not be deemed expedient, or might require modification, and important additional ones may be proposed by others.

I will only say a word or two on the constitutional power. I think that it ought no longer to be regarded as an open question. There ought to be some bounds to human controversy. Stability is a necessary want of society. Among those who deny the power, there are many who admit the benefits of a bank of the United States. Four times, and under the sway of all the political parties, have congress deliberately affirmed its existence. Every department of the government has again and again asserted it. Forty years of acquiescence by the people; uniformity every where in the value of the currency; facility and economy in domestic exchange, and unexampled prosperity in the general business of the country, with a bank of the United States; and, without it, wild disorder in the currency, ruinous irregularity in domestic exchange, and general prostration in the commerce and business of the nation would seem to put the question at rest, if it is to be perpetually agitated. The power has been sustained by Washington, the father of his country; by Madison, the father of the constitution; and by Marshall, the father of the judiciary. If precedents are not to be blindly followed, neither ought they to be wantonly despised. They are the evidence of truth, and the force of the evidence is in proportion to the integrity, wisdom, and patriotism of those who establish them. I think that on no occasion could there be an array of greater or higher authority. For one, I hope to be pardoned for yielding to it, in preference to submitting my judgment to the opinion of those who now deny the power, however respectable they may be.

But, Mr. President, strong as my convictions are, I have no intention of formally presenting any proposition to establish a bank of the United States. Composed as congress and the executive now are, it would be an unnecessary waste of time to offer such a proposal. I should regret to see a bank established, unless it were clearly called for by public opinion. I believe it is now desired by a majority of the people of the United States. But of that there does not exist perhaps any conclusive evidence. Let us wait until demonstrations of their will shall be clearly given; and let us all submit, and, for one I shall most cheerfully, to their decision, whatever it may be. Mr. C. moved that the petition be laid on the table.

A debate followed, to be given hereafter, in which Mr. Allen, Mr. Buchanan, and Mr. Clay, of Ky., participated.

The petition was then laid on the table.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported the bill referred to them making appropriations for the naval service for 1833, and gave notice that he should call it up to-morrow morning, at an early hour.

Mr. Tipton, on leave, introduced a bill to remove the office of the surveyor general for Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin. Read twice, and referred.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia for twenty years.

The question being on Mr. Niles' amendment, making the president and directors of the respective banks personally responsible for all losses to the community on the winding up of the banks, the question was put, and the amendment lost without debate, and without a division.

Mr. Benton moved, as a substitute for the bill, that the respective charters should be extended till July, 1849, as they now are, provided that the banks, each for itself, should comply with the following conditions:

1. That they should cease receiving and paying out of all paper for currency of a less denomination than five dollars, on or before the promulgation of this act.

2. That they should cease paying out the notes of other banks from and after the 1st of October next.

3. That they should redeem in specie all their notes of five dollars and under from and after the 1st of August next.

4. That they should redeem all their notes in full in specie from and after the 1st of January, 1839.

Mr. Wright opposed this amendment, especially the first clause of the proviso, on the ground that it tacitly sanctioned a practice which was already unlawful. Mr. Roane also opposed it, and gave a succinct explanation and history of the original bill, expressing the hope that it would be definitely acted on to-day.

The amendment was further opposed by Mr. Davis, and advocated by Mr. Benton. Mr. Tipton spoke earnestly in favor of placing the people of the District above the embarrassing uncertainty with which they had heretofore been agitated in relation to their banks. He desired the senate to decide promptly whether they would do so or not; and, with this view, he should vote against all amendments to this bill. Mr. Clay, of Alabama, spoke in favor of the amendment, and in opposition to a recharter for twenty years, that congress might revise the present system, or make a better. Mr. Norvell offered as a proviso to the amendment, that the respective banks should redeem all their notes in gold and silver from and after the day when this act should take effect—(from the 4th of July next.)

This amendment was opposed by Mr. King and Buchanan, and then withdrawn.

Mr. Hubbard moved to strike out the four clauses in the proviso of Mr. Benton's amendment, and insert a provision that the present charters should be extended during the pleasure of congress, being in the meantime subject to any modifications congress might think proper to make, and subject also to a repeal, at the discretion of congress.

Mr. Buchanan and Mr. King opposed this amendment as amounting in effect to a perpetual charter. Mr. K. also earnestly vindicated the banks from the charge of having acted in violation of law, in consideration that they had stopped specie payments in common with all the banks of the country, and had done all in their power to avoid it. The amendment was farther opposed by Mr. Bayard, and advocated by Hubbard.

Mr. Strange and Mr. Benton opposed the amendment as one of the most corrupting measures that had ever been adopted, inasmuch as it would directly expose members of congress, and even the president of the United States, to bribery by the banks of the District.

After a few remarks from Mr. Bayard, Mr. Hubbard withdrew his amendment.

The question now recurring on Mr. Benton's amendment, Mr. Buchanan moved to modify it by requiring that the District banks should resume sooner than the 1st of January, 1839, if the principal banks at Baltimore and Richmond should sooner resume. Mr. Benton accepted the modification. On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the second clause of Mr. Benton's proviso, relating to the notes of other banks, was stricken out:

The question was then put on Mr. Benton's substitute for the bill, which substitute was now in precise words as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the charters of the Union Bank and of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the fourth day of July, in the year eighteen hundred and forty; provided, the said banks, each for itself, shall conform to the following conditions:

1st. To cease receiving or paying out all paper currency of less denomination than five dollars, on or before the day of the promulgation of this act.

2d. To redeem all their notes of the denomination of five dollars in gold or silver, from and after the first day of August in the present year.

3d. To resume specie payments in full, on or before the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, or sooner if the principal banks of Baltimore and Richmond should sooner resume specie payments in full.

This substitute for the bill was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Pierce, Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Spence, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster—16.

The bill, in this form, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading: Ayes 37, noes Messrs. Norvell and Tipton.

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and the bill to revive, with amendments, the "act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia," were severally considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate then adjourned.

May 22. After the presentation of a number of petitions, the following bills were severally read a third time, and passed:

The bill to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia.

The bill to extend the charter of the bank of Alexandria.

The bill to extend the charter of the Union Bank of Georgetown.

And the bill to revive, with amendments, the "Act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia."

The following message, from the President, communicating the subjoined communication from the Secretary of War, was received.

To the Senate of the United States:

The accompanying copy of a communication addressed by the Secretary of War to the Cherokee delegation is submitted to Congress, in order that such measures may be adopted as are required to carry into effect the benevolent intentions of the government towards the Cherokee nation, and which, it is hoped, will induce them to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the west.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, May 21, 1838.

War Department, May 21, 1838.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the accompanying communication addressed to the Cherokee delegation now in this city, in order that, if it meet with your approbation, it may be laid before congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT,
Secretary of War.

To the President of the United States.

To Messrs. John Ross, Edward Gunter, R. Taylor, James Brown, Samuel Gunter, Sitovnokee, Elijah Hicks, and White Path, Cherokee delegation.

The undersigned has attentively considered the project of a treaty submitted by you, and, although equally desirous with yourselves to satisfy that portion of the nation that still remain east of the Mississippi, and to offer them every inducement to remove peaceably and contentedly to their new homes in the west, and not unwilling to grant most of the terms proposed by you, still, where the rights and just expectations of sovereign states are involved, it is deemed inexpedient, without their consent, to give to any stipulations which affect them the form of a solemn treaty.

In the first article you desire to stipulate and agree that "the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, engages and stipulates to remove from all the lands now occupied by them eastward of the Mississippi, and hereby renounces and relinquishes to the United States all claims of every description to such lands; such removal to be commenced at the earliest convenient period, and to be fully completed within two years from this date; to be effected by the Cherokees themselves and by their agents, and the entire expenses of such removal to be defrayed out of the money to be paid by the United States, as hereinafter provided." As has been before observed, the government of the United States could not agree to this article without the consent of the states whose rights are involved, and whose interests may be effected by this stipulation; but the executive pledges itself to use its best efforts to induce them to abstain from pressing their claims in a manner that would produce loss or inconvenience to the Cherokee people, and would be inconsistent with their being removed with every reasonable comfort. From the well known humanity and generous character of the states of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and North Carolina, there can be no doubt of their granting every indulgence which the interests of humanity require; and if two years are necessary for the comfortable removal of the nation, the undersigned will venture to assure the delegation that their request will be granted.

If it be desired by the Cherokee nation that their own agents should have the charge of their emigration, their wishes will be complied with, and instructions be given to the commanding general in the Cherokee country to enter into arrangements with them to that effect. With regard to the expense of this operation, which you ask may be defrayed by the United States, in the opinion of the undersigned, the request ought to be granted, and an application for such further sum as may be required for this purpose shall be made to congress.

In the next article of your project, you propose that "the United States, on their part, stipulate and agree, in consideration of the premises, to perfect the title of the Cherokee nation to the lands and territory westward of the Mississippi, described, mentioned and defined in and by the treaty of 1833, between the United States and the Cherokees west of the Mississippi, and the privilege of outlet thereto annexed, and to issue a patent therefor to the Cherokee nation in perpetuity; and further to pay the said chiefs and representatives of the Cherokee nation east of the Mississippi, the sum of — dollars, in manner and at the time hereinafter provided."

It was always the declared intention of the government to perfect the title to this land to the Cherokee nation, and to issue a patent therefor, so soon as that portion of them now east of the Mississippi had emigrated west, granting the nation the privilege of outlet thereto annexed, and all other privileges secured to them by former arrangements. Nor will it object to grant them, in perpetuity, if congress should think proper to do so on their recommendation, under certain restrictions, to which the delegation have assented. As the delegation expressed their fears that a form of government might be imposed which they were neither prepared for, nor desirous of, the assurance is hereby repeated, that no form of government will be imposed upon the Cherokees without the consent of the whole nation, given in council; nor shall their country be created into a territory without such previous concurrence.

With regard to the payment of a further sum of money by the United States, the undersigned cannot consent to recommend such a measure to congress. The senate of the United States deliberately decided that five millions of dollars was a full and sufficient indemnity to the Cherokees for the lands they relinquished on the east side of the Mississippi; and it is understood that the members of that body see no reason at present to alter that decision.

In the third article of your project you ask that "the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, through and by their acknowledged chiefs and officers, shall have the entire control, management, and disposition, responsible only to their own nation, of the funds to be paid under this treaty."

The undersigned would very much prefer making this disposition of the funds of the nation, but as the interests of those Cherokees who have lately emigrated, are deeply involved in this proposition, the executive cannot recommend such an alternative without the previous consent of all the parties concerned.

The next article asks, "that in addition to the said sum mentioned in the foregoing second article, the United States shall forthwith pay, or arrange to be paid to the Cherokee nation, party hereto, the rearages of the annuities which were provided for in the treaty of 1819, up to this date, and shall continue such annuities during the two years allowed for said removal."

The undersigned assures the delegation, that whatever arrearages of annuities are due to the Cherokee nation, under the treaty of 1819, shall be promptly paid up to this date, and a continuance of that annuity for two years longer shall be asked of congress.

The 5th article requires "that inasmuch as the Cherokees contemplate removing as provided for in said first article, as rapidly as their numbers and engagements will permit, the United States stipulate and engage to pay to them, as such removal, and the necessary preparations therefor progress, out of the money mentioned in said second article, such sums as may from time to time be necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto."

All payments and necessary advances for the purposes herein set forth, will be liberally provided for in the contract which the commanding general will be authorized to make with the Cherokee agents, for the emigration of that portion of the nation east of the Mississippi.

The 6th article asks, "that during the period prescribed and allowed by this treaty for said removal, the United States stipulate and contract to protect the persons and property of said Cherokees from all acts of encroachment and violence, and to furnish them, when required, with the necessary escort and protection during such removal until their arrival at their destination beyond the Mississippi."

The necessary escort and protection during the removal of the Cherokees until their arrival at their destination beyond the Mississippi will be furnished, and the United States will protect the persons and property of the said Cherokees from all illegal acts of encroachment and violence, and will use their best efforts with the states interested to prevent their pressing the execution of their rights in a manner calculated to oppress or inconvenience any individual of the nation.

In the 7th article the request is made, "that in addition to the moneys herein before stipulated to be paid by the United States, they further agree to pay to the said Cherokee nation, party hereto, the gross sum of ——— dollars, in full discharge of all claims upon the United States, under the stipulations of former treaties, for public and private property, spoiliations, indemnities, and other reclamations, whether national or individual, and for reimbursement of expenses incurred in and about this arrangement."

Six hundred thousand dollars was set apart for this purpose by a vote of congress, and to defray the expenses of the removal of the nation to their new homes. But as this sum proves to be inadequate for both objects, the executive will recommend to congress to make a further appropriation, in order to satisfy them.

The undersigned trusts that the Cherokee delegation will see in these liberal concessions the earnest desire of the president to reconcile the nation to the necessity of removing without any other delay than a due regard for their comfort and convenience demands; and in this conviction, confidently relies upon the cordial co-operation of the chiefs and head-men to effect this desirable object.

On the part of the government, copies of this document, with suitable applications to the states interested, will be immediately transmitted to the several governors thereof; instructions will be sent to the commanding general to act in conformity with its assurances, and a communication be made to congress, asking the consent of that body to the provisions proposed for the benefit of the Cherokee nation.

The undersigned, in closing this communication, which has been considered with great deliberation, and drawn with the utmost regard for the wishes of the delegation, desires it to be distinctly understood that it contains the most liberal terms the executive can grant, with a due regard to the rights and interests of all the parties concerned; and therefore presents it as the final determination of the government, and the peremptory conclusion of the correspondence with the Cherokee deputation on this subject.

J. R. POINSETT.

Department of war, May 18, 1838.

Mr. King said he had glanced his eye over this document, and he saw great reason for regret that it had ever been sent. So far from being beneficial, such measures as those proposed would lead, he believed, to serious and disastrous consequences. Mr. K. would not now enter into the merits of this paper, but he would simply say that, even if there should be any action on the part of congress, there was no sufficient evidence that the Cherokee delegation would accept even the terms held out in that communication. Mr. K. said it was also due to his constituents that no movement should have been made of this kind without consulting them or their representatives. Mr. K. moved that for the present the document lie on the table; but withdrew the motion on the request of his colleague.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, also expressed great regret that this communication had been made, and especially without consulting any of the delegation from the states interested in the subject. Mr. C., instead of being consulted on this subject, had protested in advance against any such measures. Mr. C. argued at considerable length that the delay proposed would lead to distressing and disastrous consequences, quoting various facts that had already occurred, to establish this point. He also argued that on the score of economy it would be a bad arrangement.

Mr. Webster expressed his regret that this paper was not approved by gentlemen representing the states concerned. Their approbation was very important, as it would have a more favorable effect on the public mind. Mr. W. would now consider only the question of its present disposal; and it struck him that it ought to be referred to the committee on Indian affairs. There was a strong and growing feeling in the country that great wrong had been done to the Cherokees by the treaty of New Echota. But Mr. W. would not consider that now. Here was a communication from the executive, requesting the action of congress on this subject, and Mr. W. thought the proper course was, to refer it to the appropriate committee. He moved, therefore, to refer it to the committee on Indian affairs, and hoped it would be done without provoking discussion.

Mr. Strange also deprecated discussion at this time. He expressed regret that none of the delegation from the states concerned had been consulted. He hardly knew whether the measure would be good or bad; it must create some excitement; and he thought it ought to be referred, at least out of respect for the source from which it came.

Mr. Grundy said the legislature of Tennessee would not be in session till October, and it would, therefore, be late before they could be consulted on this subject. They had, heretofore, acted on the faith that this treaty would be carried into effect, and had provided for the prompt survey, and even for the sale of the Cherokee lands. All this would be rendered nugatory by the change now proposed. Mr. G. was willing to do all the government could do without interfering with the execution of the treaty; but as for letting the Cherokees remain longer, if it were the last vote of his life he would not vote in favor of it, as he was convinced that it would lead to disturbance and bloodshed.

Mr. Lumpkin stated that he had, at various times, communicated with the executive on this subject, and had never expressed but one opinion; which was, that it was the best that could be done for the Cherokees to execute the treaty; which was beneficent in its operation, and provided equally alike for the rich and the poor. Mr. L. expressed much regret at what he deemed the mistakes and misrepresentations on this subject. He had seen what he considered a garbled statement in the National Intelligencer of this morning, designed, as he supposed, to prevent the Cherokees from being removed. But these people would be removed; they had murdered lately the surveyor general, (of Georgia,) and nothing could prevent their immediate removal, according to the treaty. It was, therefore, immaterial what should be done with this paper.

Mr. King said his whole object in moving to lay this document on the table was, that they might look at it. But he was content that it should be referred. He expressed deep regret at the course which had been pursued in relation to the Cherokees. He felt confident, however, that the object was a good one, and that it was the desire of the Secretary, in drawing this paper, to conciliate those who would not be conciliated. Mr. K. was apprehensive that the delay proposed would be disastrous; but he was willing to give a little additional time for the removal, for the sole reason that the Cherokees had been grossly deceived by those who held up to them the hope of remaining. This had prevented them from making the necessary arrangements to remove.

Mr. Cuthbert expressed great surprise that a paper of this kind had been sent to Congress; and he thought it extraordinary that it should be proposed that the question of delay should be referred to the states interested at the very time when the removal was to be consummated. He recommended it to Mr. Webster and his constituents not to give too much weight to this document, and he insisted that if the execution of the treaty should be delayed, the result could not be otherwise than unfortunate and disastrous.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said he concurred entirely in the views of Mr. Cuthbert. They knew how excitements could be got up for party and political effect. They had had much experience on this point in relation to the abolition of slavery.

Mr. Webster disclaimed for himself and his constituents all party and political views on this subject. He represented it as a matter of conscience with people of high intelligence and moral character, who felt that wrong had been done to the Cherokees.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, was understood to admit the benevolent motives of the remonstrants, and expressed his desire that the treaty should be carried into effect with all kindness to the Cherokees. He concurred with his colleague that the document should lie on the table for the present, for the purpose of examining it for further consideration; and with this view,

Mr. Webster withdrew his motion to refer the document.

Mr. Cuthbert spoke with a good deal of earnestness and some apparent indignation, that this should be considered a matter of conscience by those whose ancestors had murdered and destroyed the aborigines where they settled.

Mr. Preston said he had heard the message from the president, proposing new arrangements with the Cherokees, with unfeigned surprise and regret. He had hoped that this painful and complicated matter had been finally put at rest, by a determination on the part of the government to go on with a slow, cautious, but steady pace, in the course prescribed to it by necessity. The Cherokee treaty was, in his judgment, wisely and humanely ratified. The same wisdom and humanity demand that, as far as the removal of the Indians is involved, it should be firmly carried into effect. Hesitancy and further agitation can produce nothing but ill. The rights of the states and of their citizens have been recognized and established, and should not again be disturbed. On this matter gentlemen from the states interested are entitled to lead. They know best what is best for them. I shall acquiesce in what they suggest. Nothing but my deference for them prevents me from at once moving to lay this message on the table, for the purpose of trying the sense of the senate as to its farther discussion. The execution of the treaty is intrusted to a gallant officer, not less distinguished by his moderation and discretion than by his bravery and military skill. Whatever humanity and prudence exact may be expected at his hands. The Indians must go; any interference here endangers them. As to money, lands, &c. give them as much as you choose, but do not further suspend the just claims of the states, or further irritate their already exasperated feelings. I hope the gentlemen interested will not permit the proposition for postponement to be drawn into discussion, but that they will put an end to it by a motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. Cuthbert stated, as a reason for the language he had already used, that Georgia had already patiently delayed two years longer than ought to have been required of them. Mr. Webster said he should not reply to the local remarks of Mr. Cuthbert. The wrongs done to the Indians by our ancestors were numerous enough, but Mr. W. looked only to present action on the subject. Mr. Calhoun spoke in favor of referring the document to a committee, with a view to the disposal of it in the most satisfactory manner to all parties. After a few more remarks by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, and Mr. Cuthbert, the document was laid on the table.

Mr. Tipton moved to take up the Cumberland Road bill; and, on this motion, an earnest conversation ensued by Messrs. Tipton, Smith, of Ia., and Young, in favor of taking up this bill, and by Mr. Roane in favor of considering District affairs; which resulted in taking up the Alexandria and Falmouth railroad bill.

The amendments, from the committee, to this bill occupied the attention of the senate during the most part of the day.

The principal amendment from the committee was the one making the appropriation to construct the road in the District of Columbia, on the condition that the company should carry the mail for a reasonable compensation, to be determined by arbitration, if the parties could not agree.

Mr. King moved to amend this amendment, by requiring the company to carry the mail for the sole consideration of the $300,000 which the committee proposed to appropriate for the construction of the road.

This amendment was advocated by Messrs. King and Strange, and opposed by Messrs. Roane, Hubbard, and Niles; and it was agreed to—Ayes 18, noes 13.

The amendment from the committee, so amended, was then agreed to as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, Webster, Wright, Young—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay, of Ala., Hubbard, Niles, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Swift, Tipton—9.

On motion of Mr. Roane, the blank for the appropriation for the construction of the road was filled with $300,000 by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay, of Ky., Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, King, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, Webster—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Grundy, Hubbard, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Swift, Tipton, Wright, Young—18.

A proposition by Mr. Hubbard, to take the $300,000 from the post office funds, was rejected: Ayes 10, noes not counted.

After the adoption of some minor amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Webster—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Hubbard, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Ruggles, Smith, of Conn., Swift, Tipton, Wright, Young—17.

The senate then adjourned.

May 23. After some business of minor importance had been transacted, Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose, and said he supposed that orders had been issued from the post office and treasury departments to receive for government dues the notes of specie-paying banks, or at least that they were actually received, and he wanted to ascertain precisely the facts of the case, whatever they might be. With that view, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury and the postmaster general severally inform the senate whether any orders have been given from their departments to receive the notes of banks for revenue, and, if any what were those orders; and if any instructions have been given, that they communicate to the senate what were those instructions.

Mr. Wright said he would correct the senator in regard to one fact. He had understood him to say that orders had been given for the receipt of these notes: but it had not been so stated. The information given here was, that the notes were received. But Mr. W. had inquired lately at the departments on the subject, and no orders to receive them had then been issued.

Mr. Clay said it was not his intention to say any thing more than to intimate the fact that they were received. He meant to say nothing of the forms or technicalities of the subject; but he took it for granted, if these notes were received, it was done in accordance with some authority. But, whatever were the facts, he wished to know them, and by what authority.

The resolution was agreed to without dissent.

The Vice President presented a message from the president of the United States on the subject of the northeastern boundary, with copies of a letter addressed to him by the governor of Maine, covering certain resolutions of the legislature of Maine in relation to this subject and the claims of three individuals. Also, copies of a correspondence on this subject with Mr. Fox, the British minister.

The message and correspondence were read, from which it appeared that the state of Maine insisted on carrying into effect the treaty of 1783 on this subject, and asked for a new joint commission of exploration and survey, to determine the lines described in that treaty. It also appeared that the British minister did not feel authorized to enter into the arrangement proposed, but had referred the subject to the government of England.

Mr. Webster said that this was a very important communication, and he wished an opportunity to examine and consider it. It would seem said Mr. Webster, that a new convention between the two countries was agreed on, to be entered into as soon as competent authority should be obtained, by which a joint commission of exploration and survey is to be appointed. There is no particular objection, perhaps, against a joint survey of the treaty line, except the delay and loss of time. This may be very injurious. But, then, this is not all. The offer of a joint survey, made by our government, is accepted by England with certain modifications. What are these modifications? They are contained in the British minister's note of the 10th of January. That note is not now before me, and I do not, at this moment, recollect precisely all the modifications; in other words, all the conditions on which England agrees to run the line. These points require very close examination. It is our duty to see that no just right be waived or abandoned, in agreeing to these modifications. I am fearful that some of them will prove highly prejudicial to the rights of the United States and of Maine. I desire an opportunity to look carefully at this part of the case, and, therefore, will now move that the message and papers be printed and laid on the table. As I remember the proposed modifications, some of them are such as I cannot believe ought to be acceded to; indeed, I fear that they cannot be acceded to, without giving up the question. This is what I fear; but in the hope that it may not prove so, I wish time to examine the correspondence. I confess I feel great apprehension as to the result of this proposed new convention.

Mr. Davis said in his opinion this was not a question which could be decided by the instruments of engineers or surveyors, nor could their skill throw much light upon it. It was a question to be decided by the terms of the treaty, and other evidence collateral to it. For himself, therefore, he did not hope much from an agreement to explore, as his impression was it would substantially leave matters where they are. The controversy arose mainly on the inquiry—where is the northwest angle of Nova Scotia? He could entertain no doubt as to this, for the treaty designated it accurately. He meant, however, now only to say he did not hope much from exploration, as it appeared to him the results could as well be seen now as after the labor was performed.

The message and documents were laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The senate took up, on its third reading, the bill to incorporate the Falmouth and Alexandria Rail Road Company, and for other purposes, which was, after a brief discussion, in which Messrs. Hubbard, Morris, and Clay, of Ala., opposed the bill, and Messrs. Roane and Davis advocated it, passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, King, Linn, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, Webster—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Smith, of Conn., Swift, Tipton, Wright, Young—17.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

This bill was mainly but briefly advocated by Mr. Tipton, and with various amendments proposed, further discussed by Messrs. Norvell, Benton, Wright, Smith, of Indiana, Morris, Niles, Buchanan, Smith, of Connecticut, Merrick, Tipton, Robinson, and Preston.

Mr. Norvell offered an amendment, which was understood to confine the appropriations to the 2 per cent. fund granted for the purpose of roads to the states respectively.

This amendment was lost: Yeas 12, nays 29.

Mr. Benton offered an amendment requiring that the appropriations of this bill should be subject to all the limitations, restrictions, &c. contained in the act relating to roads, approved March 3, 1837. [What these limitations, &c. were, did not appear.]

This amendment was agreed to: Yeas 27, nays 15.

Mr. Niles moved to amend the bill by striking out that part relating to a bridge in Pennsylvania. Negatived: Yeas 11, nays not counted.

Mr. Hubbard, with a view proportionally to reduce all the appropriations, moved to reduce the appropriation for Ohio from $150,000 to $100,000. This motion was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robinson, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright, Young—23.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Ind., Spence, Swift, Tipton, Webster, Wright, Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange, Trotter, Williams—17.

Mr. Hubbard gave notice that, as soon as the general navy appropriation bill was disposed of, he would call up the resolution introduced by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, prohibiting discrimination in the kinds of money received as revenue, and authorizing the public receipts and payments in the notes of sound, specie-paying banks.

The bill for the relief of Matthew Arbuckle was considered, amended, on motion of Mr. Sevier, by a substitute for the bill authorizing, generally, the entry at the government price of lands in Arkansas, covered by the alleged, but unconfirmed, French or Spanish claims; and the bill in this form was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 18. After Mr. Henry had, by leave, presented the petition of William McMillen, who was a lieutenant in the revolutionary war, praying commutation in consequence of his services to the end of the war,

Mr. Russell, asked leave again to offer his resolution rescinding so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed the 28d of June, 1836, as prohibits receiving in payment for dues to the government, and disbursing the same, the bills of specie-paying banks which issue notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars; and also, so much of the second section of the act entitled "an act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836, as prohibits the offering in payment by any officer or department of the government the notes or bills of specie-paying banks of a less denomination than twenty dollars."

[*Misprinted ten dollars heretofore.]

Objection being made by Mr. Yell, Mr. Cushman, and others,

Mr. Russell moved to suspend the rules to enable him to make his motion, and demanded the yeas and nays on the question of suspension.

It appeared, on counting the house, that no quorum was present.

Mr. Russell, at the request of Mr. Whitlesey, consented to withdraw his motion for the present.

On motion of Mr. Briggs, the house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Boon in the chair), on the senate's bill for the relief of Hard and Longstreet, which was advocated by Mr. Elmore, amended, on motion of Mr. Whitlesey, reported to the house, read a third time, and passed.

A number of reports on private claims were presented, among which are the following:

Mr. Bell, from the committee on Indian affairs, laid before the house sundry papers communicated to that committee by the secretary of war, touching certain claims of Creek Indians and Choctaw Indians.

Also, certain papers communicated to that committee from the secretary of war, in relation to the claim of William M. Graham, for services as acting Indian agent in Florida, and for indemnification of expenses which that situation compelled him to incur.

Mr. Cushman, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill further to provide for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign countries.

Mr. Underwood, from the committee on revolutionary claims, reported a bill for the payment of certain judgments which have been, or may be, obtained, against the state of Virginia.

On motion of Mr. McKay,

Ordered, That the committee on military affairs be discharged from the consideration of the resolution of the house of the 16th April last, relative to confining the instruction hereafter to be given at the military academy at West Point exclusively to the elements and practice of civil and military engineering, and that the same do lie on the table.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported against the petition of A. M. Caldwell; and also against a resolution of the house of December 14, 1837, relative to the placing of cannon, carriages, &c. with the governor of Missouri, for the use of said state. Also, against a resolution of the house of the 19th of March last, relative to the erection of an arsenal in Lincoln county, North Carolina.

Mr. Morgan, from the committee on revolutionary pensions, reported a bill to establish a pension agency at McMinnville, in the state of Tennessee; which bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. Morgan, from the same committee, reported, without amendment, senate bill to establish a pension agency at Montpelier, in the state of Vermont.

Mr. Lincoln from the committee on the public buildings and grounds, reported a bill making appropriations for certain repairs and improvements upon the public buildings and grounds, and for other purposes.

Mr. Montgomery, from the committee on the post office and post roads, reported a bill to regulate the postage on letters, and for other purposes; to which bill Mr. Hall, of Vermont, offered an additional section, by way of amendment, to come up when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. Sergeant inquired of Mr. Lincoln when it was the intention of the committee on the public buildings to call up the consideration of the bill respecting the removal of the new treasury building, and the erection of a new post office? He said that he had been frequently asked the question, with much solicitude, by persons who were deeply interested in it. Many respectable mechanics had been invited here to be employed on that building, who were now thrown out of employment, and in a state of suspense. They had, in some cases, families here, who were dependent on them for support.

Mr. Lincoln stated that, since the bill had been last before the house, the president of the United States had put the subject in commission, having assigned it to the secretaries of state, of war, and of the treasury. These commissioners had written to him, (Mr. L.) urging the propriety of an early attention to the bill, and on the same ground now stated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. The committee had thereupon directed him to offer a resolution, which he should presently ask leave of the house to present.

Mr. Lincoln soon after asked to have the following resolution read:

Resolved, That the house will at twelve o'clock this day go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of bill No. 706, providing for the removal of the walls of the treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department.

The Speaker stated that he had had for some days in his possession a memorial from a number of mechanics on this subject, but had not had an opportunity to present it. Mr. Sergeant moved that the memorial referred to by the speaker be now read, by leave. Mr. Yell objected, and the house did not order it. On the adoption of the resolution moved by Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Yell demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 70, nays 90. So the resolution was rejected. Mr. Cambreleng pressed a motion to dispense with the private bills, and go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, in order, to take up a money bill. He stated that drafts to the amount of $600,000, on the quartermaster's department, lay over for want of the action of congress. The motion did not prevail.

Mr. Cambreleng gave notice that he should renew the motion on Monday next.

The house then proceeded to the consideration of private bills, in committee of the whole, Mr. Atherton in the chair; after remaining in committee for some time, rose and reported progress upon a number of bills, some of which were ordered to be engrossed. The committee also reported amendments to a number of bills from the senate, but without acting further upon them. Adjourned.

Saturday, May 19. The honorable Linn Banks, member elect from the state of Virginia, in the place of Mr. Patton, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. Allen, of Ohio, asked leave to submit a resolution for a post route.

Mr. Craig had not the slightest objection to the gentleman's resolution, but he must object to its putting aside other business, unless he and others could have a similar indulgence.

Mr. Cambreleng laid before the house a communication from the acting secretary of war, enclosing several communications from the acting quartermaster general, showing the pressing want of the appropriation for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, in order to carry on with efficiency the military operations concerted, and those now in progress. Among these was a letter from the acting quartermaster general, under date of April 25, 1838, which says:

"I have not been able to make a single remittance of any consequence for the suppression of Indian hostilities for the last ten weeks, though the expenditures through this department have heretofore averaged full three hundred thousand dollars."

Another letter from the same officer, dated May 15th, 1838, says: "I regret very much that it was deemed advisable to propose the appropriation in the same minute detail which was attempted in the estimate, instead of embracing all the objects of supply, and services due from the quartermaster's department, in the same amount, under one general head, while I am quite sure that the aggregate called for is not more than will be required. Some of the items will, no doubt, fall short, and others exceed, the wants of the service, since it is impossible to estimate the expenditures for armies engaged in active operations in the field, under each separate head, with sufficient accuracy for detailed appropriations. In that enactment inconvenience will be experienced, unless power be vested in the executive to transfer from one item to another, which I would respectfully suggest, if the present form of the bill be retained. I would also suggest the following modifications of the several items, without affecting the aggregate amount:

1st. For forage, say	$400,000
2d. For freight, or transportation of supplies to the places of operation	350,000
3d. For wagons, carts, &c.	150,000
4th. For transportation of supplies from the depots to the points of consumption	700,000
5th. For hire of mechanics, laborers, drivers, &c.	250,000
6th. For transportation, &c. of volunteers	100,000
7th. For miscellaneous and contingent charges	750,000
8th. For drafts and arrearages	1,048,600

Total, corresponding with the estimate of the 17th of March, and the bill No. 676 of the house of representatives - $3,748,600

Mr. Lincoln, from the committee on public buildings and grounds, reported the following resolution, which was disagreed to by the house:

"Resolved, That the house will go into committee of the whole on the state of the union on Monday next, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of bill No. 706, to provide for removing the walls of the treasury building, and for the erection of a fire-proof building for the post office department."

Mr. Yell and Mr. Cambreleng simultaneously asked for the yeas and nays; which, being ordered, were: Yeas 67, nays 77; and so the resolution was rejected.

Mr. Russell again asked leave to offer the resolution presented to the house on Thursday, to repeal the small note restriction.

Objection being made, Mr. R. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays, which, being ordered, were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Allen, Aycrigg, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Wm. B. Calhoun, Childs, Clark, Coffin, Corwin, Crockett, Davies, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Rice Garland, Goode, Hall, Harlan, Henry, Lincoln, Maxwell, Mitchell, Noyes, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stone, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Yorke—51.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, J. W. Allen, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Boon, Buchanan, Cambreleng, Casey, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Crary, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Foster, Gallup, James Garland, William Graham, Grantland, Grant, Gray, Griffin, Haley, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, J. Johnson, William Cost Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Logan, J. M. Mason, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Potter, Prentiss, Reily, Rives, Robertson, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, T. T. Whittlesey, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, J. L. Williams, Yell—101.

So the house refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. Boon then made a similar motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to rescind the specie circular, and, for the first time, he said, asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. B. explained, in order that the house might vote understandingly, that it was not his intention to press the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Williams, to instruct the committee of ways and means to bring in a bill on the subject,) but to present his own (a joint one and direct) as a substitute. [Mr. Williams stated, some days ago, that he would accept Mr. Boon's as a modification of his own, should the rules be suspended.]

On the motion to suspend the rules, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Aycrigg, Bell, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, Buchanan, Wm. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, J. Campbell, William B. Carter, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Cleveland, Coffin, Corwin, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Foster, Gallup, J. Garland, R. Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Henry, Herod, R. M. T. Hunter, J. Jackson, W. C. Johnson, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Marvin, J. M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Patterson, Pierce, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Augustin H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, J. L. Williams, Wise, Yell, Yorke—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Brodhead, Cambreleng, Chapman, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, I. Fletcher, Fry, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Logan, Loomis, Martin, McKay, Abraham McClellan, McClure, Murray, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Potter, Prentiss, Reilly, Rives, Sawyer, Sheffer, C. Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Toucey, Turney, Wagener, Webster, J. W. Williams—68.

The Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the annual statement of commerce and navigation between the United States and foreign countries in the year ending the 30th September, 1837; to which are added, also, certain statements respecting the tonnage of the United States for the year ending at the same time.

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, moved to print 10,000 extra copies. Mr. Harlan hoped the gentleman would limit the number to 5,000, which he thought amply sufficient. Mr. Whittlesey replied that 10,000 was the usual number heretofore printed, and added that he knew of no document of more general interest or intrinsic value, as well to the west as the east.

Mr. Adams said he supposed the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Harlan) was in the predicament of a certain king of Bohemia, who complained that he had no seaports in his dominions, and, therefore, that he (Mr. H.) could not appreciate the vast importance of this document, which, to the people of the Atlantic states, was of very great importance. Mr. A. hoped, therefore, that the motion for 10,000 would prevail.

The motion did prevail, and 10,000 copies were accordingly ordered to be printed.

The bill to establish a pension agency at McMinnville, in the State of Tennessee, was taken up on its passage; it was, after a brief debate, in which the bill was opposed by Messrs. Underwood and McKay, and advocated by Messrs. Morgan, Shields, and Turney, rejected—yeas 44, noes 89.

Mr. Southgate moved to reconsider this vote. The motion was entered on the journal.

The house took up and considered several private bills reported yesterday by the committee of the whole.

The bill for the relief of the administrators of Wharton Quarles, deceased, was passed, without debate or division.

The senate bill, No. 58, for the relief of the representatives of John Jordan, deceased, was considered, and the yeas and nays were demanded on the passage of the bill, by Mr. Allen, of Vermont. On ordering the yeas and nays, the division was 19, 82. No quorum. The debate was, notwithstanding, still further protracted, the main objection to the bill being that Jordan, as an artillery artificer, was not entitled to the commutation pay provided by the bill under consideration, to be paid to his representatives. After some further discussion of this point, the yeas and nays were again demanded, and no quorum found to be present.

Mr. Allen then moved an adjournment. Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, demanded the yeas and nays. Ordered—14, 47, (one-fifth necessary.) And the house decided not to adjourn, by the following vote: Yeas 46, nays 56. Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, as there was no quorum present, demanded a call of the house. Relused—Yeas 40, nays 47. No quorum voting. Mr. Potts moved that the house adjourn; which motion prevailed, and the house adjourned.

Monday, May 21. The states being called in order for the presentation of petitions, a large number were presented, which we shall notice hereafter.

By leave of the house, Mr. Boon stated that he had had a consultation with Mr. Sherrod Williams upon the subject of the currency resolution, which he (Mr. B.) had several times moved to take up and consider. Mr. W. had given him some assurance that he was willing so to modify his resolution as to make it acceptable to himself as a substitute for the one he had offered, and which he wished to have acted on. But the result of that consultation had been unsuccessful, Mr. W. refusing so to modify his proposition as to make it acceptable to Mr. B. as a substitute for his own. He (Mr. B.) had no other alternative left him but to resume his seat.

The committees being about to be called for reports, Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, generally. Mr. R. Garland moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and take up the senate pre-emption bill. The Chair said that it would be for the committee to decide what bills they would take up. Mr. R. Garland then gave notice that, if the house went into committee of the whole, as proposed, he should move to take up first the bill he had named. Mr. Whittlesey hoped the committees would be called for reports. Mr. Cambreleng said that that could be done every morning, and the public business required immediate attention. Mr. Cushing asked what effect this motion, if it prevailed, would have upon the northwestern territory question, then under discussion during the morning hour? The Chair said it would come up to-morrow in order. Mr. Everett asked if the chairman of the committee of ways and means intended to take up the Indian appropriation bill in committee to-day? Mr. Cambreleng responded in the affirmative. Mr. Everett intended to propose an amendment to that bill, the effect of which, he hoped, would be to settle the Cherokee difficulty. He hoped that bill would not be taken up to-day. The Speaker asked if there was any objection to the motion of the chairman of the committee of ways and means? Mr. Everett objected on the grounds he had stated. The Chair was about to commence the call for reports, when Mr. Cambreleng moved a suspension of the rule, for the purpose of offering the motion above made. Mr. Boon demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Mr. Petrikin demanded a call of the house. Not ordered. The motion to suspend the rules prevailed by the following vote: Yeas 106, nays 37. And the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Howard in the chair.)

Mr. Cambreleng moved to take up the Indian appropriation bill. Mr. Rice Garland moved to take up the senate pre-emption bill. And the question being put upon the first of these motions, no quorum voted. The Chair ordered another count, (by tellers,) and the question upon taking up the bill to suppress Indian hostilities for the year 1833, was again put, but no quorum voted. and a third count (by tellers) was ordered; and, no quorum voting, the committee rose, and reported the fact to the house. Mr. Whittlesey hoped that the chairman of the committee of ways and means would allow the business of the house to proceed as on the calendar. Mr. Petrikin asked if the house could do business without a quorum? The Chair responded in the negative, and proceeded to count the house 133 members being within the bar, the chairman of the committee of the whole resumed the chair. The bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities was then taken up and considered.

Mr. Cambreleng had felt embarrassed to know whether to make a speech or not, upon this subject. He had concluded to make none. This was an important bill, demanding immediate action. There was now a prospect of the close of this disastrous war. There were many protested bills yet to be paid for the suppression of Florida Indian hostilities. The bill, moreover, provided for the maintenance of peace and quiet in the Cherokee country.

Mr. C. then proposed an amendment, reducing some of the proposed appropriations, and sent to the chair some official and executive documents upon the subject; which were read.

Mr. Everett stated that, at the proper time, he should offer a proposition to amend the bill by adding the following:

For the payment to the Cherokee nation, after their emigration, the sum stipulated in the 1st article of the treaty of 29th December, 1835, deducting $500,000 under the 2d article, and $400,000 invested under the 10th article - $4,100,000
Provided, the Cherokee nation assent to receive it.

To enable the president to re-purchase the lands ceded by the 2d article of said treaty - 500,000

For payments to the Cherokee nation for the benefit of the Cherokees who have not taken the benefit of said treaty—

1. For compensation in full for all claims for their improvements - 2,250,000
2. For compensation for personal property which may be abandoned, not provided for by said treaty - 750,000
3. For compensation for apollations in full - 300,000
4. For commutation for claims for pensions under the 14th article - 50,000

Provided, that no part of the appropriations in this article shall be expended, unless a majority of such Cherokees shall have emigrated west of the Mississippi by the 1st of January next; nor until the said Cherokee nation east shall have agreed so to receive said sums in full for said claims.

- For compensation to such Cherokees as shall emigrate at their own expense, by 1st January next, at $33 1-3 per head, (15,000 Cherokees) - 500,000
For subsistence, extended to 18 months, to such emigrants, $50 per head, (15,000 Cherokees) - 750,000

Mr. Bell proposed the following amendment:

"Provided, that if the president shall ascertain that all dissatisfaction and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of 1835, can be allayed or avoided by allowing an additional compensation for lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that thereby the government may be saved the expense of keeping up the large military force within the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of dollars of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

The amendment of Mr. Cambreleng, above alluded to, was adopted. Mr. Wise moved that the committee rise. Ordered. Mr. Everett moved that the bill, with all the proposed amendments, be printed. Carried.

Senate bills for the relief of James Witherall, and for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Thomas Carter, deceased, were severally read the third time and passed.

The senate bill to repeal certain provisos of an act "to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," approved the 14th day of July, 1832, was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

The bill adding another judge to this court, came up on its third reading, as proposed to be amended by the committee for the District of Columbia, so as to make the term of office of the proposed judge, four years, instead of for life, as proposed in the bill. A brief discussion ensued on the proposition, after which the question was taken on the amendment. Mr. Petrikin asked for the yeas and nays on the question of ordering the bill to a third reading. Not ordered. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day; and, being so read, was passed. So the original bill, as it came from the senate, was passed. And then, on motion, the house adjourned.

In order to make room for the debate between Messrs. Clay and Calhoun, and the documents submitted to congress in relation to the treaty with the Cherokees, we are reluctantly compelled to postpone further details of the proceedings of both houses until our next. The following summary, however, comprises all business of interest.

In the senate on Thursday, the Vice President presented a communication from the treasury department, in pursuance of a resolution recently offered by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, in relation to the receipt of bank notes for revenue. The communication was read, and was understood to state that no new orders had been given on the subject, and that the receipt of bank notes was a consequence of previous orders, and of the resumption of specie payments by certain banks. The communication was accompanied by a copy of a letter from the department to public officers at New York, dated April 23, 1833, which was read, and which was understood to sanction the receipt of specie-paying bank notes from banks not issuing notes of less than $5, according to orders and instructions given previous to the suspension of specie payments.

Mr. Clay moved that this communication be laid on the table and printed. He said he did not know whether this would furnish the occasion making it necessary for further inquiry of the secretary of the treasury, in order to know whether further instructions had been given to any of the collectors. The fact had now appeared that they did receive at New York, the notes of specie-paying banks; and Mr. C. was understood to say that he had a letter in his drawer informing him that, on resumption, the notes of specie paying banks were to be received and disbursed in payment of the public dues.

The communication was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. White the message of the president, and the communication of the secretary of war, in relation to the removal of the Cherokees, was referred to the committee on Indian affairs. The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road was passed by a vote of 23 to 18,—it was then sent to the house and subsequently returned with an amendment, in which the senate concurred. Some time was spent in considering the bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1833, but, without coming to a decision upon it, the senate, after an executive session, adjourned.

In the senate, yesterday, the navy appropriation bill was passed, after the rejection of a proposition, made yesterday, by Mr. Crittenden, to strike out the appropriation for the exploring expedition.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate took up the joint resolution offered by Mr. Clay, of Ky., providing that no discrimination shall be made as to the currency, or medium of payment in the several branches of the public revenue, or in debts or dues to the government, &c., when Mr. Webster, (Mr. Clay assenting,) offered the amendment before proposed to be offered by him, as follows:

Strike out the first clause of the resolution after the enacting clause, and insert, That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make, or to continue in force, a ny general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the funds or medium of payment, in which debts or dues, accruing to the United States, may be paid.

Mr. Clay, of Ky., expressed his indifference as to which form of the resolution should prevail, but argued at some length in support of the objects to be accomplished by it. Mr. Benton spoke at great length in favor of the specie circular, and against Mr. Clay's resolution. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, asked the unanimous consent of the senate so to modify his resolution as to make Mr. Webster's amendment a part of it, and to strike out the words "and shall be subsequently disbursed (the bank notes) in a course of public expenditure, to all public creditors who were willing to receive them." This omission Mr. C. had found would render the resolution more acceptable to some senators, and he did not regard the clause as specially important.

Mr. Calhoun objecting, the modification could not be made. Mr. Morris spoke with great decision in favor of the specie circular in its operations, past, present, and to come, and moved an adjournment. Negatived—Yeas 19, nays 20. On the suggestion of Mr. Morris, Mr. Webster modified his amendment by striking out "funds," and inserting money.

Mr. W.'s amendment, so modified, was then adopted, without dissent. Mr. Clay moved to strike out the words quoted above, requiring bank notes to be paid to those who were willing to receive them. On the call of Mr. Wright, the yeas and nays were ordered; who also signified his design to move to strike out the whole remaining part of the latter clause of the resolution relating to the receiving of bank notes.

On this a debate followed, in which Messrs. Wright, King, Clay, of Ky., Calhoun, Cuthbert, Morris, and Buchanan participated; and without any further action on the subject, the senate adjourned.

The house of representatives on Tuesday was chiefly occupied on the question of referring the message of the president, and the communication of the secretary of war, in reference to the treaty with the Cherokees, inserted in this day's proceedings of the senate. It caused a very animated, but desultory debate—finally, it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On Wednesday considerable time was devoted to the consideration, in committee of the whole, to the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities; but, before the discussion was concluded, the committee rose, and the house adjourned.

On Thursday, a call of the house having been ordered, a motion of Mr. Garland, of La., whose object was to ascertain where were the ten o'clock men, and having been proceeded in until it was ascertained that 133 members were present, the call was suspended.

Mr. Hoffman then rose, and called the attention of the house to the fact that a very exceptional document had been ordered to be printed, and was yesterday laid on the table. He referred to a message of the president of the United States enclosing communications from the secretaries of state and the treasury, in reply to a resolution of inquiry, adopted on the 30th April, 1833, calling for information as to the extent to which the deportation of foreign paupers to this country had been carried on. That document contained two extracts from the New York "Truth-Teller," in which there was nothing at all pertinent to the subject of inquiry, but which consisted of anonymous and violent denunciations of the mayor and city council of the city of New York. Mr. H. commenced, in strong terms, upon the extracts in question, and expressed his opinion that it was a mistake to which the president could not have been a party. He concluded his remarks, which shall be inserted hereafter, by expressing his intention to offer, at the proper time, a resolution, discharging the select committee, to whom the message and reports from the secretaries of state and the treasury, on the subject of the importation of foreign paupers, from the consideration of the extracts referred to, and that they be returned to the president. He then moved that the resolution be made. Mr. Beatty objected to the reception of the resolution at this time. Mr. Hoffman moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it. This notice caused considerable discussion; but the house refused to suspend the rules. Mr. Thomson then offered a resolution requesting the president to inform the house whether the extracts were communicated to the house by his direction, which, being objected to, he moved a suspension of the rules. Lost. Several reports having been received from committees, the house went into committee of the whole, and took up the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities. After sometime spent therein the committee rose, and had leave to sit again. The house next took up, and concurred in the senate's amendment to the Cumberland road bill, and then adjourned.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 14.—Vol. IV.]

WASHINGTON CITY, JUNE 2, 1838.

[Vol. LIV.—Whole No. 1,392.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

THE SPECIE CIRCULAR. A joint resolution, virtually repealing the specie circular of July, 1836, has passed both houses of congress by large majorities, and, having been signed by the president, is now a law of the land. In pursuance of that law the secretary of the treasury has addressed the circular, inserted below, to the collectors and receivers of public money:

CIRCULAR FROM THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

To all collectors and receivers of public money:

Treasury department, June 1, 1838.

By a resolution, passed the 31st ultimo, congress has declared "That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make or to continue in force, any general order, which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues, accruing to the United States, may be paid."

To carry this resolution into effect, it has become necessary to issue new instructions to collectors and receivers of public money.

By the present laws specie and treasury notes alone are expressly made receivable for all kinds of public dues, and you will of course continue to take them till otherwise instructed.

A circular was issued under the direction of the president of the United States, on the 11th of July, 1836, which, after a certain period prohibited any currency from being taken in payment of the public lands except specie—no authority for the issue of treasury notes being then in existence.

This circular did not order any different medium to be taken for duties—yet, the various reasons contained in it were not applicable to the revenue from customs, and a practice had existed before and has been continued since, to receive bank notes of a certain character in payment of duties.

In this condition of things, and without any new legislation, either to extend the provisions of that circular to every branch of the revenue, or to abolish the practice of taking bank notes for any branch of it, congress directed, by the resolution above quoted, that no difference or discrimination shall be created or continued in force by any general order emanating from this department. It has thus been made the imperative duty of the secretary of the treasury, either to require the collection of the whole revenue, in all its branches, in gold, or silver, or treasury notes, or to permit, under such restrictions as the existing laws impose, and as the safety of the public money may seem to require, the acceptance of bank notes, for lands sold as well as for other public dues.

However desirable it may be on some accounts, that the receipts and payments of the general government shall be in the currency provided in the constitution, and however inexpedient it may be to give undue encouragement to a different currency, which by its fluctuations in quantity and value often renders the wages of labor uncertain, gives instability to the value of property, and thus enables the artful to accumulate wealth at the expense of the unwary, it is not believed that this department can find a sufficient warrant in the proceedings of congress, or in the public opinion, to justify the sudden and total exclusion at this time of the notes of specie paying banks from reception for public dues of every description.

Important changes have also taken place since July, 1836, in the condition of the banks and of business generally, which have diminished the necessity for unusual checks on excesses and overactions.

Influenced by these considerations, and by a desire to accommodate the public debtors as far as compatible with the restrictions of law and the safety of the pecuniary interests committed to my care, I feel bound to enforce the uniformity now required, by availing myself of the permission given in the resolution of 1816, to receive the notes of bank, and by extending, under suitable limitations, the receipt of such notes equally to all branches of the public revenue.

The limitations as to the character of the notes receivable, will be such as are required by express laws, or by necessary implication. Some of these limitations have always, except at one brief interval, been adopted in practice since the formation of the constitution, and are deemed essential to maintain a sound currency, so indispensable to the prosperity of trade and a healthy state of public morals. Others have been introduced more recently to promote fiscal convenience, the public security, and an equal standard of value.

1st. You will in conformity to the obvious intent of the resolution of 1816, take such bank notes only as are "payable, and paid on demand, in the legal currency of the United States."

2d. You will receive none of a less denomination than twenty dollars; the reception of all smaller denominations being virtually prohibited by the second section of the act of April 14th, 1833, which forbids their being paid out to any creditor of the United States. Though smaller notes offered for duties could, from the nearness of banks in most seaports, be taken, and easily exchanged before making payments, yet, from the remoteness of many land offices from banks, this could not be effected there without much delay and expense; and as uniformity is now required, the provision must be made general.

3d. Nor will you accept bank notes of any denomination, unless the same be "payable, on demand, in gold and silver coin, at the place where issued," and equivalent to specie at the place where received, as is substantially required by the last mentioned act in respect to payments. These requirements can, in the opinion of the department, be enforced with greater certainty, and unnecessary risk and loss more surely avoided, by confining the receipt, as has been the usage at some former periods, to the notes of banks situated within your state, and in the adjoining state. The credit of these notes can usually be best known—counterfeits of them more easily detected—and specie obtained for them with less delay when it is wanted for public purposes.

4th. You will not take the notes of any bank which, since the 4th of July, 1836, has issued "any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars;" the notes of all such banks being expressly excluded by the eighth section of the act of the 23d June, 1836.

Great care will be expected from you in carrying into effect this, and all former circulars still in force; and particularly is it enjoined that receivers be vigilant to furnish every facility to the registers for making the monthly examinations, recently required, of the funds and vouchers on hand, and to guard against the imposition upon the land offices of bank notes not safe or equivalent to specie, and not well known to be receivable, according to the spirit of these instructions, and the manifest intentions of the acts of congress, which they are designed to enforce.

Respectfully,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

OFFICIAL—TREASURY NOTES.

Treasury department, June 1, 1838.

The whole amount of treasury notes authorized by the act of 12th of October, 1837, has been issued by the treasurer, viz: $10,000,000

Of that amount there has been returned to the treasury for duties and lands, and in payment of debts to the United States, about 6,000,000

Leaving $4,000,000

The treasury notes issued up to this day under the provisions of the act of 31st May, 1833, amount to $300,307 25.

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the treasury.

The "Richmond Enquirer" of yesterday, after congratulating its readers on the passage of the resolution rescinding the specie circular, says—"the resolution, upon the face of it, only does away the discrimination between the monies to be received for public lands and customs; but in point of fact, it will supersede the call for specie in the payment of the public lands—as it is sufficiently obvious, at present, the secretary of the treasury will not resort to a general requisition for specie. The resolution was voted for accordingly on that principle.

There can be little doubt, this measure will smooth the way to the resumption of specie payments by the western, northwestern, and southwestern banks. The Detroit banks complain that their resumption is embarrassed by the specie circular, which drains the banks there to buy lands. This complaint will now be removed—and a new impulse will be communicated to the recuperative energies of all the solvent western banks.

NEW YORK MONEY MARKET. The New York Gazette of Thursday, says: "Exchange on England is getting up. Prime bills on London are held at 8 per cent. The Sampson and Orpheus, which arrived yesterday, brought a large amount of specie; and, as our last dates from England informed that accounts had been received from New York of the fall of exchange to 4 1-2 per cent., we may expect still further imports of the precious metals by the next packets. Drafts on Philadelphia sold yesterday at 2 per cent. discount."

GEN. JESUP, accompanied by his aids, arrived in this city on Tuesday last, via Norfolk. On noticing the arrival of Gen. J. the "Globe" says: "We believe the war in Florida may now be considered at an end. There are but a small band of Mickasukies, and only a single chief of note, still abiding in the swamps. Gen. Jesup has taken altogether about seventeen hundred of these banditti, and among them the most influential, daring, and mischievous chiefs."

AGRICULTURAL FAIR. The agricultural society of Kent county, Maryland, proposes to give, at the next annual fair, a premium of a silver cup for the best acre of corn and wheat; also premiums for the best colt not more than two years old, the best calf, the best home-made carpet, for the best home-made stockings, the best home-made cloth, the best sample of butter, the best sewing silk, for the best crop of timothy and clover, on one acre, the best crop of sugar beets, mangel wurtzel, ruta бага, and potatoes on one-fourth of an acre; the best boar, sow, ram, ewe, &c.

MAINE. On the 24th ult. the governor and council met to examine the returns of votes for member of congress for Oxford district, in place of the late hon. T. J. Carter, deceased. The whole number of votes returned are 8,321.

For Virgil Delphini Parris, (Van Buren,)	4,349
N. S. Littlefield, "	166
Joseph G. Cole, "	60
Judah Dana, "	3

Van Buren plurality, including conservative and scattering.

The majority for V. D. Parris is 187. His plurality over all others 377.

According to the official list, the votes in the district, when Mr. Carter was elected, were as follows:

For Timothy J. Carter, (Van Buren,)	4,165
Joseph Tobin, "	281
Alfred Prince, "	53
Joseph G. Cole, "	44

Hon. JAMES S. CONWAY, governor of the state of Arkansas, arrived in this city on Thursday last.

FROM TEXAS. New Orleans, May 20. The steam packet Columbia arrived yesterday in three days from Texas. Congress was in session, but in daily expectation of adjourning. President Houston had declined executing the land patents, in a communication to congress, explaining his views at length. The Banner remarks, the course of the executive had been severely censured by some, but it is thought his explanation will be deemed satisfactory.

At a ball lately given at Bexar, a rencontre took place between major Tinsley and Eugene Navarro, which resulted in the death of both. Tinsley shot Navarro with a pistol, but was killed himself by a bowie knife in the hands of his expiring antagonist. We have not learned the immediate cause of the affray, but understand that an old feud existed between the parties.

FROM ENGLAND. By the packet ship Orpheus, from Liverpool, and the Sampson from London, the editor of the N. Y. Courier and Enquirer has received London papers to the 1st and Liverpool to the 2d of May. They are totally destitute of any political intelligence which would be of interest here. The British parliament is again in session, but its proceedings are chiefly confined to local matters. The coronation of the queen is postponed to the 28th June, and it appears definitively settled that this ceremony is to be conducted on the reduced scale of expenditures observed at the coronation of William IV—reduced at least in comparison with that which took place on the coronation of George IV. Mr. Biddle's letter to Mr. Adams was received on the 30th of April. The London papers were much occupied with the affairs of Mr. Jaudon and the U. S. Bank. Lord Palmerston took occasion, at a dinner given him by his electors at Tveriton, to compliment the course of our government in relation to the Canadian revolt. The discussion of the two prominent questions before the chamber of deputies of France—the establishment of a grand system of railroads communicating with the capital and the conversation of the five per cent clock—has been delayed until the first week in May.

From Spain the accounts are of the same undecided character that they have been for this long time past.

SIR FRANCIS HEAD. The Liverpool Chronicle holds the following language in regard to sir Francis Head. His honor was quite too fiery for the occasion, and we think he is beginning to find it out.

[Alb. Adv.]
Sir Francis Head closed the Upper Canadian legislative session on the 6th of March, in a long speech, teeming with the most outrageous and stupid bombast. This weak headed functionary has not closed his inglorious career in the Upper province without adding fresh fuel to the flame, which his egregious folly enkindled among the people of the United States. It will be recollected that his opening speech in December last, gave great offence by the gratuitous attack which he made therein on the Americans, en masse, for aiding and abetting the Canadian insurgents.

In his closing address to the provincial parliament, he repeats his charge against them in aggravated terms, although he must have known that the bulk of the United States citizens have, from the commencement of the outbreak, been warmly in favor of the British government, and the continuance of its authority in the Canadas—the dissentients being confined to a handful of restless and desperate adventurers on the frontier states. In the face of this fact, however, he not only launches his anathemas against the nation collectively, but affects to sneer, in his small way, at their republican form of government, as contrasted with the beauties of monarchical institutions. This, as may be expected, has roused Jonathan's bile, heightened by the memory of the outrage committed on the steamboat Caroline and its crew, sanctioned as it was by this booby governor.

To make the matter worse, at the very moment when sir Francis Head was thus insanely committing himself, a correspondence was passing between the British ambassador, at Washington, and Mr. Forsyth, the American secretary of state, touching the capture and destruction of the steamboat in question, by a Canadian force on the American side of the Niagara. It appears, from the correspondence, that the American government is determined not to let this affair rest, a remonstrance having been addressed on the subject to the British government. We do not anticipate that any thing serious will arise out of the affair; but we must do sir Francis Boud Head the credit of saying that his exertions have not been wanting to fan it into a flame.

REMOVAL OF THE CHEROKEES.

Major general Scott, of the United States army sends to the Cherokee people, remaining in North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee and Alabama, this address.

CHEROKEES! The president of the United States has sent me, with a powerful army, to cause you, in obedience to the treaty of 1835, to join that part of your people who are already, established in prosperity on the other side of the Mississippi.—Unhappily, the two years which were allowed for the purpose, you have suffered to pass away without following, and without making any preparation to follow, and now, or by the time that this solemn address shall reach your distant settlements, the emigration must be commenced in haste, but, I hope, without disorder. I have no power, by granting a farther delay, to correct the error that you have committed. The full moon of May is already on the wane, and before another shall have passed away, every Cherokee, man, woman, and child, in those states, must be in motion to join their brethren in the far west.

My friends: This is no sudden determination on the part of the president, whom you and I must now obey. By the treaty the emigration was to have been completed on or before the 23d of this month; and the president has constantly kept you warned, during the two years allowed, through all his officers and agents in this country, that the treaty would be enforced.

I am come to carry out that determination. My troops already occupy many positions in the country that you are to abandon, and thousands and thousands are approaching, from every quarter, to render resistance and escape alike hopeless. All these troops, regular and militia, are your friends. Receive them and confide in them as such. Obey them when they tell you that you can remain no longer in this country. Soldiers are as kind hearted as brave, and the desire of every one of us is to execute our painful duty in mercy. We are commanded by the president to act towards you in that spirit, and such is also the wish of the whole people of America.

Chiefs, head-men and warriors! Will you, then, by resistance, compel us to resort to arms? God forbid! Or will you, by flight, seek to hide yourselves in mountains and forests, and thus oblige us to hunt you down? Remember that, in pursuit, it may be impossible to avoid conflicts. The blood of the white man, or the blood of the red man, may be spilt, and if spilt, however accidentally, it may be impossible for the discreet and humane among you, or among us to prevent a general war and carnage. Think of this, my Cherokee brethren! I am an old warrior, and have been present at many a scene of slaughter; but spare me, I beseech you, the horror of witnessing the destruction of the Cherokees.

Do not, I invite you, even wait for the close approach of the troops; but make such preparations for emigration as you can, and hasten to this place, to Ross's landing, or to Gunter's landing, where you all will be received in kindness by officers selected for the purpose. You will find food for all, and clothing for the destitute, at either of those places, and thence, at your ease and in comfort, be transported to your new homes according to the terms of the treaty.

This is the address of a warrior to warriors.—May his entreaties be kindly received, and may the God of both prosper the Americans and Cherokees, and preserve them long in peace and friendship with each other!

WINFIELD SCOTT.

ILLINOIS—POLITICS OF THE DAY.

LETTER OF A. M. JENKINS.

To the editor of the Backwoodsman.

MR. RUSSELL. In your paper of the 15th instant, I find an article relative to the candidate for governor at the ensuing August election, in which my name is brought before the public as the probable candidate for that office, to be run by the party in favor of the administration of Mr. Van Buren, and in which it is said "the eyes of the party are turned towards me with the anxious hope that I will take the field, and that, in justice to my fellow-citizens, I ought at once to acquaint them of my determination." I have also been called upon, from different parts of the state, by individuals, some in person, and others by letter, to become a candidate for the same office.

Were I under the present call to become a candidate, I must, of course, be run by the Van Buren party, the call upon me being from that quarter; besides, the other party have a candidate, with whom they are satisfied. I must expect to be voted for by them, and, if elected, be elected by them; and, were I to conceal my sentiments, or remain silent and permit them to elect me under the belief that I was still with them in sentiment, it would amount to an acknowledgment on my part that I was. Honestly on my part, and justice towards them as a party, would require of me that I should, so far as I took any part in the politics of the general government, support and sustain them.

No man could be more proud than I would be to be governor of this young and flourishing state. I should consider it the greatest honor, almost, that could be conferred upon me by any people; but if I ever should arrive at that honor, I wish to do it honestly; and, were I to practise any deception upon my fellow-citizens in regard to my sentiments, by which I might by possibility be elected to that office, I should consider myself unworthy to fill it. Candor on my part, and justice towards the respectable party with whom I have formerly acted in good faith, who now, to some extent, seem inclined to elevate me still more, require of me to make known to them, thus publicly, that my mind is undergone a material change as to the policy pursued by the administration. I now stand, in many things, decidedly opposed to Mr. Van Buren's policy. Their deleterious effects upon every interest of the country have brought conviction to my mind that they are wrong, have been productive of much evil already, and will be of much more (if persisted in) to the country generally, but particularly so to the west. Believing this, as I honestly do, I am bound to oppose them, for I am in favor of my country in preference to men. I may, at some future time, speak of some more of the measures of this administration which I believe to be wrong; but at present I shall mention but one, it being the one about which the most is said: I mean the independent or sub-treasury bill. To this bill, in all the various shapes it has assumed, I am opposed. In reference to it I could make no compromise, although I think it very likely to pass and become the law of the land.

Having expressed these views, I think my friends will agree with me that I cannot, consistently agree to become a candidate at this time, to be run by the party in favor of Mr. Van Buren's administration. It would be an imposition upon them. They will no doubt think I have acted properly to decline being a candidate, and readily excuse me. I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. M. JENKINS.

From the Huntsville Democrat.

LETTER FROM THE HON. WILLIAM SMITH.

To my fellow citizens of Madison county.

Since the 15th of July last, certain editorial remarks have appeared in several of the different numbers of the newspaper called the Southern Advocate, published in Huntsville, concerning myself, with the evident intention to derogate from my respectability in your estimation. All of which I should have permitted to pass unnoticed, had not a recent publication appeared in that paper, on the 25th September last, in the shape of a correspondence between Dr. Miles Selden Watkins, of Huntsville, and his brother-in-law, the Hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh, of Richmond, Virginia; and also of Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., the editor of the Southern Advocate, and general Samuel Smith, of Baltimore. In that correspondence, Dr. Miles Selden Watkins, the hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., have made a very free use of my name, and seem to have been specially careful to give it a wide circulation in the newspapers, both at home and abroad.

They have not been content with giving it an early and extraordinary circulation through that channel, but Doctor Miles Selden Watkins, and Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., and a few of their political associates, in Huntsville, have been busily engaged in giving it currency in Madison county. This they do by asking gentlemen from the country, when they come to Huntsville, "if they have read the correspondence?" And when inquired at, what correspondence? They reply in a half whisper; "Judge Smith has got himself into difficulty that he cannot get out of." And then proceeded to unfold the high offence I had committed against the memory of chief justice Marshall, by saying he owned shares in the United States Bank in July, immediately previous to the time when he presided in the case of McCulloch vs. the state of Maryland.

I have been a good deal teased with such stories as this, within the last seven or eight years, and by this very sort of men; and I believe I have heretofore fallen into no difficulty from which I have not extricated myself. But should I be so unfortunate as not to be able to extricate myself from this difficulty by my own means, I can assure Doctor Miles Selden Watkins, his brother-in-law, the hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., I shall by no means invoke their aid.

But I beg my fellow citizens to forbear making up an opinion on that correspondence, until they hear my side of the story. And when the whole subject shall be fairly placed before them, then I shall, with great cheerfulness, yield to any opinion they may arrive at from the facts. One thing I will now assert, that what I said, respecting chief justice Marshall, was true; and I pledge myself to establish it, notwithstanding Doctor Miles Selden Watkins and his political associates "are not willing to admit the truth of such allegations."

I have various reasons for asking your indulgence for time to reply: In the first place, I have been extremely busy since, sometime before the publication of that important correspondence, attending to business important to my private interest. I shall also in a short time leave home for the legislature, where I shall be otherwise engaged. Moreover, I am desirous to procure some documents, which I know to exist, not yet within my reach: admirable ingredients to dissipate slanders and falsehoods. Lastly, this correspondence has been published in the city of Richmond; in the city of Philadelphia; in the city of New York; in the city of Boston; and in the city of Mobile. And published in all those distant cities before it made its appearance here, in the Southern Advocate, where Doctor Miles Selden Watkins and Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., reside two of the principal actors in this deeply interesting scene. I want time to inquire for the reasons for this new mode of attack. And perhaps by some delay I may be enabled to trace their motives. For I will be able to show from incontrovertible evidence, that every word I said, which prompted this correspondence, was necessarily drawn from me, in self defence, by previous publications in the very same Southern Advocate, from the pen of the identical Le Roy Pope, jr., esq., editor of that paper. The cause is unknown to my friends at a distance who are sending me slips from newspapers published abroad, containing the most venomous portion of the ebullitions of the hon. Benjamin Watkins Leigh, over his own name, and headed in large capital letters, slander detected.

To enable me to meet these enormities, and arrest their progress until I can respond to them fully, I respectfully request the Mobile Commercial Register and Patriot, the Flag of the Union, the Cahawba Democrat, the Montgomery Advertiser, the Florence Gazette, the Richmond Enquirer, and the Globe, to republish this address. In addition to subscribing my name, I am a subscriber to each of those papers.

And as the Richmond Whig, the Sentinel and Herald, of Philadelphia, and some other papers, the names unknown, in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Mobile, and various other places have published that correspondence, or extracts from it, I respectfully call on them to republish this address also, as an act of retributive justice which I claim at their hands.

I am with great respect,

WM. SMITH.

Huntsville, Ala., Oct. 17, 1837.

COMMODORE WOOLSEY.

This gallant officer, whose death has been briefly mentioned, had been indisposed for several weeks, first from erysipelas, and then dropsy. The following notice accompanies the announcement of his decease in the New York Commercial Advertiser:

Our first knowledge of him as an officer, was during the "restrictive energies" of Mr. Jefferson. In order to enforce the embargo and non-intercourse laws, an armed brig was built upon Lake Ontario, called the Oneida, the command of which was assigned to Woolsey, then a lieutenant. He had seen much previous service on the ocean, and was engaged in the Tripolitan war with Decatur and others.

He remained in the lake service for several years, and was one of the most active and efficient officers during the war with Great Britain, under Commodore Chauncey. Several very gallant affairs were conducted by him with signal success. When the United States were building the large ships at Sackett's Harbor, Woolsey was sent to bring the anchors, cables, and rigging from below.

The roads at that day were so bad, from Rome to Sackett's Harbor, as to render their transportation by land all but impracticable. It was therefore determined, if possible, to take them in the Durham boats through Wood creek and Oneida lake, to Oswego, and thence round, keeping the boats close in shore to Sackett's Harbor. Ascertaining, however, that his intentions had been discovered by the enemy through the instrumentality of spies, and that the British commander on Lake Ontario was preparing to intercept his boats, Woolsey resorted to a stratagem which so far threw Sir James Lucas Yeo from off his guard as well nigh to ensure his success.

The voyage from Oswego was commenced prosperously—Woolsey himself proceeding along the shore by land, and watching their movements. When off the mouth of Salmon river, however, a detachment of the enemy's flotilla discovered the boats, which were compelled to put into that harbor for shelter, and the naval stores were hurried on shore, where the only armed protection consisted of a company of riflemen under major Appleton.

A detachment of the enemy entered the harbor in pursuit and land. By advice of Woolsey, and under his own conduct, the riflemen were placed in ambush, with directions not to fire until the near approach of the enemy. The enemy advanced unconscious of the ambuscade, until within a convenient distance when they were received by a destructive fire. In a loud voice Woolsey ordered "a charge," whereupon the riflemen rushed impetuously forward, with loud cheers, and holding their weapons in the position of charged bayonets. The result was the surrender of the enemy at discretion. They were commanded by an officer named Popham, of the British navy, and an old acquaintance of Woolsey's. As Popham came forward to surrender his sword, Woolsey exclaimed "Why, Popham, what on earth are you doing up this creek?" After some indifferent reply, and a survey of Woolsey's force, Popham observed—"Well, Woolsey, this is the first time I ever heard of riflemen charging bayonets!"

The first attempt of the enemy upon Sackett's Harbor was repelled by Woolsey, with the Oneida brig alone. This affair happened early in the war, before the United States were prepared to take the lake with a squadron. He was also in command at Oswego where the attack of the British was so brilliantly repulsed, on which occasion he displayed great skill and bravery.

He remained in command of the marine at Sackett's Harbor after the close of the war, we believe, until it was determined mutually by England and the United States to dismantle and abandon their ships upon those waters. He was then transplanted to the ocean service, in which he has been actively engaged the greater portion of the time since, having been successively in command of the West India station, and Brazil, and the service have alike reason to deplore the loss of one of its bravest and best men. He was in all respects a true hearted sailor—bold, fearless, and full of stratagem as an officer—frank, free, and noble hearted as a man—and, like most sailors, generous to a fault. He has left a family consisting of a widow and seven children—one of whom is in the navy, and bears his own name. Few men can be called hence who will leave a wider circle of mourning friends than Melancthon T. Woolsey. [N. Y. Com. Adv.]

SPEECH OF MR. CORWIN, OF OHIO,

Delivered in the house of representatives, on the 20th of April, on the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road through Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

Messrs. Clowney and Pickens, having concluded their remarks, Mr. Corwin addressed the house as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I perceive the house is unusually impatient of this debate. I am very reluctant, at any time, to lift up my voice in this babel of confused noises, but especially so now; nor would I delay the final vote a moment, did I not remember that this bill has been already once rejected, but a day or two since; and from the tone of discussion this morning, I have too much reason to fear it will meet a similar fate, by the vote now about to be taken. I may add, also, that I feel unwilling to permit the remarks of the two gentlemen from South Carolina (Mr. Clowney and Mr. Pickens) to pass to the press, and from thence into the public mind, without an attempt, at least, to correct the erroneous impressions in which, according to my views, they abound.

The bill now under discussion, making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, is nothing more nor less than the continuance of a system of regular annual expenditure, begun in 1806, and continued, with the exception of the short period of the war with Great Britain, every year up to the present time. The estimates for this appropriation, are as regularly and habitually sent in by the treasury department, as are those for the salaries of the president and other public servants, or those for the support of the army. If a continued perseverance in the prosecution of any public measure for thirty years, cannot be looked to as settling the public utility of such measure, or the fixed policy and duty of this government, beyond the reach of cavil or objection, then indeed may it be truly said, that we are a people without common forethought, a government without any established policy, a confederacy without any common end or aim whatever.

The construction of the road provided for in this bill, from the waters of the Atlantic to the Mississippi river, was originated during the administration of Mr. Jefferson. It has received the countenance of every shade and complexion of political party in congress, at various periods since, and has been sanctioned by the approval of every executive from that time to the present. It has thus become incorporated with your policy. It makes a part of the creed of all parties, and, as it advances in its progress, is woven into the texture of those systems of internal improvement going forward in each of the six states through which it passes. A measure thus perseveringly continued so long, sustaining itself, through all political conflicts, and every vicissitude of our history, for the last thirty years, comes recommended at once to the mind as something necessary; something which has been found indispensable, and not merely convenient. It stands in your policy like one of those truths in philosophy, which is not questioned, because it has received the general assent of all reasonable men. Speaking of such a measure, this morning, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens,) richly imbued as his mind is with philological learning,—could find no terms whereby to characterize this bill less odious than swindling and plunder. Thus, by a dextrous evasion of the substance, and a strict observance of the letter of the rules of courtesy in debate, the gentleman has been able, by fair inference, to denounce the supporters of this bill as the promoters of "swindling," the aiders and abettors of "plunder." [Here Mr. Pickens rose and observed that he had not applied the terms stated by Mr. C. to the bill, or those who supported it. He had stated, in argument, the case of a general system of taxation, and an appropriation to partial and local purposes, and denominated that as swindling and plunder.] Mr. C. proceeded. I understand the gentleman as he explains himself. He has made a speech against this bill. He has endeavored to illustrate, in various ways, its inequity and impolicy. He denounces this road as local in its character, and not of general utility. He shows that the money appropriated is a part of the common revenue raised from the whole union. He then speaks of general taxation, and local appropriations, and calls this last a system of swindling and plunder. It is but the difference between a positive assertion and a conclusion from premises stated. Sir, I desire, when thus arraigned, to submit my defence. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman will find this system, and this road, have been cherished, and heartily supported, by men, living and dead, to whom even he would be willing to defer in such matters; and with whose memories and character he would not associate the folly and criminality which, in his over-wrought zeal, he fancies he has discovered in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to elaborate an essay upon this road, but I must be permitted to notice for a few moments, the very summary method by which gentlemen with great apparent ease, acquit their consciences of all censure for voting down now and forever, all further appropriations of the kind. Yesterday the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Rhett) spoke of the supposed importance of this road west of Wheeling for military purposes, as an idea too ridiculous to merit a moment's serious thought. It seemed to him perfectly idle to imagine that ordnance or military stores would ever be transported by land westward, while the Ohio river remained; and so, with undoubting confidence and the utmost self-complacency, he assures us that a "fool's cap and bells" should be bestowed upon any one who entertains a contrary opinion. Sir, I hope I may be allowed, with great humility, not indeed to deny to the conclusions of the gentleman the greatest certainty possible in matters of this kind, but merely to suggest a fact or two which it may be well to consider a moment, before, we swear to the infallibility of his judgment on this military question. In the first place, the road and river, though both running from east to west, from Wheeling to the Mississippi, are distant from each other, from north to south, from 90 to 150 miles at various points. I think it possible in the chances of war, that it might become necessary to march a military force directly from Wheeling to Columbus, in Ohio, or to the capitol of Indiana or Illinois; and to take along with such force a train of artillery. Would the Ohio river, think you, be so obliging as to leave its ancient bed, and bear your cannon on its waves across the country from Wheeling to Columbus, in Ohio, and from thence by Indianapolis to Springfield, in Illinois? If we could suspend the laws of the physical world, or if a miracle could be wrought at our command, then the confident opinion of the gentleman, that this road is, in no sense, of military importance, would, in my poor judgment, appear somewhat plausible. But the gentleman seems also to forget that the waters of the Ohio, in spite of our wishes to the contrary, will freeze into hard ice. For three months in the winter it is not at all times navigable. On account of shoals, it is not navigable at the time of low water in the summer. And hence it would follow, that your military movements in that quarter, if ever necessary, would have to wait for the floods of summer and the thaws of winter. But I will not venture to oppose any speculative notions of mine, to an opinion so confidently entertained by several gentlemen from the south who have spoken in this debate. I will fortify myself by an authority which I am sure will command, as I know it should, infinitely more regard than any opinion or argument of mine.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that this government, soon after the late war with Great Britain, admonished by the experience of that war, determined on prosecuting a general system of military defence. To this end, general Bernard was brought from France, and placed at the head of the engineer corps. In the year 1824, it became the duty of this officer, under the direction of Mr. Jno. C. Calhoun, then secretary of war, to survey and report to congress such rivers to be improved, and canals and roads to be constructed all over our territory, as were conceived to be of national importance for commercial or military purposes. On the 3d of December, 1824, Mr. Calhoun submitted to the president, and through him to congress, the result of the labors of this corps, accompanied with his own reflections and recommendations. It will be found, on examining that document, that this very Cumberland road is classed with other great works of internal improvement, which, in the opinion of Mr. Calhoun, were necessary to the defence of the country in war, and that the road now under the consideration of the house is there pronounced to be of "national importance." This was the opinion of Mr. Calhoun in 1824. The construction of the Cumberland road, as a work of commercial importance, as well as a sure means of binding in union the eastern and western portions of our country, had been urged upon congress by Mr. Gallatin, as secretary of the treasury, as early as 1808, and by Mr. Giles and Mr. Jno. Randolph, of Virginia, in reports which they respectively submitted to congress about the same time. Before the navigation of the rivers of the west by steam, no one could cast his eye upon the map of the western states, and not perceive at once the incalculable value of this road to the commerce of both east and west. If the application of steam to navigation has diminished the importance of the road, this was known and considered by Mr. Calhoun, when he made the report to which I have referred. In 1824, the steamboats were flying on their wings of fire from Pittsburgh to New Orleans, as they are now; yet Mr. Calhoun pronounced the Cumberland road then a work of "national importance." I beg the gentleman from South Carolina who spoke this morning (Mr. Pickens) to peruse that report of his friend, Mr. Calhoun. I beg him to ponder well the magnificent and expensive works of internal improvement there commended to the favorable regard of this government. The waters of the Chesapeake and the Ohio were to flow together. From the Ohio the chain was to be stretched across that state to the northern lakes, and thus the north and south are to be bound up together, one in their internal interests, as they are one and identical in their national and extra territorial relations. But I need not particularize; what I have specified comprehends not the twentieth part of those works in magnitude and expense then recommended by Mr. Calhoun, as proper to be constructed by the federal government, at the expense of the common treasury of the nation.

The Cumberland road, as I have said, is one amongst the rest there recommended as of "national importance." Mr. Speaker, I must beg the indulgence of the house to read a single paragraph from the document referred to. After speaking of the great advantages to the whole union of one of the great western works to which I have already adverted, the secretary proceeds:

"The advantages, in fact, from the completion of this single work, as proposed, would be so extended and ramified throughout these great divisions of our country, already containing so large a portion of our population, and destined in a few generations to outnumber the most populous states of Europe, as to leave in that quarter no other work for the execution of the general government, excepting only the extension of the Cumberland road from Wheeling to St. Louis, which is also conceived to be of national importance."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if in the bill under discussion there be any feature akin to "swindling and plunder," I ask the gentleman from the south to turn to that gigantic project of kindred works projected by their own justly favorite son, and tell me in what vocabulary amongst the "tongues of men" they can find epithets odious enough to shadow forth the diabolical tendencies of his plan. Sir, if this bill be swindling, his scheme is robbery. If this bill be petty plunder, his plan was wholesale desolation. But, good or bad, whichever it be, we have his authority for it. Well do I remember, sir, in what high esteem the secretary of war (Mr. Calhoun) was held throughout the west in the year 1824. The sober affections of the aged, and the ardent hearts of the young, all, all were attracted to him. His altars blazed every where throughout the broad valleys of the west. Right loyally and prodigally did we pour out our incense upon his shrine; and lo! what now do we see? Whilst the smoke of our sacrifice yet ascends in gathering clouds; whilst the distended nostrils of our deity inhale its grateful odors almost to suffocation, he in whom our affections were all enshrined; he the author of this our faith; he the chosen object, it may be, of our very profane and heathenish, but still sincere idolatry; he, with the selected high-priests of his faith, suddenly rush upon us from the south, overturn their own altars, and scourge us, their misguided, but still honest devotees, from the temple themselves had erected. Not content with this, but determined, it seems, to consign both the authors and followers of the creed to hopeless infamy, they have compared their own system of policy to a system of plunder, and themselves and us to a combination of swindlers.

Let not the gentleman from the south suppose that I quote the authority of Giles, and Randolph, and Gallatin, in 1802 and 1803, and Mr. Calhoun as late as 1824, to fix upon southern gentlemen the sin of inconsistency, or sinister motives, for change of principle. No, this is not my motive. I wish them to pause upon their own present opinions, and compare them with the views of those, living and dead, to whom I have referred, in the hope that the light of those great minds—that light that has been to them "a pillar of fire by night," in all their political wanderings heretofore—might haply now serve to keep them in the right way. I beg the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Rhett,) who so readily voted "cap and bells" to the heads of such as entertained particular notions, which he condemned, of the utility of this road, to take back his gifts a moment, and see whether he may not possibly be found unawares placing these badges of imbecility and folly on the graves of Randolph and Giles; and whether, if he is to be impartial and just in the distribution of such honors, he may not be compelled to pass over into the chamber of the senate, and bestow one set of them upon the illustrious senator from his own state. Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Rhett,) in a spirit of sincere respect, that there is a posterity for him as well as those great and good men whose opinions he sets at naught. I hope I may, without offence, suppose it possible that in some distant day, when this very road, paved from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, shall be crowded with commerce, and groan beneath its load of travel; when, by the speed with which your armies can pass over it from the centre to the remote border of your country, some fearful rebellion is happily quelled, or for the same reasons, some insolent foe is speedily repulsed, the age that then is may possibly remove the "cap and bells" from the last resting place of Giles and Randolph, where he has hung them, and look for the tomb of another, as better deserving the honor of these significant emblems. Sir, when I glance at the history of this road; when I remember that it was begun in the administration of Jefferson, and approved by him; when I group together the other illustrious names who have for thirty years also given it their sanction, I am prone to believe, my own judgment concurring, that I am right in carrying on what has been thus begun. I cannot reverse the settled and long unquestioned decisions of the fathers and founders of the republic, upon the faith of the last night's dream. I cannot so readily believe that the sages of past times violated the constitution to make a road. I cannot see why, if that were so, it has not been discovered in the lapse of thirty years. Sir, I know much is said, and truly, at this day, of the advance of the human mind. I know, sir, it was written thus long ago, "men shall go to and fro, and knowledge shall increase." All this I know, and yet I cannot quite believe, that our young gentlemen here, in this year of grace, 1838, have now, this morning, descended to the bottom of the well where truth lies, as is said, for the first time brought up and exposed her precious secrets to the long anxious eyes of the inquiring world. Just as slow am I, Mr. Speaker, to believe that the great men, who gave us a country forty years ago, did not understand what its true interests were. They who projected this great work were not men to rush into hasty and ill-considered measures. They had been accustomed to settle the foundations of society, and they did their work, in all things, under the habitual reflection and responsibility, which their immortal labors inspired. Sir, let us beware, in the midst of our party conflicts, how we hastily question their calm resolves. Let us take care, in this day's work, with the hoarse clamor of party resounding ever in our ears, that we are not deaf to the voice of wisdom, which calls out to us from the past.

Sir, Speaker, I have thus far considered the bill upon your table as providing for one work, itself a part of a system of "internal improvement;" I have referred so far to the opinions of men whom we are accustomed to regard as good authority, to show that the road in question has been regarded as one of national importance, and, as such, is within the acknowledged powers of congress. But, sir, this bill rests its claims to our support upon a basis, far less liable to those assaults which consider it only in the isolated view of expediency. It is, in truth, a bill for the fulfilment of a contract. It proposes to carry into effect a compact, to the performance of which the faith of this government is pledged to three sovereign states of this union. I know, sir, that many gentlemen here are familiar with this view of the subject, but I feel equally certain that there are others who are not.

The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Pope) the other day discussed this branch of the subject with great ability, but I am impressed with the necessity of presenting it more at length, even at the risk of being tedious. I shall endeavor, by a reference to acts of congress and public documents, to show that we are bound to construct this road as far as the Mississippi river; that we have contracted to do so; that we have received the consideration for this contract from the states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. If I can establish these facts, it will follow that to stop the road short of the Mississippi, would be a gross neglect of duty, and a flagrant breach of national faith.

In the year 1787, "the territory northwest of the Ohio" comprehended what are now the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin territory. The celebrated ordinance of 1787, amongst other things, provided that there should be three states at least out of this territory, which should be bounded by the Ohio river on the south, the Mississippi on the west, and a specified line on the north. This last line, many gentlemen here will recollect, was finally established as the northern boundary of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, very lately, on the admission of Michigan into the union.

Early in the year 1802, the eastern division of this territory petitioned congress to provide for its admission into the union under the ordinance of 1787, which provided that certain portions of the territory, having 60,000 inhabitants, should be entitled to come into the union as sovereign states. This application, with a census showing the number of inhabitants then within what are the present limits of Ohio, was referred to a committee in the house of representatives, of which William B. Giles, of Virginia, was the chairman.

On the 4th of March, 1802, Mr. Giles made a favorable report on this petition, and, amongst other things, referring to certain matters of compact in the ordinance of 1787, this report concludes in these words:

"The committee, taking into consideration the stipulations; viewing the lands of the United States within the said territory as an important source of revenue; deeming it also of the highest importance to the stability and permanency of the union of the eastern and western parts of the United States, that the intercourse should, as far as possible, be facilitated, and their interests be liberally and mutually consulted and promoted—are of opinion that the provisions of the aforesaid articles may be varied for the reciprocal advantage of the United States and the state of —, when formed, and the people thereof; they have therefore deemed it proper, in lieu of said provisions, to offer the following propositions to the convention of the eastern state of said territory, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, without any condition or restraint whatever, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States."

The report then sets forth three propositions to be submitted to the Ohio convention; the third proposition, being the one applicable to this subject, is in these words:

"That one-tenth part of the nett proceeds of the lands lying in the said states, hereafter sold by congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making turnpike or other roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, and continued afterwards through the state of —, such roads to be laid out under the authority of congress, with the consent of the several states through which the road shall pass, provided that the convention of said state shall on its part assent that every and each tract of land sold by congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by order or under authority of the states, whether for state, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of ten years from and after the completion of the payment of the purchase money on such tract to the United States."

Attached to this report is an official letter addressed by Mr. Gallatin, then secretary of the treasury, to Mr. Giles, dated Washington, 13th February, 1802. Mr. Gallatin, deeply impressed with the advantage to the government of this contract with the new state, urges it upon congress as a means of increasing the value of the public lands owned by the government, and then pledged for the payment of the national debt. After stating a variety of arguments to that effect, he says:

"It follows that, if it be in a high degree, as I believe it is, the interest of the United States to obtain some further security against an injurious sale, under the territorial or state laws, of lands sold by them to individuals, justice, not less than policy, requires that it should be obtained by common consent; and it is not to be expected that the new state legislatures should assent to any alterations in their system of taxation which may affect the revenues of the state, unless an equivalent is offered."

He then goes on to insist that "Such conditions, instead of diminishing, would greatly increase the value of the lands, and, therefore, of the pledge to the public creditors."

The last paragraph in this document urges another argument in favor of this road, which I hope will not be overlooked by gentlemen who consider it a boon merely to the young states of the west. Mr. Gallatin thought this road would be highly advantageous to the old states, and he addresses their cupidity accordingly, in these words:

"The roads will be as beneficial to the parts of the Atlantic states through which they are to pass, and nearly as much so to a considerable portion of the union, as to the northwestern territory itself."

On the 30th of April, 1802, an act was passed authorizing the people of the eastern division of the northwestern territory to form a constitution and state government. In that law the proposition, somewhat modified, is inserted, and by congress proposed to the convention which was to assemble the next summer. In the act just quoted, five per cent. of the proceeds of the lands within the state is proposed as a fund to make a road "from the Atlantic waters to and through the state," and the condition of the grant is, that the state shall abstain from taxing the lands sold by the United States for five years from and after the day of their sale.

In the month of November, 1802, the convention of Ohio assented to the proposition contained in the act of April, 1802, with this modification: that three-fifths of the five per cent. fund should be appropriated to laying out and making roads within the state, and under its direction and authority, leaving two per cent. on all the sales of lands within the state to be appropriated to a road leading from the Atlantic waters to and through the state of Ohio. To this congress expressly assented, at its next session, upon the recommendation of a committee, of which John Randolph, of Virginia, was the chairman, and thus the compact was closed. Here let it be observed, that compacts of the same kind and in the same words, have been concluded between the states of Indiana and Illinois and this government, at the times when these states were respectively admitted into the union. In this way, following up the project began in 1802, of constructing a road "from the Atlantic waters to the Mississippi river," passing from the Ohio the whole distance to the Mississippi, through your own public lands, it was carried out by compact with each state, as soon as it became capable of entering into such engagements, by assuming the powers and dignity of a sovereign state of the union.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that you had contracted to construct a road from the Atlantic waters, through the new states of the west, to the Mississippi river. I have shown, by reference to public documents, that the motives to this contract were, first, to increase the value of the public domain, to and through which this road was to pass, and thus put money into the national purse to pay the national debt; secondly, to bind together in union of interests the east and west, by creating a quick and constant intercourse between the western and Atlantic divisions of your common country. Now, the first and main object, the increase in value of the public lands, never could be effected, unless you carried the road, not merely "to and through" Ohio, where, in 1802, your public lands for sale chiefly lay, but would only be fairly realized by carrying the road "to and through" each of the other western states, as your lands, by the extinguishment of the Indian title in these states, should come into market. These were the views upon which you set out, in your propositions of compact at first. These were your "inducements" held out to Ohio, and repeated in each of your engagements to make the Cumberland road, with Indiana and Illinois. With these determinations, asserted through your public and authorized agents, you ask of the western states, in consideration of inducements thus held out, to do what? To grant you a trifling sum of money to aid you in your effort to improve the value of your own lands? No. To allow you to pass through their territory in such way as you choose? No. No such inconsiderable demands as these were on your lips. You demanded of them to surrender up for your benefit the tax on nearly all the property in these states for five years. In other words, you asked, and you received too, into the public treasury of the union, a direct tax for five years on all, or nearly all, the lands in three large and populous states. You said to the purchaser of your lands buy of us, and your property thus acquired shall be free from taxation for five years; and thus you got in increase of price paid to you, what otherwise would have gone, in the shape of taxes, into the coffers of the states. This is true in regard to almost all the lands in the three states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Each of these states was admitted into the union with barely 60,000 inhabitants. The quantity of lands then sold was so inconsiderable as to make no sort of change in the estimated value of the right we surrendered. Take Ohio, for example. She gave up to you her right to tax all lands then unsold, for five years after they should be sold. She had then 60,000 inhabitants; she has now probably one million and a half of population, and there are yet public lands unsold in that state. Thus, you can see that we have released to you our right to tax lands in the hands of nineteen-twentieths of our people for five successive years. This, too, was done at a time when there was scarcely any other subject of taxation but lands, and when, in the infancy of our several state governments, the first movements of political and social machinery require heavy expense from those least able to bear it. Let us see what it was in money that we gave. It will be found, on examination, that the three states interested cover an area, according to the best authorities, of something over one hundred and twenty millions of acres of land. Deducting something for reservations made before the compact, we may safely estimate the lands then to be sold in the three western states, at one hundred and twenty millions of acres. We gave up the right to tax these for five years from the day of sale. What has been the usual rate of taxation upon lands in these states? I think I may fairly affirm that the rate of taxation on lands in the three states interested has been one dollar on every hundred acres. This, levied on one hundred and twenty millions of acres, would give one million two hundred thousand dollars per annum, which, in five years, the time for which the tax was surrendered by the states, would give the sum of six millions of dollars. This sum have we paid into your treasury for your promise to complete the road in question. In addition to this, we surrendered our sovereign right of taxation within our own limits—a right itself so dear to states that, as matter of pride, just pride, its surrender could only have been extorted by the strongest hope of advantage—the hope of some great and striking improvement in our whole country, such as this great work will be, when you complete it, as you have promised.

Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the three western states have given into the national treasury, in effect, six millions of dollars, for the promise to construct this road. Let us now advert for a moment to the cost of the work as estimated at the time of the contract, and we shall find that the government then understood, that this sum would construct the road from the Atlantic waters to the Mississippi; nay, that in all probability there would be a surplus remaining in the treasury after the road was finished. The kind of road, its location, and the time of its completion, were all left with this government to be adjusted, under a fair interpretation of the compact. After proper examination, it was determined to commence at Cumberland, and strike the Ohio line at Wheeling, in Virginia.

On the 3d of March, 1808, Mr. Gallatin, then secretary of the treasury, reports to congress that the road had been located from Cumberland towards Wheeling, a distance of seventy miles, and adds, the expense of completing that part of the road is estimated at $400,000. This estimate shows that the average estimated cost of the road, over by far the most expensive part of it, was a trifle less than six thousand dollars per mile. The whole length of the road, from Cumberland to the Mississippi, as surveyed, is 650 miles; it may be a mile or two, more or less. Now take the estimated cost per mile, as reported by Mr. Gallatin, which was for the mountain region entirely, and remember that one-half less, it was supposed, would suffice to make the road across the level plains of the west, and we shall see at once how reasonable it is that the congress of that day, after receiving what was equivalent to six millions of dollars, should make an unconditional promise to construct the road to the Mississippi river.

The contract as then understood from the estimates was simply as follows:

Value of the tax released in favor of the federal government by the three western states	$6,000,000
Cost of the road, 650 miles, at $6,000 per mile, according to Mr. Gallatin's estimate for the first 70 miles	3,900,000
	$2,100,000

Leaving two millions in the treasury, after making the road as then estimated. Upon this view, founded on facts and representations of public men, contemporaneous with this compact, it is clearly shown that the states paid the federal government, what the parties then believed a full consideration for completing the road the entire distance proposed. From this, what follows? Why, surely, that the government promised to do what in conscience it ought, that is, to do the act which they were paid for doing—to make the road complete according to the contract.

But here, Mr. Speaker, I am told that whatever may have been the reasonable expectations of the parties, as to the completion of this work, when the contract was made, the government only bound itself to appropriate two per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands, and that this has been done, and no moneys remain of this fund applicable to the purposes of the contract. To this I reply, that such is not the contract, and I think I have shown this from the proofs already adduced. I grant you that two per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands are pledged for the performance of your promise to make the road; but this pledge does in no sense limit the contract for which it is only a mere security. Let it be remembered that, when this contract was made, the public lands were pledged for the payment of a large national debt. To increase the value of these lands, was one motive to make the road, and the states aided you in this, paid you for it, by relinquishing the taxes on them for five years after sale; it was, therefore, only fair, as the government was deeply in debt, that the states should have some security for the performance of your contract. This security was given by pledging the two per cent. named in the contract. But it was not the contract, it was only a security given to the states for its faithful performance. This interpretation is fortified by other stipulations in the contract. The time, manner, and location of the road are all left to the general government. Why was this? Because you had bound yourselves in general terms to make a road. And it was, therefore, only reasonable that you should have control over a work which you bound yourselves to finish. Had you bound yourselves only to pay, for the purpose of the work, a specified sum, such as the two per cent. mentioned, is it possible to suppose the states would have left you to appropriate their money, for which they paid you, in your own way and according to your own discretion? Such a contract, on the part of the states, would have been absolute insanity. It involves an absurdity too gross for serious consideration. This itself shows that the two per cent. fund was only a pledge, a security, and not, as some have supposed, the contract itself. Thus you have always construed the contract. According to your own admission, you have gone on to make the road without regard to the two per cent. fund. You say vastly more than this has been expended. Why did you do this, if only two per cent. on the sales of lands were to be given to the road? No rational answer can be given to this question but one. The two per cent. did not limit the contract, it only secured its performance; and this has been your own uniform construction of it, as evinced by all your conduct up to this day, through a lapse of more than thirty years.

Let me suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the two per cent. fund was all you promised, which, however, I by no means admit. You say it was to be expended by you; you are the trustee of the fund, and the agent for its appropriation. Be it so then, for the sake of the argument. What was this fund committed to your charge? Two per cent. upon the sales of one hundred and twenty millions of acres of land. This you was bound to sell for $2 per acre, for this was the price fixed by law at the time of the contract. This would produce $240,000,000. Two per cent. upon this would be $4,800,000. You had estimated the road to cost $3,900,000. Thus you see that, by every calculation based upon the state of things as existing at the date of the contract, the states and yourselves had a right to suppose that happen what might, if you acted up to your engagements, the road would be made. But $2 per acre was then the minimum price of the land, and we, being interested in the fund, had, and now have, a right to demand of you that you, as trustee, shall get as much more as possible by selling all the land at auction in the way fixed by law as it then stood. Now let us see how you have complied with the law and reason of this contract, in the management of the fund given in trust for its execution. In the first place, you sunk the value of the fund nearly one-half by reducing the price of the land from $2 to $1 25 per acre. In the second place, you have given away immense amounts of this fund in bounty lands to soldiers, which you never can sell, and for which you can render no account. Thirdly, you have given to individuals, for purposes unconnected with this contract, a very large amount which never has or can be accounted for upon the principles of your solemn engagements with us. Fourthly, you have given very large amounts to the states to make canals, exacting from them as an equivalent the right to carry your mails, arms, armies, and munitions of war on them free of tolls forever. Fifthly, you have given away many millions of acres in pre-emption claims at the minimum price, without any attempt to sell, and account (as you were bound to do) for the proceeds. Thus you, our agent to manage a fund destined to make our road, have so wasted it, and used it for own purposes, that you never can tell whether it would have produced the expected amount or not. What is the consequence in law, in reason, in justice? What follows? Why, sir, any justice of the peace can tell you. You, the agent, must answer for this by replacing, out of your own funds, what you have wrongfully taken from us. But as you have so disposed of the trust fund that you never can tell what, if sold at auction, it would have produced, and so cannot, by any certain rule, therefore, ascertain the amount you have taken wrongfully from us, you must suffer the inconvenience; you must take from your own funds, and do what, when you contracted with us, you affirmed this wasted fund would do, that is, complete the road in question from Cumberland to the banks of the Mississippi river.

Is not this equitable, fair, honorable, just? Why then stick in the bark? as the lawyers say. Why these pettifogging quibbles, these dilatory pleas? Does such conduct become a great nation? Sir, it has been said that honor is the vital principle of monarchy. You say you represent sovereigns—the sovereign people. Act then as becomes the dignity of your royal constituents. Leave no room to doubt your probity. Observe fully and entirely the faith of your promise whenever made. No such thing, says the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Clowney,) this morning. If you have made a contract, no matter; you had no constitutional power to do so, therefore cease your efforts to fulfil your engagements. And there the gentleman would stop; he goes no further. What a beautiful example of political morality would you then exhibit! Some years ago you entered into a contract, a treaty, with three sovereign states. You have received from them all they agreed to give you. You have their money in your pockets. Now you turn to these states, with all seeming honesty, and say, true I promised, but I had no right to promise, my conscience is affected, I have sinned, I repent, I will do so no more, but I will keep your money. I cannot violate my conscience by doing as I agreed. Oh, no, that is too wicked; I pray you do not ask it; but still I shall keep the money you paid me. Yesterday my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. Calhoun,) with a power of argument and generosity of sentiment equally honorable to his head and heart, spoke in favor of this bill; he adverted to certain objections made by his colleagues (Messrs. Graves and Underwood.) They had opposed the bill as partial in its operation, as giving to the three states through which the road passes a disbursement of money which Kentucky was not permitted to enjoy. He said the disbursements in Indiana would flow into Louisville, in Kentucky, where goods and even liquors would be bought, with which the labor on the road would be paid. Upon this another gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens) takes fire. "This (said he) shows the demoralizing tendency of the system! This is the motive to vote appropriations, that money be raised to buy whiskey for the poor laborer to drink!" Sir, I have no objection to the gentleman's moral lectures, but I do not see the necessity of throwing his moral sensibilities into convulsions at the sight of a glass of punch, while he can look with a sanctimonious composure at broken promises and violated national faith.

Mr. Speaker, I have one word to say, before I sit down, to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Underwood.) He spoke the other day in opposition to this bill. He did not deny that the Cumberland road might be useful; but as he could obtain no money here to enable his people to build dams and make slack-water navigation on Green river, he would not help us to make a road on the northern side of the Ohio. And then the gentleman proceeded in a grave disquisition upon our constitutional powers to make roads and improve rivers. What says the constitution? "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." What is the gentleman's commentary? You have, says he, a clear and undoubted right to improve rivers, but not so of roads. And why, Mr. Speaker, why? Do you, sir, remember the reason for this distinction? It was this: "Providence (says the gentleman) has marked out rivers as the proper channels and avenues of commerce." What a beautiful and exalted piety is here shedding its clear light upon the dark mysteries of constitutional law! And then how logical the conclusion! Thus runs the argument: Since it is not the will of God that commerce should be carried on dry land, but only on the water, the powers over commerce, given in the constitution by our pious ancestors, must be understood as limited by the Divine commands; and therefore, says he, you have power to remove sandbars and islands, and blow up the rocks out of rivers and creeks, to make a channel which providence has begun and left unfinished; but beware, he would say, "how you cut down a tree, or remove a rock, on the dry land, to complete what Providence has begun there. You have no power by law to do this last; besides, it is impious, it is not the will of God."

Mr. Speaker, I know of no parallel to this charming philosophy, unless it is to be found in the sayings of Mause Hedrigg, an elderly Scottish lady, who figures in one of sir Walter Scott's novels. In one of her evangelical moods, she rebuked her son Cuddie for using a fan or any work of art to clean his barley. She said it was an awesome denial of Providence not to wait his own time, when he would surely send wind to winnow the chaff out of the grain. In the same spirit of enlightened philosophy does the gentleman exhort us in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to cease our impious road-making, and wait the good time of Providence, who will, as he seems to think, surely send a river to run from Cumberland over the Alleghanies, across the Ohio, and so on, in its heaven-directed course, to St. Louis. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is not the author of this theory. Our Atlantic brethren, especially of the south, have long held the same doctrine. They have long since discovered that our glorious constitution was nothing more at last than a fish made for the water, and which can only live in the water. According to their views, he is a goodly fish of marvellous proper uses and functions while you keep him in the water; but the moment he touches dry land, lo! he sufficates and dies. The only difference between this school of constitutional lawyers and the gentleman from Kentucky is this: he believes your constitution is a fish that thrives in all waters, and especially in Green river slack-water; whereas his brethren of the south insist that he can only live in salt water. With them the doctrine is, wherever the tide ceases to flow, he dies. He can live and thrive in a little tide creek, which a thirsty musquito would drink dry in a hot day; but place him on or under the majestic wave of the Mississippi, and in an instant he expires. Mr. Speaker, who can limit the range of science! What hand can stay the march of mind! Heretofore we have studied the science of law to help us in our understanding of the constitution. Some have brought metaphysical learning to their aid. But now, in the middle of the 19th century, these labors are all ended. Ichthyology, sir, is the key to open all the doors that have hitherto barred our approaches to truth. According to this new school of philosophy, if you teach coming generations the "nature of fish," those great problems in constitutional law that vexed and worried the giant intellects of Hamilton, Madison, and Marshall are at once revealed and made plain to the dullest peasant in the land. Sir, if I appear to trifle with this grave subject, the fault is not mine; it arises from the singular nature and contrariant character of those arguments which I am most willingly compelled to combat.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Underwood) has inquired, with a very significant look, what has become of the three per cent. fund, given to the states, for improvements within their respective limits. He says he has inquired of the secretary of the treasury, and he can give him no account of the disposition the western states may have made of this fund, and hence the gentleman seemed to infer that no one could tell him any thing satisfactory on the subject. Sir, if your secretary of the treasury is the only source of information, then are the fountains of knowledge scanty, indeed and nearly dried up with us. If every thing is unknown which he does not know; if we can see nothing which has not been revealed to him, why, then, the Lord help us; the lights of the age burn dimly enough, and must be well-nigh extinct. Sir, if the gentleman, instead of consulting the "Penny Magazine" of the treasury, had gone to the libraries of this city and looked into the statistics of these states, he would have found that this fund had been faithfully, to the last dollar, expended in making roads "to and through" the public lands in the states; thus increasing the value and hastening the sale of your national property. The gentleman reproaches the three states on the right bank of the Ohio for having obtained from the national domain large grants for making roads and canals. Does not the gentleman know that in every instance you have received an equivalent for these lands, by obtaining from the states or companies the right to carry your mails, arms, troops and munitions of war, over such roads or canals, at all times free of charge? If you gave the alternate sections of land for a road or canal, you held up the remaining section at double your minimum price, and have always realized it, and thus made money for yourselves out of the capital and labor of the states, whilst you boast the transaction as a benevolence to others.

But, sir, Kentucky should be the last state in the union to raise an argument of this kind against her sisters of the west. How came she by the whole of that very Green river country which now comprises one-fourth part of that state? Virginia had reserved that territory to satisfy her revolutionary debt to her troops. When she ceded the northwestern territory to the United States, she reserved the land between the Little Miami and Scioto rivers (now in Ohio) as a residuary fund for the satisfaction of her revolutionary land warrants, if the lands reserved for that purpose in Kentucky should prove insufficient. Well, sir, what happened? Soon after this, Kentucky seized upon the whole Green river country, and refused to the war-worn veteran of the revolution the right to locate his warrants there. The consequence was, the whole country reserved in Ohio was exhausted, and the Virginia claims, to the amount of many millions, have been lately paid out of the treasury of the union in the shape of land scrip. Sir, I have said this domain, thus seized by Kentucky, was equal to one-fourth part of the state. Now, suppose you had given to Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, what Kentucky received—one fourth part of all the lands within their respective limits—sir, it would have constructed this road through their territories ten times over. And yet, with these facts all before him, the gentleman sits weeping over the dams and slack-water of Green river, like a froward child, spoiled by too much indulgence, complaining of its mother's partiality, to the really much less favored members of our common family. Sir, this is unlike Kentucky; it is unlike the uniform justice and generosity of both the gentlemen, (Messrs. Graves and Underwood,) who have so vehemently opposed this bill. I beseech them to desist. Cease to drive this jew's bargain with your sister states. Relax the miser's gripe you have laid upon your neighbor's rights. Throw away the knife of Shylock, clothe yourselves in the robes of justice and generosity. Stand out in your true characters, and in the proper costume of your noble state. Look upon this bill with the eye of an American statesman. The interests of the whole valley we inhabit in common are the same. You cannot separate them by lines or rivers. Sir, the same cloud that dispenses its fertilizing showers upon Kentucky drops fatness upon the states of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The same sun that warms vegetation into early and vigorous life, on the rich plantations of Kentucky, also mellows the fruit and ripens the harvests that cover the vast plains outstretched upon the right bank of the Ohio. The God of nature has decreed us a common lot, and it is vain and impious to offer our feeble opposition to his will.

Mr. Speaker, some gentleman have complained that one section of land out of every thirty-six has been given to the western states for the use of common schools. Do gentlemen recollect to whom this benefit results? Who are they that inhabit the great valleys of the west? Emigrants surely from the old states of the south and east. The children to be educated there are your children. Sir, we heard (some of us at least) an English gentleman (Mr. Buckingham,) in one of his interesting lectures lately delivered in this city, say, when speaking of British emigration to America, that he was sorry they had not sent to this country better specimens of their population. Sir, I can say to my friends on this side of the mountains, with equal sincerity, as to some of those you send out, "I am sorry you did not send us better specimens." But the truth is, we get in the west the very best and the very worst of your population. The poor come there for bread, and the enterprising and industrious to find a field which gives ample scope to their energies, and rewards to their labor. This fund, then, is for the education of the poor, and the rich, too, if any such there be, which you send in masses every year to the west. And can I assure gentlemen it has been faithfully applied in Ohio. It has been added to by heavy taxation upon our people. Some gentlemen, (I speak it in no spirit of pride or vain boasting,) some gentlemen from the old states might learn something new to them in the history of civilization, would they but visit that western world, of which they often seem to me to know little. They might see there, in the very spot where but yesterday the wild beasts of the wilderness seized their prey by night, and made their covert lair by day, on that same spot to-day stands the common school house, filled alike with the children of the rich and poor—those children who are to be the future voters, officers, and statesmen of the republic. Over that vast region, so lately red with the blood of savage war, the seed-fields of knowledge are planted, and a smiling harvest of civilization springs up. And there, too may be seen what a christian statesman might well admire. The schoolmaster is not alone. That holy religion, which is at last the only sure basis of permanent social or political improvement, has there its voices crying in the wilderness. Upon the almost burning embers of the war-fire, round which some barbarous chief but yesterday recounted to his listening tribe with horrid exultation, his deeds of savage heroism, to-day is built a temple dedicated to that religion which announces "peace on earth, and good-will towards men." Yes, sir, all over that land, side by side with the humble school house, stand those

"steeples-towers

"And spires whose silent finger-points to Heaven."

Is it sir, can it be in the heart of an American statesman, to check in its progress, or crush in its infancy, a social and political system, which has tendencies and fruits like this? But, sir, I find myself tempted, by themes so full of hope, to wander, as some may think, into subjects having a bearing upon the immediate question, too remote to justify their discussion here. I beg to remind this house that the bill now before it is a part, small, indeed, but still a part of a system of policy which long ago you established for the western country, which hitherto you have cherished, and which aided by the patient, persevering labor of your people there, has produced the happy results which I have so hastily and imperfectly laid before you. I feel an assured confidence that I do not plead in vain to an American congress in such a cause. Still should I unhappily be mistaken in this, conscious of the rectitude of my own motives, I shall cheerfully submit to whatever decision it shall please the house to make.

When Mr. Corwin concluded, the previous question was demanded by Mr. Casey, and carried; and the main question being put on ordering the bill to be read a third time, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Beatty, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, J. Calhoun, Casey, Chambers, Childs, Coffin, Corwin, Cranston, Curtis, Cushing, Davee, Davis, Dunn, Ewing, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, R. Garland, Goode, William Graham, Grant, Gray, Greenell, Haley, Halstead, Hammond, Hauser, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Howard, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, Jennifer, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, Leadbetter, Lincoln, Logan, Marvin, Samson, Mason, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Miller, Mitchell, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Parmenter, Patterson, Paynter, Peck, Petrikin, Phelps, Pope, Potts, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Russell, Sheffer, Sibley, Snyder, Southgate, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Webster, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittelsey, J. L. Williams, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—96

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bouldin, Brodhead, Bruyn, Canbr'long, Wm. B. Campbell, J. Campbell, William B. Carter, Cheatham, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Crockett, Cushman, Dawson, Deberry, Dromgoole, Edwards, Elmore, Everett, Farrington, J. Fletcher, Fry, J. Garland, J. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise—80.

So the bill was passed to a third reading, and was on the same day, read a third time, and passed.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

May 24. After the disposition of the communication from the treasury department, in reply to Mr. Clay's resolution in relation to the receipt of bank notes as revenue, (as stated in our last,) on motion of Mr. White, the president's message and the communication of the secretary of war, on the subject of delaying, for two years, the removal of the Cherokee Indians, and of making further provision for their removal and for indemnities to be made to them, was taken up, and, after some remarks by Mr. White and Mr. Sevier, it was referred to the committee on Indian affairs.

On motion of Mr. White, the secretary of war was required to inform the senate whether any answer had been given by the Cherokee delegation to the propositions contained in his communication on the subject of the removal of the Cherokee Indians, and, if so, to transmit to the senate a copy of such answer.

The following bills were severally read a third time, and passed:

The bill to authorize the entry of lands in Arkansas covered by alleged, but unconfirmed, French and Spanish claims; and the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, which was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Knight, Linn, McKean, Morris, Nicholas, Robbins, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wright, Young—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Smith, of Connecticut, Trotter, White—18.

This bill was sent to the house, and subsequently returned with an amendment, in which the senate concurred.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to consider the bill making appropriations for the naval service for 1838.

Mr. Crittenden moved to amend it by striking out the appropriation for the exploring expedition.

This motion occasioned a debate by Messrs. Crittenden, Wright, Rives, Niles, Preston, and Davis, who gave way on the suggestion of Mr. Webster, and the action on the bill was suspended by consent, with a view to obtain better information in regard to the command by a lieutenant of a vessel rated at twenty guns, there being, apparently, an express law against it.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

May 25. After the transaction of some business of minor importance, Mr. Linn, from the special committee on the Oregon territory, reported the bill referred to them, for the occupation by the United States of the Oregon river, with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. L. stated that this bill was accompanied with a special report on the subject from the committee; which report he would ask to have read to the senate on Monday next.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year 1838.

The question being on Mr. Crittenden's motion to strike out the appropriation for the exploring expedition, Mr. Davis concluded the remarks which he commenced yesterday, in favor of this motion, not on account of any objection to the general object proposed by the expedition, which he highly approved, but because—as he argued at considerable length—there was every practical reason for want of confidence in the talent, promptness, and energy of those to whom the direction and disposal of the expedition were committed, and in whose hands they were still to remain; and because that, by the appointment of a commander of the expedition over the heads of more than a hundred superior officers, a fatal blow would be given to the feelings of honor and spirit of chivalry so all important in the navy; and especially because that, by the appointment of a lieutenant to command a twenty-gun vessel, an express law was violated, and, by the same appointment to command a squadron, there was also a violation of an express order of the department, under the hands of the navy commissioners, the secretary of the navy, and the president of the United States.

The question was now put on Mr. Crittenden's motion to strike out the appropriation for the exploring expedition, (about $200,000, in addition to $700,000 already expended,) and it was negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Morris, Prentiss, Rives, Robbins, Spence, Swift, White, Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, Trotter, Williams, Wright—27.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, by consent, was at once read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the senate took up the joint resolution introduced by Mr. Clay, of Ky. which was as follows:

Resolved, &c. That no discrimination shall be made as to the currency or medium of payment in the several branches of the public revenue, or in debts or dues to the government; and that, until otherwise ordered by congress, the notes of sound banks, which are payable and paid on demand in the legal currency of the United States, under suitable restrictions, to be forthwith prescribed and promulgated by the secretary of the treasury, shall be received in payment of the revenue and of debts and dues to the government, and shall be subsequently disbursed, in a course of public expenditure, to all public creditors who are willing to receive them."

Mr. Webster (Mr. Clay assenting) offered the amendment inserted in our last, for the proceedings on which see page 208.

May 26. Various bills of a private character were received from the house, and severally read twice and referred.

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Clay's joint resolution, prohibiting discrimination in the kinds of money received for the public revenue in its different branches, and requiring the receipt and disbursement of sound specie-paying bank notes.

The question being on Mr. Clay's motion (the privilege of modifying it having been refused to him) to strike out that clause in the resolution requiring disbursements to be made in the bank notes received, when the public creditor should be willing to receive them, the debate was continued on the resolution generally, and on its particular provisions, by Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Calhoun, Sevier, Wright, Rives, Niles, Morris, Smith, of Indiana.

In the course of the debate Mr. Rives suggested, but without offering it, an amendment to the resolution, requiring the secretary of the treasury not to demand the specie at the banks for the notes received, except for the purpose of securing the safety of the public funds; of carrying on the necessary operations of the government, or of preventing dangerous over issues of paper by the banks.

The motion of Mr. Clay, to strike out the clause of the resolution requiring the bank notes received to be paid out to those who should be willing to receive them, was carried in the affirmative: Ayes 44, no 1—Mr. Tipton.

Mr. Wright then moved to strike out the provision requiring the notes of sound specie-paying banks to be received by the government. This motion was carried in the affirmative as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, McKean, Merrick, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Webster, White—19.

The whole resolution now consisted only of the substitute for the first clause adopted yesterday on motion of Mr. Webster, prohibiting the issuing and enforcing of any order making discrimination in the kinds of money received in the different branches of the revenue; (that is simply annulling the specie circular, and prohibiting all similar orders hereafter.)

Mr. Morris then offered a long amendment requiring that the secretary of the treasury, acting under the resolution of 1816, should receive such notes, and none other, as are authorized by law to be paid out to the public creditors; that such notes should be presented monthly at the respective banks for payment, which should be deposited in special deposits as directed by law, or as the secretary of the treasury should think proper, and should there remain, till withdrawn by order of the secretary; that the notes of no banks should be received which issued notes of less denomination than $5, nor of any bank that should not be within — miles of the place where the notes should be offered in payment.

Mr. M. expressing a wish to speak on this amendment, and pleading indisposition for not proceeding this evening, (it being now half past 6 o'clock,) asked an adjournment; and the senate adjourned.

May 28. The Vice President presented the following:

A communication from the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of a senate resolution of February 28th, with tables of the rates of exchange, foreign and domestic, and of the prices of bank notes. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A communication from the secretary of war, in reply to a resolution offered by Mr. White, and informing the senate that no reply had been received from the Cherokee delegation to the measures proposed by the secretary of war in relation to further time for the removal and further indemnity of the Cherokee Indians, but that John Ross and another of the delegation had expressed their acquiescence to those measures. Referred, on motion of Mr. White, to the committee on Indian affairs.

A communication from the postmaster general, in reply to a senate resolution of the 23d instant, informing the senate that having no legal authority to require of the postmasters the receipt by them of bank notes, the postmaster general had issued no orders to that effect, but that postmasters generally had returned to the practice of receiving specie-paying banks' notes as they did before the suspension of specie payments. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A great number of private bills, a list of which was published in the house proceedings of Saturday last, all of them, but one, being bills granting pensions, were received from the house, and by consent referred, without reading, to the appropriate committees.

Mr. Buchanan presented a petition from Lucius W. Stockton, and Stockton & Stokes, praying interest on money awarded to them by the solicitor, and withheld by the postmaster general, the principal of which had been paid to them. Referred.

Mr. Norvell presented a copy of an act of the legislature of Michigan, which was understood to be the charter of a university, for which a grant of land had been asked from congress. Referred.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, it was Resolved, That when an act of congress pass for the settlement of any private claim, the secretary of the senate shall transmit to the officer charged with the settlement of such claim the original papers relating to such claim. [This serves as a general proviso to the senate resolution before offered by Mr. H. that such original papers shall remain in the possession of the secretary of the senate.]

Mr. H. also offered a resolution, which, being objected to, lies over one day, that the daily meetings of the senate should be hereafter at 11 o'clock, till otherwise ordered.

Several bills were reported from committees, read, and ordered to a second reading; among them was a bill reported by Mr. Niles authorizing an exemption of duty on foreign coal used in vessels propelled by steam.

The following bills were severally considered, and ordered to a third reading: The house bills to secure the payment of certain commissions on duty bonds to the collectors of the customs, (with an amendment); and for the relief of Moses Merrill, (with an amendment.) Also, the senate bill for the relief of Moses Merrill. The house bill for the relief of Henry Beamish was, on motion of Mr. King, indefinitely postponed. The senate resumed the consideration of the resolution prohibiting the secretary of the treasury from issuing or enforcing any general order, (like the specie circular,) making a discrimination in the kinds of money received in the different branches of the public revenue.

The question being on Mr. Morris' long amendment, (published in detail in Saturday's proceedings,) restricting (at this time) to utter exclusion the receipt of all bank notes,

Mr. Morris spoke at great length in favor of his amendment, and in defence of the specie circular, and in opposition to banks and banking generally. In concluding, he withdrew his amendment, and offered the following resolution, as an appendage to the resolution under consideration:

Resolved, That the joint resolution of 1816, authorizing the receipt by government of sound specie-paying bank notes, be, and hereby is, repealed.

This resolution was rejected without debate, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Morris, Niles, Smith, of Conn., Strange—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Ky., Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana; Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, Young—36.

The question now recurred on the resolution (in the form given to it by Mr. Webster's substitute) which was as follows:

"Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives, &c. That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues, accruing to the United States, may be paid."

In this form the resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan; Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, Williams, Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, Linn, Morris, Niles, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange—10.

Mr. Webster now moved an adjournment, (with the view of making some remarks on the subject to-morrow,) but withdrew the motion with a view to take up the general orders.

A number of bills for the relief of individuals were ordered to a third reading, and then the senate adjourned.

May 29. After some unimportant business had been disposed of on motion of Mr. White, the message of the president, and the documents on the subject of the removal of the Cherokee Indians, were ordered to be printed.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Hubbard that the senate meet daily hereafter at 11 o'clock, (modified by the mover so as to read from and after Monday next,) was taken up, and, after a brief conversation, was, on motion of Mr. Norvell, mainly on the ground that it would interfere with the business of the standing committees, laid on the table: Yeas 26, nays 14.

Several bills, among them the bill to secure the payment of certain commissions on duty bonds to collectors of the customs, and the bill to confirm land claims in Louisiana, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The senate took up the resolution of Mr. Clay, as amended by the senate, modified by the mover, at the suggestion of Mr. Webster, prohibiting the secretary of the treasury from issuing or enforcing any general order, like the specie circular, making discrimination in the kinds of money received for revenue in its different branches.

The resolution having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Webster addressed the senate at considerable length explaining the nature, relations, and bearing of the resolution, and touching on various topics connected with its subject-matter. Mr. Strange spoke in reply to Mr. Webster, and in opposition to the resolution, arguing, especially, that the resolution of 1816 was merely permissive, and that even in this view it ought to be repealed, and a total separation made between the business of government and banks. Mr. Webster, in reply to Mr. Strange, said that the word may was not used in the resolution of 1816, and argued that it was just as obligatory on the department to receive good bank notes as treasury notes. Mr. Strange responded that, although the word may was not used, the expression of the resolution was equivalent to the import of that word. Mr. Calhoun spoke at considerable length, denying that the resolution of 1816 gave any discretionary power whatever, arguing great danger in any such discretionary power, and objecting strongly to the resolution that by implication it surrendered such power. Mr. Webster argued and insisted that the resolution went only to restrain and not at all to surrender such discretion. He would gladly take away all unnecessary discretion, but finding that impracticable he was willing to go as far as he could in restraining and controlling it. Mr. Benton read and argued chiefly to show that the secretary of the treasury would be very liable to censure, whatever he might do under the resolution of 1816.

Mr. Lumpkin, in explanation, said he had voted against this resolution, as an amendment to the sub-treasury bill, because he did not wish to embarrass that measure. He should now, without any change of opinion vote in its favor. Mr. King argued, briefly, that the resolution of 1816 was never considered obligatory; he insisted that it was well known to be otherwise when it was adopted, and had always been practised upon as discretionary.

Mr. Clay, of Ky., expressed regret that the second portion of his resolution had not been adopted; and he hoped that some farther remedies might be provided, especially the repeal of the provision in the deposit law of 1836, by which the notes of a denomination less than $5 are now excluded from being received.

After a few remarks by Messrs. Hubbard and Webster, the resolution was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Webster, White, Williams, Young—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Hubbard, Morris, Niles, Smith, of Connecticut, Strange—9.

The senate then adjourned.

May 30. After several private bills had been disposed of, Mr. Davis rose, and said that the house bill for the relief of Henry Beamish had been considered by the committee on commerce, and reported to the senate with a recommendation for its indefinite postponement: but, understanding that additional testimony in its favor was about to be sent in, Mr. D. had requested that it might remain on the table for a few days. Owing to the absence or inattention of Mr. Davis, or to the fact that he frequently could not hear even the title of a bill, and much less its substance, this bill, two days before, but within the time entitling it by the rules to a motion for reconsideration, had, notwithstanding, been taken up, and indefinitely postponed. As this was evidently a mistake on the part of the senate, and as the additional testimony expected had now arrived, Mr. Davis moved that a message be sent to the house, asking the return of said bill, with the accompanying documents.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. Wright, Calhoun, and Lumpkin, advocated by Messrs. Davis, King, Bayard, Buchanan, Tipton, and White, chiefly on the grounds of a different construction of the rules, and of establishing a troublesome precedent, and it was carried in the affirmative without a division.

This bill and the documents were subsequently received from the house, and a motion made by Mr. Davis to reconsider the vote for indefinite postponement of the bill was laid on the table till the committee on commerce should report on the new testimony which had been received.

Mr. Webster offered the following resolution, and asked its consideration at this hour:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed to take into consideration the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "an act to regulate the deposit of the public moneys," and to inquire whether, according to the provisions of that act, it is now competent for the secretary of the treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments; and, also, to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying those provisions of the said act which prohibit the receipt, in payment of debts and dues to the United States, of the bills of all banks issuing notes of a less denomination than five dollars, and to report their opinion thereon.

The immediate consideration of this resolution requiring the unanimous consent of the senate, and being objected to by Mr. Morris, the resolution consequently lies over one day.

Mr. Webster here offered the resolution noticed in our last paper.

The bill making indemnity to the legal representatives of John J. Bulow, deceased, for property destroyed by the Indians, on the ground that it had before been recently occupied by the United States troops, was taken up, advocated by Messrs. Hubbard, Bayard, and Preston, opposed by Messrs. Buchanan and King, and on motion of Mr. Buchanan, laid on the table—Yeas 22, nays 13.

The bill in regard to the town of Southport, in Wisconsin, was taken up, discussed (mainly on the question of the comparative eligibility of several different places for a harbor) by Messrs. Wright, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, and Niles, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The senate then adjourned.

May 31. Mr. Buchanan presented the petition of Francis P. Blair, stating that he, with col. A. Crockett, was security for Samuel B. Crockett, a delinquent postmaster, and praying an abatement of the amount in default, for the whole of which the postmaster general holds him responsible; and stating also that he had received from the department, when under Mr. Barry, $1,500 as payment for actual services rendered the department, the whole of which Mr. Kendall holds, notwithstanding, as a balance against him; Mr. B. in this case also praying relief. Referred.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, presented two memorials from citizens of Hartford county, Connecticut, and of Jamaica, Long Island, praying the establishment of a national bank, which Mr. C. accompanied with some remarks that occasioned a discussion. (to be given hereafter,) in which Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Clay, of Alabama, King, Niles, and Wright participated. The petitions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed, (with the names, at the desire of Messrs. Wright and Niles.)

After several petitions from individuals had been presented, and the committee on commerce and pensions had been severally discharged from the consideration of several petitions which had been referred to them, the resolution concerning banks, offered yesterday by Mr. Webster, was taken up, modified by Mr. W. so as to extend the inquiry as to the competency of the secretary of the treasury to receive bank notes, to those banks which, since the passage of the deposit act of 1836, had issued notes under the denomination of five dollars, as well as those that had suspended; and in this form the resolution was adopted.

The bill from the house requiring the United States district court to be held at Jackson, Tennessee, was read twice, and referred.

The senate took up, on its third reading, the bill in regard to Southport, Wisconsin.

This bill, at considerable length, was opposed by Messrs. Sevier and Calhoun, chiefly on the ground that the bargain with the citizens of Southport, by which they were to have the land, all of which yet belonged to the United States, at a great excess above the minimum price, with which excess they were to construct the harbor, was a bad precedent, rather beneath the dignity of the government, as well as injurious to its interests; and it was advocated by Messrs. Buchanan, Clay, of Ala., King, White, and Webster, on the ground that if the late pre-emption bill should pass without this, the whole of this land would fall, at an immense profit, into the hands of two or three individuals, at whose mercy the citizens of this place (50 or 60 families) would thus be left, and the government must still construct the harbor at its own expense, thus adding greatly to the profit of these two or three speculators.

The bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clayton, Crittenden, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Prentiss, Rives, Robinson, Smith, of Ind., Spence, Swift, Trotter, Wall, Webster, White Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Lumpkin, Niles, Pierce, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Southard, Strange, Tipton, Wright—11.

The Vice President presented a communication, with a report and documents, (the subject not stated by the chair,) which were referred.

The bill to establish the territory of Iowa from a portion of Wisconsin, was made the special order for to-morrow.

The following bills, &c. were considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading:

In regard to a seminary of learning in Wisconsin. To disapprove and confirm an act of the legislative council of Wisconsin chartering a bank. Granting to the territory of Wisconsin in the alternate sections of the land on the line of a proposed canal to connect lake Michigan with Rock river. And for the relief of Guerdon S. Hubbard.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, May 22. Mr. Stone having offered a resolution directing the committee on the post-office to enquire into the expediency of a establishing a mail route from Kellysville, Marion county, Tennessee, to some point in Squirreltown, in Dade county, Georgia,

Mr. Connor asked leave to offer a resolution fixing the hour of meeting, during the residue of the session, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Objection being made, he moved for a suspension of the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 127, nays, 42. So the rules were suspended. Mr. Boon moved to amend the resolution by adding a provision for a daily recess from half past 2 to 4 o'clock. Mr. Reed advocated the amendment, on the ground that there would, in fact, be a recess; and it was better to have it all at once and under a rule. Mr. McKenna opposed it, hoping the members would agree to sit till 4 o'clock, which, in ordinary cases, he deemed late enough. The amendment was further advocated by Mr. Boon; when, Mr. Montgomery, to cut off debate, moved the previous question. The demand was sustained by the house. The previous question was carried, and the resolution adopted. So the hour for meeting is changed from 11 to 10 o'clock.

Mr. Sherrod Williams asked leave to make an explanation. Leave being granted,

Mr. W. stated that there was an erroneous statement in several of the public papers, conveying the idea that he had consented to accept a modification of his resolution (rescinding the effect of the specie circular) as proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Boon.) He had never said so. He had said to that gentleman, at one time, that he would accept as a modification the printed resolution from the senate on that subject: but after further examining that resolution, he had informed the gentleman that he could not do so. It applied only to one officer of the government, whereas his own resolution applied to all. Mr. W. then stated that he had modified his resolution so as to make it a joint resolution of both houses; and if the house would now agree to consider it, he was willing to modify it still farther, if any gentleman, should desire it. He explained why he had not earlier made an effort to get up the consideration of the resolution.

He then asked leave to move the resolution in the form which he preferred.

Objection being made by Mr. Cambreleng, he moved to suspend the rules, and demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered. Mr. Boon now wished to explain. Mr. Hopkins objected, as the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Williams) had gone into nothing personal, and it would only consume time. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Boon) had explained on a former day.

The question being taken on suspending the rules, the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Bond, Boon, Burden, Biggs, Wm. B. Calhoun, John Calhoun, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Cranston, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, R. Garland, Goode, James Graham, William Graham, Grantland, Gray, Greenell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, J. Jackson, H. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, Kennedy, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Marvin, S. Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKenna, Meneff, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parmenter, Peck, Pope, Potts, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, A. H. Shepperd, Shields, Sibley, Slade, Snyder, Southgate, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, J. L. Williams, Wise, Yell, Yorke—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Bouldin, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, Chapman, Cleveland, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cushman, Dawson, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Edwards, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, Isaac Elletcher, Fry, Glascock, Grant, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, Wm. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, J. W. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Martin, McKay, R. McClellan, A. McClellan, McClure, Moore, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Pennybacker, Petrick, Phelps, Potter, Pratt, Prentiss, Reilly, Sawyer, Sheffer, C. Shepard, Shepler, Spencer, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Towns, Turney, Vanderveer, Webster, Weeks, J. W. Williams, Worthington—88.

Two-thirds not voting for the motion, the house refused to suspend the rules to enable Mr. Williams to offer his motion.

Mr. Naylor obtained leave to offer a petition and have it referred.

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, from the committee of claims, reported a bill to continue in force an act passed on the 18th of January, 1837, to provide for the payment for horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States.

Mr. Whittlesey moved to go into committee of the whole on the bill to continue in force the act for the payment for horses lost in the last war. The motion prevailed, and the house accordingly went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Reed in the chair,) on that bill. Mr. Whittlesey briefly explained, expressing his hope that the provision, which had been formerly limited to two years, should, as now proposed, be rendered permanent. Mr. Graham, of Indiana, called for the reading of the act proposed to be continued; and it was read. Mr. G. then moved an amendment, the object of which was to extend the provisions of the law to mounted rangers in Indiana and Illinois, whose horses had been lost without fault on their part. Mr. G. explained at length, and advocated the amendment with great earnestness.

Mr. Hoffman moved for the rising of the committee; whereupon before any question was taken, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The Chair presented a communication from the president notifying the house of his approval of the bill to authorize the issuing of treasury notes to meet the current expenses of the government.

The Chair laid before the house a communication from the president concerning the Cherokee treaty, &c. of the same import as that noted in this day's proceedings of the senate. [See senate proceedings page 204.]

On motion of Mr. Bell, the communication was referred to a committee of the whole on the state of the union, and ordered to be printed. Mr. Cambreleng pressed a motion to go into committee of the whole on the state of the union with a view to take up the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities. Mr. Everett inquired of Mr. Cambreleng whether there was any estimate sent to the committee of ways and means for the expense connected with the subject in the message? and whether that committee intended to offer any amendments to the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities to cover those expenses? Mr. Cambreleng replied in the negative, and insisted that whatever might be done in reference to the message, the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities must still be passed, as three-fourths of its appropriations were for debts already incurred, and which must be met. Mr. Everett was of a different opinion, contending that the two subjects were intimately connected, because, if any thing should be done in this proposal of accommodation, there would be no necessity of keeping up the force in the Cherokee nation. Mr. Cambreleng observed that all the diminution of appropriation, in that case, would be simply in the pay of the troops, since they must be kept there until the final arrangement should be completed. Mr. Glascock wished the communication referred, not in the first place to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, but to the committee on Indian affairs. He warmly pressed a motion for reconsideration. On this motion a debate ensued, in which Messrs. Everett, Howard, Holey, and Reed took part, and which ended with a motion by Mr. Reed to lay Mr. Glascock's motion for reconsideration on the table. Mr. Holey demanded the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them. The motion was then negatived: Ayes 65, noes 68. The debate was further continued by Messrs. Bell, Cambreleng, and Cushing; when, the question being taken on reconsidering, it was decided in the affirmative: Ayes 73, noes 69. So the reference of the president's communication to the committee of the whole on the state of the union was reconsidered. That reference was then negatived: Ayes 72, noes 84. The question then recurred on a motion of Mr. Glascock, to refer the message to the committee on Indian affairs.

Mr. Everett moved to amend the motion so as to give the committee power to send for persons and papers, since, as matters stood, the committee could not know whether the proposals of the president had been accepted by the Cherokee delegation.

Mr. Dawson remonstrated very warmly against the consequences of giving the committee such a power; the object of which, he insisted, was to bring John Ross before the committee, and thus thrust the authority and influence of that chief in the way of the execution of the treaty of 1835 which must inevitably lead to an Indian war. He closed by moving that the president's communication be laid on the table and printed. He withdrew this motion at the request of Mr. Wise, who promised to renew it. He then replied with equal warmth to the speech of Mr. Dawson, denouncing the alleged treaty of 1835 in the strongest terms. He expressed lively joy at the reception of such a message, and complimented the president, as he said, for the first time in his life. Mr. Wise, in his eagerness, forgot to renew the motion, and Mr. Glascock obtained the floor. Mr. Wise now renewed the motion, but it was too late.

Mr. Glascock addressed the house with earnestness, insisting on the obligation of the treaty of 1835, and the sacredness of the vested rights of Georgia under it; the certainty that her citizens would take possession of these lands, and the imminent danger of an Indian war. Should the government attempt to overturn that treaty, Georgia would never be found wanting to herself, as she had once before proved. Mr. Atherton now demanded the previous question, (the effect of which would be to bring the house to an immediate vote on the reference to the Indian committee, and would cut off Mr. Everett's amendment.) Mr. Owens moved to lay the message on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Wise strenuously endeavored to get the floor farther to reply to Mr. Dawson and Mr. Glascock; but her Chair insisted on the rule which forbids debate after a motion to lay on the table. Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Legare, asked that the communication be read again. The Chair pronounced it out of order, as a motion had been made for the previous question. Some confusion arose. The Chair vindicated its decision; but, on earnest remonstrance, put the question on the reading of the message, though, as he insisted, not strictly in order. Mr. Wise insisted that the documents should also be read. The Chair now insisted on the rule. Mr. Wise took an appeal. The decision of the Chair was sustained. The question was now put on the motion of Mr. Owens to lay the message and documents on the table, and negatived by yeas and nays: Yeas 89, nays 118.

Mr. Montgomery appealed to Mr. Atherton, to withdraw his call for the previous question, and suffer the whole subject to be postponed for a week.

The Chair pronounced such a withdrawal out of order. The question was then put on sustaining the previous question and carried: Ayes 78, noes 53.

The previous question was then put and carried, and the reference to the Indian committee agreed to.

So the communication of the president, in reference to the treaty with the Cherokees, was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Cushing now resumed and concluded his speech in support of his motion to commit the president's message on the subject of the northwestern territory of the United States to the committee on foreign affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the river Columbia, for the defence and occupation of the territory of the United States watered by said river; and also to consider the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the intermeddling of the officers or subjects of foreign powers with the Indians of the United States.

Mr. Howard called for the reading of the instructions moved by Mr. Cushing; which were read accordingly. He then went at some length into a reply, not expressing any decided opinion as to the propriety of the measure to which his instructions looked, but throwing out a doubt whether this government could take possession, as proposed, of the country on the Columbia, in consistency with the stipulations of our convention with England. He had no objection to the instructions.

Mr. Elmore moved as a substitute the following:

Resolved, That the committee on foreign affairs be instructed to inquire into the extent of the country claimed by the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, on the northwest coast of the Pacific ocean; the title under which it is claimed, and the evidence of the correctness of the title; the extent of sea-coast, and the number and description of its harbors; the nature of the climate, soil, productions, and trade; and also whether it is expedient to establish a territorial government, or one or more military posts, as possession for the same or any part thereof; and what will be the expense necessary to establish the same, and the annual expense for its support; what fortifications and ships will be required for said territory, and what number of soldiers and sailors will be necessary for its protection, both in time of peace, and in case of a war with any foreign power; and that the committee report thereon to this house.

But subsequently agreed to add it to Mr. Cushing's as an amendment; in which form it was agreed to. The instructions, therefore, read as follows:

Resolved, That said communication be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post on the Columbia river, for the defence and occupation of the territory of the United States watered by said river; and also to consider the expediency of making further provision by law to prevent the intermeddling of the officers or subjects of foreign powers with the Indians of the United States.

"Also, to inquire into the extent of the country claimed by the United States west of the Rocky mountains, on the northwest coast of the Pacific ocean; the title under which it is claimed, and the evidence of the correctness of the title; the extent of seacoast, and the number and description of its harbors; the nature of the climate, soil, productions and trade; and also whether it is expedient to establish a territorial government; or one or more military posts, as possession for the same or any part thereof, and what will be the expense necessary to establish the same, and the annual expense for its support; what fortifications and ships will be required for said territory, and what number of soldiers and sailors will be necessary for its protection both in time of peace and in case of war with any foreign power; and that the committee report thereon to this house."

Mr. Elmore wishing to make some remarks, and it being past 4 o'clock, moved an adjournment; which prevailed.

And the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 23. After the reading of the journal, Mr. Tolluferro desired that the house be counted. He wished to know whether those who had voted to change the hour of meeting to 10 o'clock were, themselves, on the ground. The Chair stated that 87 members only were present. Mr. Turney moved a call of the house. On this motion Mr. Everett demanded the yeas and nays, which were accordingly taken; when the following was the result: yeas 63, nays 66.

Messrs. Sherrod Williams, McKenna, and Lyon obtained leave to present memorials.

Reports from committees were presented; among them the following: Mr. Whitelsey, of Ohio, from the committee of claims, made a report upon the propriety of amending the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved January 18, 1837.

Mr. Martin, from the committee on the judiciary, reported against the petition of R. H. White and others, asking aid to enable said White to procure witnesses to sustain himself in his defence at the suit of the government of the United States on a charge of burning the treasury building.

Mr. Everett, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported senate bill No. 75, to provide for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indians west of the states of Missouri and Arkansas, with an amendment.

Mr. Everett submitted an amendment to the 28th rule of the house, permitting any member of the house to have his name recorded on a question taken by yeas and nays, who shall come in before the last name is called. The proposed amendment was laid on the table.

The resolution to print an extra number of copies of the report of the committee on duelling, &c. coming up in order—

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, resumed and continued, for some time, his remarks in opposition to printing the report of the committee, but in favor of printing the evidence and journal of the committee. Before Mr. M. had concluded what he had to say, the morning hour expired.

Several bills from the senate received their first and second readings, and were referred to committees, &c.

The resolution offered by Mr. Cushing in relation to the occupation of the territory on the Columbia river came up next in order. Mr. Elmore, who had offered an amendment to Mr. Cushing's instructions, had the floor in support of that amendment, but waived his right to address the house. The question was then taken, and Mr. Cushing's resolution was adopted by the house. Several senate bills were read twice, and referred.

Mr. McKay asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to this house, with as little delay as practicable, the amount that will be required for the additional allowances proposed by him to be made to the Cherokees in his letter to John Ross and others, under date of the 18th of May, 1838, specifying under separate heads the amount necessary under each.

Objections being made, Mr. Bell moved a suspension of the rules; and the house suspended. The question being then on putting the question on the resolution at this time, objection was again made. Mr. Bell again moved to suspend the rules. They were suspended, and the resolution adopted.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the state of the Union. (Mr. Howard again in the chair,) on the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities.

The question being on the following amendment offered by Mr. Bell:

"Provided, that if the president shall ascertain that all dissatisfaction and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of 1835 can be allayed or avoided by allowing an additional compensation for lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that thereby the government may be saved the expense of keeping up the large military force within the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of dollars of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. Wise rose, and addressed the house with great animation on the general subject of our Indian relations; the past policy of the country in removing the Indians west of the Mississippi; the dangers which threaten our western frontier; and the course of Georgia toward the Cherokees. The late treaty with the Senecas, in the state of New York, was incidentally alluded to, which brought up Mr. Fillmore in explanation. Mr. Turns then rose in reply to Mr. Wise, and spoke in explanation and vindication of the course of Georgia in dealing with the Indians in her limits; in the course of which he made some very severe remarks on the character of John Ross, whom he declared to be openly in market. He deprecated the least delay in the execution of the treaty. Mr. Marvin made some statements in reference to the treaty with the Senecas. He gave a history of the getting up of an application to the senate to have all the circumstances of the alleged treaty thoroughly investigated. There were allegations on both sides. He expressed lively indignation as to the course pursued in the payment of the annuities of these Senecas.

cas. He gave a history of the difficulties of the Indians from the failure of their crops, and the holding back of the money by the agents who should have paid it, and the efforts to get the Indians to take goods instead of the money, although the annuity itself is but the interest of a fund originally belonging to the Senecas, and placed on trust in the hands of Gen. Washington. He animadverted with severity on the conduct and character of the Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn, whose unauthorized interference he deprecated as of itself sufficient to cast a suspicion over any transaction with Indians.

Mr. Cushing said that reference having been made, in this debate, to the circumstance that an agent of the state of Massachusetts had participated in the negotiation of the late treaty with the Seneca Indians, he wished, before the committee left that subject, to make a brief explanation of the facts in behalf of his state. In 1786 the states of New York and Massachusetts concluded a compromise of the claims of the latter in New York, by which a session of a certain part of the soil of New York was made to Massachusetts, the jurisdiction remaining with New York. This cession embraced the pre-emptive right of land in the occupancy of the Senecas. In 1788 Massachusetts conveyed a part of her pre-emptive right to Oliver Phelps and Nathaniel Gorham; and in 1791 conveyed the residue to Robert Morris. Massachusetts thus parted with all her title to the lands in question; but she had undertaken, and has anxiously endeavored, to see that justice should be done to the Senecas, in the negotiation of any treaty for the extinguishment of their occupation-title. Accordingly, in the negotiations of 1788 she employed the celebrated missionary, the Rev. Samuel Kirkland, the great friend of the Indians, to see to their interest; in 1791 the honorable William Shepard; and on the recent occasion Dr. Trowbridge. Mr. C. said that Massachusetts had no interest in these cases, but to exercise, in good faith, a parental care of the Indians. Whatever, therefore, might be the fact in regard to the late treaty with the Senecas; whether honestly obtained or not, (of which he (Mr. C.) was not prepared to judge,) he felt sure that the governor of Massachusetts, careful as he had always been of the rights of the Indians, had selected, as the agent of the State on this occasion, a gentleman, whose character for integrity and personal respectability gave reasonable assurance that the honor of Massachusetts would not be sacrificed in his hands.

Mr. Wise now moved a proviso to the bill, to the effect that no part of the money should be used in removing the Cherokees west of the Mississippi till the result of the pending negotiation should be ascertained.

But the amendment not being now in order, he gave notice that he should move it when in order.

Mr. Wise went at length into a further discussion of the general subject of the negotiation of the treaty of New Echota, speaking with great severity of the manner in which it had been effected, and especially on the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn in that matter. He quoted documents in support of his positions, commenting on them as he proceeded.

Frequent explanations were interposed, and questions put, during the speech, by Messrs. Dutton, Legare, Graham, Granland, Townes, and Downing.

Mr. W. had not concluded when he yielded the floor to a motion to adjourn, which was made by Mr. McKenna about 4 o'clock.

Before the house adjourned, the Chair laid before the house the following message from the president of the United States:

I herewith transmit to the house the copy of a letter addressed to me on the 28th ultimo, by the governor of Maine, enclosing several resolves of the legislature of the state, and claiming reimbursement from the general government of certain moneys paid to Ebenezer S. Greely, John Baker, and others, in compensation for losses and sufferings experienced by them respectively, under circumstances more fully explained in his excellency's letter.

In the absence of any authority on the part of the executive to satisfy these claims, they are now submitted to congress for consideration; and I deem it proper at the same time, with reference to the observations contained in Governor Kent's note, above mentioned, to communicate to the house of representatives copies of other papers connected with the subject of the northeastern boundary of the United States, which, with the documents already made public, will show the actual state of the negotiations with Great Britain on the general question.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, May 19, 1838.

[The following important papers are among those accompanying the above message:]

Department of State,
Washington, April 27, 1838.

The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has the honor, by the direction of the president, to communicate to Mr. Fox, her Britannic majesty's envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, the result of the application of the general government to the state of Maine on the subject of the northeastern boundary line, and the resolution which the president has formed upon a careful consideration thereof. By the accompanying papers,* received from the executive of Maine, Mr. Fox will perceive that Maine declines to give a consent to the negotiation for a conventional boundary; is disinclined to the reference of the points in dispute to a new arbitration; but is yet firmly persuaded that the line described in the treaty of 1783 can be found and traced whenever the governments of the United States and Great Britain shall proceed to make the requisite investigations, with a predisposition to effect that very desirable object. Confidently relying, as the president does, upon the assurances frequently repeated by the British government of the earnest desire to reach that result, if it is practicable, he has instructed the undersigned to announce to Mr. Fox the willingness of this government to enter in an arrangement with Great Britain for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration upon the basis of the original American proposition, and the modifications offered by her majesty's government.

The secretary of state is, therefore, authorized to invite Mr. Fox to a conference upon the subject at as early a day as his convenience will permit; and the undersigned will be immediately furnished with a requisite full power, by the president, to conclude a convention embracing that object, if her majesty's minister is duly empowered to proceed to the negotiation of it on the part of Great Britain.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. Fox the expression of his distinguished consideration.

JOHN FORSYTH.

H. S. Fox, esq. &c. &c. &c.

Washington, May 1, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official note of the 27th ultimo, in which you enclose to me a communication received by the federal government from the executive of Maine, upon the subject of the northeastern boundary line; and in which you inform me that the president is willing to enter into an arrangement with her majesty's government for the establishment of a joint commission of survey and exploration, upon the basis of the original American proposition, and of the modifications offered by her majesty's government, as communicated to you in my note of the 10th of January last; and you invite me to a conference, for the purpose of negotiating a convention that shall embrace the above object, if I am duly empowered by my government to proceed to such negotiation.

I have the honor to state to you, in reply, that my actual instructions were fulfilled by the delivery of the communication which I addressed to you on the 10th of January; and that I am not at present provided with full powers for negotiating the proposed convention. I will forthwith, however, transmit to her majesty's government the note which I have had the honor to receive from you; in order that such fresh instructions may be furnished to me, or such other steps taken, as the present situation of the question may appear to her majesty's government to require. I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my high respect and consideration.

H. S. Fox.

The hon. John Forsyth, &c.

Mr. Evans moved the postponement of the consideration of this communication to Friday next, and that it be printed. Mr. Cumbreleng hoped they were to have no premature debate on the subject of this message. These motions to postpone to a day certain had often proved great interruptions to the public business. Mr. Evans observed there were other sorts of public business worthy of the attention of Congress besides appropriation bills, whatever the chairman of the committee of ways and means might think; but, Mr. E. said, no interruption should be occasioned by him. Mr. Cumbreleng would not be understood to say that the subject of this message was not very important public business. He only deprecated having a premature debate under a motion to postpone to a particular day. Mr. Cushing protested against the notion that nothing constituted public business but the honorable gentleman's money bills. He also protested no less decidedly against gentlemen being prohibited from choosing their own time for their own motions, without being dictated to as to the order of business. The further consideration of the message was then postponed to Friday next. Mr. Wise asked that the amendment he had proposed to offer to the Indian appropriation bill might be printed; which was ordered.

And then the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 24. After a call of the house, (as stated in the last number,) Mr. Hoffman rose, and called the attention of the house to the fact that a very exceptionable document had been ordered to be printed, and was yesterday laid on the table. He referred to a message of the president of the United States enclosing communications from the secretaries of state and the treasury, in reply to a resolution of inquiry, adopted on the 30th April, 1838, calling for information as to the extent to which the deportation of foreign paupers to this country had been carried on. That document contained two extracts from the New York "Truth-Teller," in which there was nothing at all pertinent to the subject of inquiry, but which consisted of anonymous and violent denunciations of the mayor and city council of the city of New York. Mr. H. said he could not believe but that the transmission of this document, as a reply to the resolution of April 30, was the result of a mistake, to which the president himself could have been no party. The documents alluded to contained gross personal attacks upon individuals of character and respectability in New York, and Mr. H. thought that this was the first time that an ephemeral article of this kind, from the public press, without signature or responsibility, had ever been embodied in a message to that house from the executive, and that house asked to stamp it with their sanction. The president, if this indeed were the result of mistake, should have an opportunity of correcting it, as should also the secretary of the treasury, neither of whom, Mr. H. suggested, could have purposely transmitted such documents to that house. If it was intentional, the person actually responsible should be ascertained, and held up to the reprehension of the house and the country.

Mr. H. presumed that every member of the house had read this message. He was happy to say, as he did, with pride and pleasure, that many gentlemen of that house, as well as those in favor of the administration as those opposed to it, had expressed themselves in terms of strong disapprobation with regard to that document. He gave notice that it was his intention to offer the following resolution at the proper time, or something like it. He moved that the resolution be read for the information of the house:

Resolved, That the select committee to which was referred "the president's message, together with reports from the secretary of state and the secretary of the treasury, with accompanying papers, in answer to the resolution of the house of the 30th ultimo, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States," be discharged from the further consideration of the two papers numbered 8 and 9, annexed to the report of the secretary of the treasury, and that the same be returned to the president.

Mr. Beatty objected to the reception of the resolution at this time. Mr. Hoffman moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce the resolution, and asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered. Mr. Foster hoped that this subject might be postponed until to-morrow. Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, demanded the reading of the documents alluded to. Mr. Hamer asked for the reading of the resolution of inquiry, under which this information was given. Mr. Curtis said that it was recited in the message in question.

The clerk then read the resolution of the 30th April, 1838, as follows:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house copies of all correspondence and communications which have passed between this and any foreign government, and the officers or agents thereof, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States; also, what steps, if any, have been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States: provided such communications are not incompatible with the interest of the United States."

Mr. Hoffman proposed that the documents marked 8 and 9 should be read, omitting the preliminary ones. Mr. Curtis was desirous that No. 7 might also be read. Mr. Grant called for the reading of two others of the documents in question.

The documents were then read. [They shall have a place in our next "REGISTER."]

Mr. Bronson (before the reading was concluded) moved to suspend the further reading of these documents, but the house refused to sustain the motion, and the reading of the above papers was concluded. The reading being finished, Mr. Bronson requested Mr. Hoffman to withdraw his motion to suspend the rules, for the present; but Mr. H. declined to do so.

The question upon suspending the rules was then taken, (requiring two-thirds,) and was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Bell, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Wm. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Crockett, Curtis, Cushing, Dawson, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, R. Garland, Glascock, J. Graham, Wm. Graham, Grantland, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hawes, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, J. Jackson, H. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, N. Jones, Kennedy, Lincoln, Lyon, Mallory, Marvin, S. Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, McKennan, Menefee, Milligan, Mitchell, M. Morris, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Potts, Pratt, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, A. H. Sheppard, C. Shepard, Shields, Slade, Stanly, Stone, Stratton, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, Albert S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise, Yorke—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Boon, Brodhead, Bronson, Cumbreleng, J. Campbell, Casey, Cleveland, Clowney, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Foster, Fry, Gallup, Grant, Haley, Hammond, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, J. Johnson, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Martin, McKay, R. McClellan, A. McClellan, McClure, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Murray, Noble, Owens, Palmer, Parmenter, Pennybacker, Petrik, Phelps, Potter, Prentiss, Reily, Richardson, Rives, Sheffer, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stuart, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Wagener, Webster, J. W. Williams, Worthington, Yell—75.

So the rules were not suspended, and Mr. Hoffman was refused the leave to make his motion.

Mr. Thompson said that this was a question of privilege. He believed that these documents had been sent to the house without the knowledge of the executive. The information called for was specific, and the reply to the call was a collection of infamous and scurrilous libels from one of the common sewers of party abuse. Mr. T. suggested to the Chair to apply to the executive to know if this document was indeed sent to that house by his order. The Chair reminded Mr. T. that his remarks were not in order, no proposition being before the house. Mr. Thompson then asked leave of the house to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether document No. 9, and that which follows, accompanying his message of the 11th of May, were communicated to this house by his direction. This being objected to, Mr. Thompson moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the resolution he had indicated his intention to offer. Lost.

Reports of committees were then received, among them was the following:

By Mr. Thomas, from the committee on the judiciary, a bill to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and other securities of corporations created by acts of congress which have expired.

Mr. Johnson, of Virginia, from the committee of accounts, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution of the 30th of April, to vest in the house the appointment of librarian to the house, and to unite the office with that of the keeper of public documents; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Taylor, from the committee on invalid pensions, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That this house will, on Saturday next, after the hour of 12 o'clock, proceed to the consideration of bills which have been or shall then be reported from the committee on invalid pensions and the committee on revolutionary pensions.

Several bills from the senate, some with and some without amendment, being referred to appropriate committees, the house, upon motion, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Howard in the chair,) and took up bill No. 676, for the suppression of Indian hostilities. Mr. Bell's amendment was immediately under consideration. Mr. Harlan gave notice of an amendment. Mr. Wise who was entitled to the floor, resumed and concluded his remarks on that part of the bill relating to the removal of the Cherokees. Mr. Glascock followed at length, on the other side, and in favor of the bill. Messrs. Downing, and Graham, of N. C. spoke on the same side, and, before the latter finished his remarks, the committee, on motion of Mr. J. L. Williams, rose, and had leave to sit again.

After the passage of a senate bill to repeal certain provisions in the act imposing duties upon imports, and the first and second reading of a bill from the senate to settle the title of certain lands in Arkansas, the house took up the Cumberland road bill, (upon amendment thereto by the senate.) Mr. Pope moved that the house concur with the senate in its amendment. Mr. Ewing, of Indiana, objected to that clause of the amendment which restricted the labor on the road to certain points; but, at the instance of Mr. Pope, of Ky., and other members, withdrew his objection. He stated that his constituents felt aggrieved, and had petitioned to rescind the restriction mentioned, but he could not allow himself, as intimated, to endanger the bill, and would therefore not insist on the change, the senate being constituted as it is.

Mr. Campbell moved to refer the bill to the committee of ways and means. Motion negatived—ayes 50, noes 80. Mr. Ellmore moved that the house adjourn. Lost. Mr. Campbell moved to lay the bill and amendments on the table. A motion was made that the house adjourn, and lost. The yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table were ordered, and the house negatived the motion by the following vote—yeas 69, nays 84. A motion was then made to adjourn. Lost.

The house then concurred in the amendment of the senate, without a division; and then the house adjourned.

Friday, May 25. The Chair laid before the house the following message from the president of the United States:

To the house of representatives of the United States:

I herewith submit a report from the secretary of the treasury, explanatory of the manner in which extracts from certain newspapers relating to the introduction of foreign paupers in this country, and the steps taken to prevent it, became connected with his communication to me on that subject, accompanying my message of the 11th.

Sensible that those extracts are of a character which would, if attention had been directed to them, have prevented their transmission to the house, I request permission to withdraw them.

M. VAN BUREN.

May 24, 1838.

Treasury Department, May 24, 1838.

Sir: My attention has just been called to two extracts from one of the presses in New York city, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers, and submitted to the house of representatives with your message of the 11th inst. This department has been engaged in collecting information on that subject during the last two years, and, while so employed, the local difficulties, in some of the principal seaports, caused by attempts to prevent the introduction of such paupers, became a topic of frequent communication to it—sometimes by writing and printed statements, and sometimes in person by municipal officers.

Among other communications concerning it some were made, in the course of the last summer, by a part of the commissioners of health for the city of New York in a visit to the department, and others were made by some person feeling an interest in the question, by forwarding the extracts before mentioned, as containing matter pertinent to the subject.

Without a critical examination, they were placed on file with the clerk having particular charge of that business; and, when the papers in this department, concerning the introduction of foreign paupers, and, "also, what steps, if any, had been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States," were collected for you, in the preparation of a reply to the call of the house, these extracts were submitted in connection with other matter bearing on those inquiries.

This was done, in the pressure of business, without noticing the circumstances that in those extracts certain remarks and strictures of a personal character appear to be mingled, concerning the correctness of which the department of course knows nothing—which it could not desire to aid in republishing—and which, had they been observed at the time, would not have been communicated.

Respectfully, yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

To the PRESIDENT of the United States.

Mr. Russell observed that his colleague (Mr. Hoffman) was not now in his seat, but Mr. R. had prepared certain modifications of the resolution yesterday offered by that gentleman, and he wished the resolution moved by him to be now taken up and considered, that the president and secretary might have an opportunity to set themselves right before the house and the country.

Mr. Cambreleng said, after what the house had now heard, all that was necessary was a simple motion that the president's request be complied with, and that he have leave to withdraw the papers referred to in the message; for which end he moved the following resolution:

"That the committee to which the papers alluded to in the said message have been referred, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that they be withdrawn from the files, and returned to the president."

Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, thought that the course suggested by Mr. Cambreleng was the proper one. It was evidently through mistake that the papers had been sent. Mr. Dromgoole thought that the correct parliamentary course would be to discharge the committee from the further consideration of those documents.

Mr. Everett called for the reading again of the message and its enclosure; and they were read accordingly. Mr. McKennan moved that, as the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Hoffman,) who introduced this subject to the notice of the house, was not in his seat, the consideration of the message be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Adams preferred that the message and documents should be laid on the table until the gentleman from New York appeared in his seat. After the explanation which had been given, he presumed there would be no disposition on the part of any member to impute blame to the secretary of the treasury. Still, the fact itself was an important event in the relations of this house with the executive department, and the course of the house in regard to it should be deliberate and determined. The occurrence which had led to the conversation was, no doubt, unintentional on the part both of the president and the secretary. But, if it had been intentional, he had no hesitation in saying that it would have been one of the grossest violations of the privileges of the house, that ever had been committed by a president of the United States. It was evident, however, that the thing had happened without any such intention. Mr. A. would not apply any severity of principle to the intercourse between the house and the Executive. But the event itself was by no means indifferent or of small consequence. These offensive papers would go to the world, and would have as injurious an effect against the individuals concerned, the mayor of the city of New York and distinguished members of the corporation of that city, as if they had been communicated purposely. He should prefer that the consideration of the subject be deferred until the gentleman from New York should be in his seat; but it ought not to be put off till to-morrow, nor for a day, or a minute after that time. It was a question of privilege, and of the very highest order. He hoped it would be acted upon this day.

On motion of Mr. McKennan, the consideration of the resolution was postponed until after the committees should have reported.

Reports were then received. Among them was the bill from the committee on the District of Columbia, received from the senate for extending the charters of the banks in said District.

Mr. B. pressed for an immediate consideration of the bill. He said he was persuaded that it granted to the banks as good terms as they could obtain from either house. He considered the terms, indeed, as very hard ones; harder, probably, than any banks ever had to submit to from a state legislature. But, at present, both the banks and the citizens were in a state of painful suspense; and did not know what to do; and it would be a relief to them to have the bill immediately acted upon.

Mr. Petrikin moved to postpone the consideration of the bill to Monday week. He remonstrated warmly (though almost inaudibly to our reporter, from the noise in the house) against the bill, and against having it crammed down the throats of gentlemen without time for consideration.

Mr. Bouldin reminded the gentleman and the house that the charters of the banks would expire on the 4th of July next. If the bill was not acted on speedily, it would be too late to act upon it to any useful purpose.

Mr. Thomas said, on account of the deep interest his own constituents had in this bill, he must say a few words in regard to it. It was very true that the charters of these banks would expire on the 4th of July next. It must be plain to every gentleman that the house could not, at this time, take up the general subject of banking, or discuss the question of chartering these District banks for fifteen or twenty years. He was glad to learn that the banks were willing to accept the charters extended to them in this bill, which did but prolong their corporate existence for two years, and that on terms advantageous to all. The effect of the bill would be to distinguish between the sound and the unsound banks in the District; so that, before congress shall meet the next time, it would be fully ascertained which banks were, and which were not worthy of public confidence. The passing of the bill would be the very best mode of settling that point. He hoped gentlemen on all sides would consent to act on the bill at once, and that it would pass in its present shape.

Mr. Mercer added the expression of his wish that the bill should be acted on now. His own constituents were deeply interested in its fate. The terms granted by it to the banks were very hard; so hard, that if there were time for the discussion he should make an effort to mitigate their severity; but as this might endanger the bill he would not press it. He considered this as peculiarly an unfit time to enter into a general debate on the subject of banking; it could scarce avoid being tinged more or less by party spirit. He trusted that the bill, therefore, such as it was, would be acted on without delay.

Mr. Jenifer said it was important to all parties interested that some speedy action should be had upon the bill just reported, as the charters of all those banks would expire by limitation on the 4th July next. He agreed with the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Mercer,) that the provisions of the bill might operate with considerable prejudice, not only to the institutions, but to all who were in any manner concerned in the circulation of the notes of the District banks. There were three conditions contained in the bill as it came from the senate, and which has been reported by the committee for the District of Columbia, without amendment, one of which, if adopted, might press heavily upon those institutions, without any benefit whatever to the community. The bill proposes to extend the charters of those banks for two years after the expiration of their present term, upon condition—

1st. That from and after the passage of this act, they shall cease to pay out any note under the denomination of five dollars.

2d. That after the 1st day of August next, all notes of five dollars shall be paid in specie; and

3d. That after the first January next, specie payments shall be made in full for all their notes, and sooner, if the principal banks of Baltimore and Richmond should pay specie for their notes.

Mr. J. said it was to the second condition to which he had objection. The banks of Maryland and Virginia do not pay specie for their notes of any denomination; and what will be the consequence of the District banks resuming? Certainly, if there continues to be a demand for specie, no matter how low the premium the five-dollar notes of the District may be at, the banks will be called on to redeem them in specie. The result will be, that the banks will be compelled not to issue any notes of five dollars of their own, and those of Maryland and Virginia of that denomination will be substituted for them. All the notes now in circulation, and there is a considerable amount of five-dollar notes out, will speedily find their way back to the banks from which they were issued. And should those banks refuse, as they will, no doubt, to reissue them, a clamor will be raised against them for not furnishing a specie circulating medium. If the banks throughout the country, or those of Baltimore and Richmond, paid specie for their five-dollar notes, then the condition would be a salutary one. But the effect inevitably will be to withdraw from circulation all the five dollar notes of the banks of the District of Columbia until the first of January, when a general resumption of specie payments is contemplated, and a substitution in their place of similar notes of banks of surrounding states, over which congress has no control.

Let it not, then, be said hereafter, to their prejudice, should a petition be made for a renewal or modification of the charters of those banks, that they refused to issue five-dollar notes for the accommodation of the surrounding community, when you will, by your own act, have driven them out of circulation.

Mr. J. said he apprehended that his colleague (Mr. Thomas) was mistaken when he said the bill was acceptable to those interested. The directors of those institutions, it is true, may be compelled to accept the terms proposed by this bill, more particularly as a refusal to do so would, after the 4th of July next, forfeit their charters.

Another objection to the bill is, that it leaves them no option, and, therefore, they must accept whatever terms you choose to impose, or their charters will be forfeited. Mr. J. said at a proper time he intended to move an amendment providing time to enable those banks to wind up and close their concerns, should they deem it inexpedient to accept a continuation of their charters upon the terms proposed by the bill. He should also move to strike out the second condition, believing it to be more oppressive than the conditions imposed upon any of the banks by the states. He did not consider it expedient or prudent at the present time to deal more rigidly with the banks in the District of Columbia than had been exercised by the states of Virginia and Maryland towards their institutions.

Mr. Petrikin again took the floor against the bill, demonstrating, with some warmth, against the idea that the house was to be governed in its legislation by the wishes of the banks. Were banks to dictate to congress what laws they should enact? It was an insult to the house. This dictation was the work of bank officers and bank directors, not of the stockholders. The poor stockholders were mere machines, ciphers, to be used for the benefit and at the pleasure of the bank boards. He denounced the bill as a fraud on the community, professed war against the welfare of the people of the District, and challenged an investigation of the affairs of the banks. He complained that all the measures of the District committee were, in this way, forced down the throats of members. He insisted that on the very face of the bill it was an imposition on the people: it left an open question as to which were the most respectable banks of Baltimore and Richmond. Who was to settle this point? was it the courts of justice, or these bank themselves?

Mr. Bouldin moved the previous question. Mr. Adams said he wished to offer an amendment to the bill, and hoped the motion for the previous question would be withdrawn. He was in favor of the bill, and desirous that it should pass without delay, but desired opportunity to propose an amendment. Mr. Bouldin declined to withdraw his motion, as he was convinced no better terms could be obtained, and amendments would only risk the bill. The call for the previous question was seconded—Ayes 74, noes 60.

Mr. Dromgoole demanded the yeas and nays, but the house refused to order them. The previous question was then put, and carried. The main question, on ordering the bill to its third reading, was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Bronson, J. Campbell, W. B. Carter, Cheatham, Clark, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Dawson, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, J. Garland, R. Garland, Glascock, J. Graham, Wm. Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Gray, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Hauer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Herold, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Logan, Mallory, Marvin, Samson, Mason, Maury, Maxwell, R. McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Morgan, M. Morris, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Palmer, Parmenter, Pearce, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pickens, Potts, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reilly, Rencher, Rhett, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Ruess, Russell, Sheffer, A. H. Sheppard, C. Shepard, Shields, Slatte, Southgate, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Tillinghast, Toucey, Vail, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, Albert S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise, Worthington—133.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Aycrigg, Wm. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Connor, Cushing, Cushman, Davee, Dromgoole, Fairfield, Goode, Halsted, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, Jennifer, Keim, Leadbetter, Loomis, McKay, A. McClellan, Montgomery, Owens, Patterson, Peck, Petrikin, Potter, Robertson, Shepler, Snyder, Poland, Turney, Underwood, Webster, Jared W. Williams, Yell—41.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

When the question as to the time of the third reading was put, Mr. Petrikin moved Monday week; but the house refused that motion, as well as another for Monday and another for to-morrow; and ordered the bill to have its third reading at this time.

The bill was accordingly read a third time; and the question being, shall the bill pass?

Mr. Adams moved that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to report, as a fourth condition of the charter, that the banks shall make no dividends during a suspension of specie payments. On this motion he demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. Fillmore inquired whether the bill contained any clause requiring an acceptance of the charter on the part of the banks? This he considered was necessary, in order that, if the banks failed to comply with the conditions of their charters, the holders of their notes might have a hold upon them for their money. Such was the practice in New York.

Mr. Bouldin said he had not the smallest objection to both the amendments, but he was opposed to the recommitment as likely to be fatal to the bill. He was not, himself, an advocate of all the clauses of the bill; some of them he thought very hard ones; and he was not for breaking the bones of the people of this District because they could call him to no reckoning. But he had diligently informed himself of the probable effect of this sending the bill back to the senate, and also of what were the wishes of the people of the District, not only the stockholders of these banks, but the people of the District generally, and the result was that he must refuse his assent to the commitment of the bill.

[Here the morning hour expired.]

Mr. B. moved to suspend the rules to consider this bill.

Mr. Adams reminded him that the existence of the globe did not depend on the passage of this bill; it could lie over till to-morrow, without any general calamity or catastrophe.

The motion for suspension of the rules was rejected. So the subject lies over till to-morrow.

The subject of the president's message, received to day, now again came up in order, and an interesting debate ensued; of which we shall present a report in the next "REGISTER." At present we can only state that Mr. Hoffman addressed the house, expressing his gratification that the president had fully exonerated himself from all blame in this affair; he did not seem much inclined to acquit the secretary for having such a document placed on file and sending it through the president to the house without examination. Mr. Dromgoole thought the committee ought first to be discharged from the consideration of these documents before any question was made as to returning them to the president. Mr. Whittlesey inquired whether, if the resolution of Mr. Hoffman passed, the obnoxious documents would remain on the files of the house, and be bound up with the documents of the house? The Chair thought they would not. He was told by the clerk that the message and documents would be reprinted, omitting these. Mr. Atherton spoke in defence of the secretary. Mr. Briggs replied, and expressed strong disapprobation of the placing such documents on file at all. Mr. Cushman asked Mr. Russell, whether he did not know that such documents were in the department when he offered the original call for the papers on the subject of paupers? Mr. Russell denied all knowledge of it.

Mr. Cushman made a short speech in defence of the secretary. Mr. Hoffman replied, warmly complaining that documents so injurious to his constituents should be placed in the archives of the government, and sent to the house of representatives.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, inquired whether these documents had been furnished by the department in a written form, and duly certified, or in a printed form, and without certification?

Mr. Russell produced the originals as sent to the committee, consisting of portions cut out from a New York paper called the "Truth Teller." Mr. Calhoun expressed strong regret at such a mode of responding to a call from congress. Mr. Menefee addressed the house; and, in the course of his speech, referred to the doctrine maintained by president Jackson, at the time of the removal of the deposits, respecting the irresponsibility of subordinate officers, and the responsibility of their superior for their acts; which he applied as an argumentum ad hominem, though he reprobated it himself as abominable.

Mr. Sibley proposed, as the subject of the abuse of the character of citizens in public documents was under consideration, that the president have leave also to withdraw that portion of his annual message in which he imputed to the people of the state of New York the bartering of their elective franchise for the favor of banking institutions, &c.

Mr. S. was repeatedly checked by the Chair, and called to order by members as discussing a subject not connected with the resolution before the house. He then said that he should avail himself of a future opportunity to bring this subject up.

Mr. Crary ended the debate by moving the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Reed, who asked whether the clerk could withdraw a document which had been printed by order of the house? He thought not. Besides, if these documents should be withdrawn from our files, the message of this morning would be unintelligible for want of the documents to which it related. The call for the previous question was sustained: Ayes 102. The previous question was put and carried. And the resolution of Mr. Cambreleng, as given above, was then agreed to without division. Mr. Cambreleng moved that the message of the president and the accompanying documents be laid on the table, and printed. Mr. Harlan demanded a division of the question; and it was first put on laying the message on the table, and carried. The question then recurring on the printing, Mr. Harlan stated, in reply to Mr. Atherton's apology for the secretary, that the printed scraps from newspapers which had been produced by the gentleman from New York (Mr. Russell) had on their margin, in the handwriting of

Mr. Woodbury, a memorandum directing the clerk that they should be filed among the papers in relation to paupers. After a few words from Mr. Crary, the question was carried, and the printing ordered.

The hour then passed to the consideration of private bills, of which a large number were disposed of. And then the house adjourned.

Saturday, May 26. Mr. Everett, from the committee on Indian affairs, reported a bill to provide for running the boundary lines of lands assigned to Indian tribes west of the Mississippi, and for surveying portions thereof to be held in severally.

Mr. Mathias Morris, from the committee of expenditures in the department of state, made a report at length in relation thereto.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, resumed and concluded his remarks upon the proposition to print extra copies of the reports, evidence, and journal of the duelling investigation committee.

Mr. Potter made a few remarks, in reply, and suspended his remarks when the morning hour elapsed, and the house passed to the orders of the day.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, the house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. McKennan in the chair,) and took up the pension bill (calendar; and, having considered them severally, a large number were reported to the house, as having passed in committee without amendment. They also reported several bills with amendments, and asked leave to sit again on others, in which they reported progress, which was granted.

It was then proposed to take the question on engrossing the bills, whose titles are above given, en masse.

The chairman of the committee on revolutionary and invalid pensions having stated that each of the bills had been acted on separately in committee, this course was adopted, and the above recited bills were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day.

A number of bills, amended by the committee, were next taken up and ordered to a third reading. Several bills, (giving room to debate) were laid aside in committee, and leave granted to sit again thereon.

The bill for the relief of capt. James Hunter, which had been postponed in the early part of the day, was then taken up for consideration, and after debate, read a third time, ordered to be engrossed, and finally passed.

Mr. Taylor moved that the house go again into committee of the whole on those bills upon which progress had already been made, and on which leave had been granted to sit again. The motion prevailed, and Mr. McKennan resumed the chair; and the committee first took up the bill for the relief of Benjamin Gannett. [This bill presents a curious case. The claimant is represented as the surviving husband of Deborah Gannett, to whom he was lawfully married on the 7th day of April, 1764: that she died on the 29th of April, 1827. In the early part of her life she said Deborah enlisted as a soldier in the army of the revolution, under the assumed name of Robert Shurtleff, where she faithfully served her country three years, and was honorably discharged in November, 1788. On account of a wound received in the service, she received a pension as an invalid until the passage of the act of 1818, and received a full pension under the act until her disease. The effects of the wound which she received followed her through life, and probably hastened her death. The petitioner is represented to be eighty-three years of age, infirm in health, and in indigent circumstances. He had two daughters dependent on charity for support. He asks that he may receive the amount of the pension of his wife from the time of her decease, and that it may be continued to him until his death. The claim is sustained by good evidence, and Mr. Hastings represented that the claimant is now dead, and moved an amendment, whereby the children of the claimant may receive the pension.]

The amendment was adopted in committee, and the bill ordered to be reported.

A bill for the relief of Josiah Strong and Samuel Remick, and a bill for the relief of James Bailey, were, after some discussion, ordered to be reported to the house.

The bill for the relief of Pamela Brown, widow of the late major general Brown, and granting her five years' half-pay of a major general, under the law of congress allowing such pay to the widow of a major general wounded fatally in battle, came up for consideration.

Mr. McKay suggested that a former relief granted by congress had been taken in lieu of the claim to half-pay. Mr. Bronson considered that relief but in the light of a gratuity, just after the death of general Brown. It ought not to be deducted, as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. Adams hoped such a proposition would not be pressed. He could not believe that that house would deduct from the half-pay justly due to the widow of the gallant

Brown, whose life was shortened by wounds received in the service of his country, what was but a gratuitous relief offered at the time of his death.—H. knew general Brown well, and could bear cheerful testimony to the merit of his private as well as his public character. He hoped this suggestion of Mr. McKay would not be pressed by that gentleman. Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, thought with Mr. Adams, that the gratuity alluded to ought not to be deducted, if the claim were well founded. He could not believe that it was, and should vote against the bill. Mr. Williams, of Kentucky, moved to strike out the enacting clause, and opposed the bill at some length, upon the ground that this claim was not sustained by competent medical testimony as to the death of gen. Brown being the consequence of his wound in battle. Mr. Haynes took a different view of this point. He believed this testimony was based upon professional minutes, which he thought was good evidence, and expressed his opinion that gen. Brown did die in consequence of wounds received in the service of his country. Mr. Grennell said that this claim depended upon the character of evidence. That evidence was not liable to the objection urged against it here, inasmuch as it is a kind of evidence on which property, character, and life depend. It is professional testimony, and is entitled to respect as such. And it is testimony, too, based upon the knowledge of the friends and intimate acquaintances of the party, and proved clearly that gen. Brown died of wounds received in the service of his country, just as much as if he had died on the day after those wounds were received. Mr. G. asked to have the report in the case read. Before this should be done, Mr. Taylor referred the committee to the law under which this claim was set up. Mr. Aycrigg expressed doubts as to the wound of gen. Brown being the cause of his death. Mr. Millory (who, as well as Messrs. Haynes, Aycrigg, and Taylor, is a medical man) expressed a contrary opinion. The motion to strike out the enacting clause was then rejected, and the bill was ordered to be reported to the house.

Several other bills having been considered, and the bill to create a pension agency at Montpelier, Vt. coming next in order, Mr. Bond said he wished to say a few words on this bill. He moved that the committee rise, and report the bills acted on, and ask leave to sit again on those laid aside. This motion prevailed, and the house acted on the bills reported.

Mr. Williams moved that the enacting clause be stricken from the bill for the relief of the widow of the late major general Brown. He moved an adjournment, but withdrew the motion to enable the Chair to lay before the house an executive communication.

The Chair laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, enclosing estimates of the cost of the removal of the Cherokee, &c. in answer to a call of the house. Referred to the committee on Indian affairs. The house then adjourned.

Monday, May 23. This day, under the amended rules of the house, being appropriated to the reception of resolutions, the states were called in order, and the following among others were presented, and variously disposed of:

On motion of Mr. Williams, of N. H. it was Resolved, That the message of the president of the United States, communicated to this house on the 14th of February, 1837, transmitting a claim of the state of New Hampshire for reimbursement of expenses, incurred by that state in maintaining jurisdiction over that portion of its territory north of the 45th degree of latitude, known by the name of Indian Stream settlement, be referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

On motion of Mr. Adams, it was Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this house, if not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence not heretofore communicated between this government and that of the republic of Texas, and also with the government of any other country, relating to the annexation of the said republic of Texas to the United States; and to inform this house whether the application from the said government of Texas to the United States for admission to this union has been withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, of Mass., it was Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this house the proceedings of the commissioners appointed under the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent to fix and determine the boundary between the United States and the possessions of Great Britain, in North America, from the foot of Nebis Rapids, as fixed under the sixth article of said treaty, to the northwesternmost point of the Lake of the Woods; and also to communicate to the house the correspondence, if any, which the two governments may have had in relation to the disagreeing reports of said commissioners, and any other information in the possession of the executive on the same subject.

Mr. Cuthoun, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the 18th rule by adding thereto the following:

"No order or resolution of the house shall be so construed as to deny the printing, reading, or reference of resolves from the legislature of any state in the union."

This resolution lies over for one day. Mr. Briggs, of Massachusetts, offered the following, which lies over for future action:

Resolved, That the committee on the library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of obtaining from Mr. Catlin, an American artist, his original Indian portraits, now being exhibited in this city, which were taken by him during seven years travel and residence amongst thirty-eight different nations; and also to ascertain from Mr. Catlin upon what terms they may be possessed by the government, to be preserved as memorials of the native tribes which they represent.

On motion of Mr. Grennell, it was Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to communicate to the house an account of the moneys received by him from the French government, and transferred to the United States by authority of the act of July 13, 1832, entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and his majesty the king of the French, concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831," showing the gross amount of the several instalments of indemnity, with interest thereon, as paid by the French government, in execution of said convention; the mode and medium of transferring the same to the United States; the expenses or other deductions sustained in making said transfer; and the net proceeds thereof payable and paid to the parties entitled in virtue of the award of the commissioners appointed under said convention.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln, it was

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of directing an immediate distribution of the arms and equipments deposited in the several armories and arsenals of the United States to the several states and territories thereof, in conformity to the act of congress of April 28, 1803, so far as the same can be done without prejudice to the requirements of the public service.

Mr. Russell, of New York, offered the following resolution, which lies over for future action:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the 5th section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed the 23d of June, 1836, as prohibits receiving in payment for dues to the government, and disbursing the same, the bills of specie-paying banks which issue notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars. And, also, so much of the 2d section of the act entitled "an act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1836," passed April 14th, 1836, as prohibits the offering in payment by any officer of a department of the government the notes or bills of specie paying banks of a less denomination than $20.

On motion of Mr. Naylor, it was Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be requested to communicate to this house copies of all letters, communications, documents, and correspondence which have passed between him and the naval commissioners, naval constructors, and all other officers and persons, relative to the construction, building, and equipment of the steam-frigate Fulton, now at the navy yard at Washington; and also state to the house the cost of the said vessel and equipment, designating separately the cost for the hull, engines, and boilers.

Mr. Henry, of Pennsylvania, presented an amendment, which he stated he intended to offer to bill No. 802, reported by the committee on the post office and post roads; which was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed; which is as follows:

"That newspapers shall be carried in the mail free of postage within the limits and bounds of the respective counties where the same are printed and published."

Mr. Petricin submitted the following resolutions, which lie over for future action:

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to call upon the banks within the said District who are now asking for an extension of their charters, to furnish to said committee, for the information of this house, statements of the situation of said banks on the 1st day of this month, and give such information as will distinctly show their actual condition on said day.

Resolved, That said banks be called upon by said committee for a list of the names of the presidents, cashiers, directors, and other officers of said banks, respectively, with the amounts due from each of said officers to said banks, either as drawer or endorser, with the date of the original indebtedness of said officer to such bank.

Resolved That said banks be called upon by said committee for a list of amounts due from members of congress, with the name of each member, and whether drawer or endorser, and the date of the original loan or indebtedness.

Mr. Mercer offered the following, which, being objected to, lies over for future action:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the power of appointing the attorneys and marshals of the several courts of the United States in the judges thereof; that the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting the power of appointing and removing the several officers of the customs in the secretary of the treasury, with the restriction that he shall, in case of every removal, transmit to congress his reasons therefor; and that the committee on the post office and post roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing the salary of the postmaster general to be reduced to the sum of $3,500 per annum, to take effect whenever a vacancy shall occur in the said office, and of requiring that officer, on his removal of any deputy from office, to transmit to congress his reasons therefor.

On motion of Mr. Campbell, of S. C. it was

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the payment of expenses incurred and supplies furnished on account of the battalion of South Carolina militia, received into the service of the United States for the suppression of Indian hostilities in Florida, during a part of the campaign of 1837.

Mr. Haynes, of Georgia, offered the following, which lies over for future action:

Whereas, each of the states of this union has a right to participate in the public lands, the common fund for their use and benefit, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure:

Resolved, That as the public lands constitute a revenue fund, subject to the said principle of distribution; and as taxes are levied upon the people, and not upon the states, as such, that any distribution which may be made of these lands should be made among the citizens of the several states and territories of the union, according to the principle by which direct taxes are regulated by the constitution; and that a select committee be appointed, with instructions to report a bill making an apportionment of all the public lands of the United States among the citizens of the several states and territories, according to the ratio by which direct taxes are apportioned among them.

Mr. Hurlan offered the following, which lies over for future action:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the next session of the present congress shall commence the first Monday of November next.

On motion of Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, it was Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to communicate to this house whether there is, or not, evidence on file in the department of state, showing that the government of Spain, after the treaty of St. Ildefonso, concluded on the first day of October, in the year 1800, between Spain and France, did not continue to claim all the territory south of the 31st degree of north latitude, and east and north of the island of Orleans, lying between the Mississippi and Perdido rivers, as forming a part of the province of West Florida, until the execution of the treaty between Spain and the United States on the 22d day of the month of February, 1819; and whether Spain did not continue to hold possession of said territory, and exercise actual jurisdiction over the same, until about the year 1810; also, whether there is, or not, evidence on file showing that the government of the United States protested or remonstrated against the claim or right set up by France to the aforesaid territory, under the treaty of St. Ildefonso, prior to the execution of the treaty between France and the United States on the 30th day of April, 1803, ceding Louisiana; and, if any such documents or evidence do exist, that then the said secretary communicate the same to this house, together with all the documents on file showing the time and manner of taking possession of said territory by the United States.

Mr. Boon offered the following, which lies over for future action:

Resolved, the senate concurring therein, that the speaker of the house of representatives and president of the senate close the present session of congress by an adjournment of the two houses over which they preside, respectively, on the first Monday of July next.

Mr. Snyder offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the military academy at West Point.

On the question to agree to this resolution, it was decided in the negative. So the resolution was rejected.

[Many other resolutions of minor importance were also presented, which are omitted in this day's paper for want of room.]

Mr. S. Williams offered the following joint resolution, which was read:

"Whereas, the opinion is entertained by many members of the house of representatives who voted against the issuing of treasury notes that it is the intention of the administration to fix upon the country a government bank, and that the issuing of treasury notes is the commencement or foundation upon which a government bank, or something nearly approaching thereto, is to be erected and established; and, whereas, in the opinion of those who opposed the issuing of treasury notes, there is not any thing more to be deprecated than the establishment of a government bank, or the issuing of treasury notes as a medium or currency for the people and the government: therefore—

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That they deprecate and condemn in the strongest terms the issuing of treasury notes with a view or intention to fix upon the country and the government a government paper currency or medium or circulation in lieu of gold and silver or the bank paper of specie-paying banks.

Resolved, further, That they deprecate and condemn, in terms equally strong, any attempt, either directly or indirectly, to establish a government bank, or any institution that approaches thereto, or in any wise resembles or has the appearance or coloring of a government bank."

Mr. Cushman objected to its consideration at this time, and when it should come up for consideration he should move its indefinite postponement. Mr. S. Williams said that he did not suppose the house would ever reach the resolution, if allowed to lie over. He therefore moved that the rules be suspended for its consideration at this time. On this motion he asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered. Mr. Adams said he should vote for the suspension of the rules to allow of its consideration, though he should prefer some alteration in the phraseology of the resolution.

The house decided not to suspend the rules by the following vote—Yeas 81, nays 84.

The states were then called in order for petitions, of which a large number were presented.

The call for petitions being over, the Chair was about calling for reports of committees, when

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house go into committee of the whole, and take up the Indian hostility bill. He withdrew it at the request of Mr. Bell, who offered the following amendment to that bill from the committee on Indian affairs, which was ordered to be printed, and committed to the committee of the whole house.

"Provided, that if the president shall ascertain that all dissatisfaction and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of 1835 can be allayed or avoided by allowing an additional compensation for lands ceded to the United States by said treaty, and that thereby the government may be saved the expense of keeping up the large military force within the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of dollars of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. Bell also presented the following resolution, from the same committee, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of war communicate to the house any information in his department showing the value of Cherokee improvements assessed under the treaty of 1835; and that he also state what amount of money has already been paid for said improvements; whether the improvements of that portion of the Cherokees who have heretofore opposed the executions of said treaty have been examined, and the value thereof assessed; and whether any, and what portion of the value of said improvements has been paid, and in what manner, distinguishing the amount paid to the Cherokees who have emigrated for improvements, with the amount deducted therefrom for their debts, and the amount paid on account of the spoiliations of such Cherokees; and that he also state the estimated balance of the five millions stipulated to be paid by said treaty, which will remain to be divided according to its provision.

Mr. Bouldin made an ineffectual attempt to get up the District bank bill. Mr. Evans hoped that the house would take up the president's message upon the northeastern boundary line, which was the order of the day. Mr. Cambreleng renewed his motion to suspend the rules to go into committee of the whole upon the Indian hostility appropriation bill; which motion prevailed.

The house having again gone into committee of the whole, (Mr. Howard in the chair,) Mr. Graham of N. C., whose remarks had been suspended when the committee rose, on a former day, resumed the floor in support of the New Echola treaty. After Mr. Graham concluded, Mr. Haynes took the floor, and addressed the committee at length in support of the bill. He had made some progress, when he gave way to the motion of Mr. Underwood, that the committee do now rise; which motion prevailed.

The house, on motion of Mr. Garland, of Virginia, went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Montgomery in the chair,) and took up the bill to establish an additional district court in Tennessee, which, being considered, was reported to the house, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, May 29. Mr. Boon moved that the house take up a resolution moved by him, fixing a day for the adjournment of congress. Objection being made, he moved a suspension of the rules, in order to take up his motion, but the house refused to suspend them.

Petitions having been presented by Messrs. C. Morris and Tillinghast, reports from committees were read, among them the following:

Mr. Craig from the committee on revolutionary claims, reported the following preamble and resolution:

Considering the long delay which has unavoidably attended the action of congress on many cases submitted to the committee on revolutionary claims in the ordinary course of legislation,

Resolved, That the chairman of that committee be instructed to make the following proposition to the house for adoption, viz. that the house will, at 12 o'clock on Saturday, the 2d of June, go into committee of the whole house on the bill reported from the committee on revolutionary claims.

Mr. Loomis moved to amend this resolution by adding, "and all other private bills before the house, each in its proper order." Motion so to amend negatived. Mr. Russell moved to amend the resolution by adding: "and the report of the committee on revolutionary pensions in the case of Stephen Freeman, now in committee of the whole house." Motion lost.

The resolution was then amended by adding "a bill to enlarge the provisions of the act entitled 'an act granting half-pay to widows or orphans whose husbands and fathers have died of wounds received in the military service of the United States in certain cases, and for other purposes;' a bill granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows; a bill to revive an act authorizing certain soldiers of the late war to surrender the bounty lands drawn by them, and to locate others in lieu thereof, and for other purposes; also, the several bills granting navy pensions." Thus amended the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Bouldin moved to take up the senate bill for continuing the charters of the banks in the District of Columbia. After some preliminary conversation between Messrs. Bouldin, Adams, and Petrikin, the motion was carried. The Chair stated that the bill had been engrossed and read a third time; and that, pending the question on the passage of the bill, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) had moved its recommitment to the committee for the District of Columbia, with instructions to amend the bill by adding a proviso that the banks should proclaim no dividend during a suspension of specie payments; on which motion the house had ordered the yeas and nays.

Mr. Petrikin moved to amend the instructions proposed by Mr. Adams, by adding thereto a proviso that no member of congress, nor clerk of either house, be eligible to a president or director of the banks in the District. Mr. Thomas demanded the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Mercer, who promised to renew the motion; but he wished particularly to observe that, if the bill had proposed to continue these bank charters for fifty years, he should have deemed it important to insert the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; but as the term was but two years, as the banks were to pay their five dollar bills in specie in August, and all their debts in specie on the 1st of January next, he did not consider it worth while to delay the measure by amendments. [Mr. M. forgot to renew the motion for the previous question.] Mr. Adams said it was perfectly immaterial to him whether the extension was to be for two years, or two months, or two hundred years. It was a first principle of justice that no bank should make a dividend while under a suspension of specie payments. He never would vote to continue any bank charter for one day without a clause preventing this. All he wished was the yeas and nays.

Mr. Mercer now renewed the motion for the previous question. This motion was seconded by the house: Yeas 86, nays 56.

Mr. Petrikin wanted the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them.

The previous question was then put, and carried; and the main question was ordered to be put.

The main question being upon the passage of the bill in the following form:

A bill "to continue the corporate existence of the banks in the District of Columbia."

Be it enacted, &c. That the charters of the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, the Bank of the Metropolis, Patriotic Bank of Washington, and Bank of Washington, in the city of Washington, and the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, and Bank of Potomac, in the town of Alexandria, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the fourth day of July, in the year eighteen hundred and forty: provided, the said banks, each for itself, shall conform to the following conditions:

1st. To cease receiving or paying out all paper currency of less denomination than five dollars, on or before the day of the promulgation of this act.

2d. To redeem all their notes of the denomination of five dollars in gold or silver, from and after the first day of August in the present year.

3d. To resume specie payments in full, on or before the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, or sooner if the principal banks of Baltimore and Richmond should sooner resume specie payments in full.

The question on the bill's passage was decided thus:

YEAS—Messrs. H. Allen, Anderson, Banks, Beatty, Bierne, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Borden, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, John Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Clowney, Coles, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Dawson, DeGrati, Dennis, Edwards, Evans, Farrington, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, J. Garland, R. Garland, Glascock, W. Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Hammond, Hainer, Harlan, Harrison, Harper, Henry, Herod, Howard, Hubley, Ingham, J. Jackson, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Lincoln, Logan, Lyon, Marvin, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, Robert McClellan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Morgan, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noyes, Palmer, Pearce, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reilly, Reicher, Ridgway, Rives, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepherd, Shields, Slade, Spencer, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thomas, Tillinghast, Titus, Vail, Vanderveer, Weeks, A. S. White, J. White, Elisha Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Sherrod Williams, C. H. Williams, Worthington, Yorke—131.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, Atherton, Win. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Casey, Connor, Dromgoole, Dunn, Everett, Goode, Halsted, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, Hopkins, R. M. T. Hunter, T. B. Jackson, Keim, Kemble, Leadbetter, Lewis, Loomis, Mallory, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Noble, Ogle, Owens, Patterson, Peck, Petrikin, Potter, Pratt, Robertson, Sawyer, Shepler, Snyder, Taylor, Turney, Webster, Jared W. Williams, Yell—45.

So the bill was passed, and now wants but the president's signature to become a law.

The house then proceeded to the orders of the day, and took up the message received from the president a few days ago, on the subject of the northeastern boundary of the United States.

Mr. Evans moved that so much of the message as related to the remuneration of the certain individuals therein named be referred to the committee on foreign affairs, and that the residue thereon be for the present laid upon the table.

On this subject Mr. Evans went at large into an examination of what he understood to be the proposition made by the American to the British government, for a new survey of the disputed line; contending that it was, on all grounds, highly inexpedient and of dangerous tendency, and that the state of Maine was entirely and irreconcilably opposed to it. Mr. Fairfield, who followed Mr. Evans in debate, agreed that if the proposition was such as his colleague understood it to be, it would be highly inexpedient; but expressed it as his opinion that the proposition was different, and did not involve the dangerous consequences supposed. Mr. Cushman took substantially the same view of the proposition which Mr.

Evans had done, and went into some illustrations to show that the proposition of our government would necessarily eventuate in giving up the American claims. Mr. Cambreleg now moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Howard, who, having promised to renew it, insisted that the proposals of the secretary of state had been misunderstood; and argued that they involved no departure from the treaty, nor any abandonment of the American claims, but on the contrary provided for the true and proper mode of settling those claims. He complained of the discussion of the propositions of a pending negotiation as premature and improper; and regretted that the question seemed to have been treated by the state of Maine as though she alone, and not the whole country, were interested in it.

The debate was closed by Mr. Howard's renewing, according to promise, the motion for the previous question. Mr. Thomas moved a call of the house.

The yeas and nays were demanded, and, being taken, stood yeas 81, nays 39. But further proceedings in the call were dispensed with. The call for the previous question was seconded, yeas 63, noes 59.

The previous question was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 89, nays 61.

The main question was on the reference of so much of the message as referred to the repayment of expenditure of certain moneys by the state of Maine; but before it was put, Mr. Evans moved that the whole subject do lie on the table; which motion was carried, yeas 88, noes not counted.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Cambreleg went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Howard in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities.

Mr. Haynes continued his speech in favor of the bill, in the course of which he adverted to the course of policy pursued by Georgia to the Cherokees; denounced John Ross as perfidious to the United States, to Georgia, and to his own nation; and expressed deep regret at the late course of the executive, as calculated to raise false hopes in that people, and lead to very unpleasant consequences on the part of the state contiguous.

A motion was now made for the rising of the committee by Mr. Harlan, of Kentucky; but it was negatived, yeas 58, noes 67.

Mr. H. arose and addressed the house for a short time; when he gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which was negatived: Yeas 58, noes 63. Mr. H. had proceeded about half an hour, when he again yielded the floor, and the motion for an adjournment was renewed, but with no better success: Yeas 50, noes 76. Mr. Chambers, doubting the correctness of the last count, moved again that the committee rise; when, the vote being taken by tellers, stood: Yeas 23, noes 76. No quorum having voted, the committee rose, and the chairman reported the fact to the house. Mr. Underwood moved that the house adjourn; but it was decided in the negative: Yeas 59, noes 83. Mr. Adams moved a call of the house. The Chair doubted whether the motion was in order; as the rule declared that, in such a case, as soon as a quorum appeared, the house should immediately go again into committee; but on reflection, the chair admitted the motion as privileged. Mr. Wise asked if it would be in order, at this time, to move an adjournment? The Chair thought the entertainment of such a motion would be a violation of the spirit of the rule. Oh, (said Mr. W.) if it is only of the spirit, I will make the motion. The Chair, after slight hesitation, admitted the motion. Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays; which being taken resulted as follows: Yeas 59, nays 83. Mr. Adams insisted that the question on the call of the house be put. Mr. Dromgoole made a question of order; insisting that the rule must be enforced, and that the house must immediately go into committee. Mr. Adams observed that more than one hundred members were absent without leave, and protested against the residue being compelled by a majority to stay, unless they had the power of enforcing the attendance of the absent members. [It was now near six o'clock.] Mr. Thompson said that, if gentlemen were disposed to give up the intellectual contest, and go into one of a physical kind, he was ready for them, and would vote for calls and adjournments, and yeas and nays, for sixteen hours, (to the hour of meeting to-morrow.) Mr. Boon exhorted gentlemen, rather than give way, to sit till the last week in June. He was ready now to sit there till June. Mr. Dromgoole appealed from the decision of the chair; but declined to go into an argument. The Speaker stated in full the grounds of his decision, the point being now raised for the first time. Mr. Reed supported the decision in a short speech, in which he complained of the course of business; one portion of the house left the hall, so as to disable the house from proceeding for want of a quorum, got their dinners, and then returned and kept the residue of the house in session. The decision of the chair was sustained by the house. The motion of Mr. Adams for a call of the house was then taken, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 47, nays 99.

There now being a quorum present, the house immediately went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Howard in the chair.) Mr. Haynes thereupon moved that the committee rise; the vote was taken by tellers, and decided in the negative: Yeas 46, noes 78. Mr. Harlan resumed his speech, after some time, yielded again to a motion by Mr. Reed for the rising of the committee. The motion was negatived: Yeas 46, noes 71. There appearing again to be no quorum present, the committee was counted—113 members were present, whereupon the committee rose, and reported the fact that they were without a quorum. Mr. Williams of N. C. moved that the house adjourn. On this motion Mr. Toucey demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 54, nays 80. So the house refused to adjourn. [It was now half past seven.] The house again went into committee of the whole Mr. Howard resuming the chair. Mr. Harlan proceeded with his speech; but gave way, at a quarter before eight, for a motion to rise. The motion was negatived—Yeas 34, noes 63. No quorum having voted. The committee was counted, when 113 members appeared to be present. The committee thereupon rose, and reported to the house that a quorum was not in attendance. Mr. Dromgoole demanded a count of the house. The speaker counted the members present, and they were found to be 114. Mr. Wise moved an adjournment. Mr. Duncan demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 57, nays 76. So the house refused to adjourn, and went back into committee of the whole. Mr. Harlan resumed, and concluded his remarks at half past eight o'clock. Mr. Holsey, of Geo., obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise. The motion was negatived—Yeas 46, noes 75, (the chair voting, to make a quorum.) Mr. Holsey commenced his speech, and had proceeded to five minutes past nine o'clock, when Mr. McKay moved that the committee rise. The motion was negatived—Yeas 46, noes 52. No quorum having voted, the committee was counted, when there appeared to be 100 members present. The committee then rose, and reported that they were without a quorum. Mr. Boon moved an adjournment. Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays, which, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 55, nays 70. So the house refused to adjourn, and went again into committee. At ten minutes before ten o'clock, a motion was made for the committee to rise, but without success—Yeas 44, noes 45. No quorum voting, the house was counted; when 108 members were found to be present. The committee being about to rise for want of a quorum, Mr. Wise appealed to the committee. He observed it was impossible to force the question to-night. He should claim the right of reply to those who had replied to him on this Seminole chapter; for there were two chapters to this bill—a Cherokee chapter, and a Seminole chapter, and the one would be found quite as long as the other. The committee then rose, and reported themselves to be without a quorum, when the house adjourned.

Wednesday, May 30. Messrs. Prentiss and Word, representatives elected from the state of Mississippi, appeared, and, after Mr. Prentiss had declared that he and his colleague did not claim their seats by virtue of the recent election, but by virtue of the election in November last, were qualified. The rules were now suspended, and the joint resolution from the senate, prohibiting the secretary of the treasury from making or continuing in force any general order, which shall create any difference between the different branches of the revenue as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues, accruing to the United States shall be paid, was taken up. The resolution was then read twice, and the question being on its third reading, Mr. Boon moved the previous question—seconded. Mr. Sherrod Williams called for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to a third reading, which were ordered, and stood yeas 151, noes 27. So the bill was ordered to a third reading; and, after an ineffectual attempt by Mr. Duncan to recommit, Mr. Boon called for the previous question, which was seconded. Mr. Chapman of Alabama, asked for the yeas and nays, on the passage of the bill which were ordered and stood yeas, one hundred and fifty four—nays twenty-nine—so the joint resolution was passed and returned to the senate.

The house then went into committee of the whole on the Indian hostility appropriation bill; the proceedings on which will be given hereafter.

Thursday, May 31. A portion of the day was spent in the reception of reports, after which the house again went into committee on the Indian appropriation bill, and thus remained until a late hour. Particulars in our next.

CHRONICLE.

Distressing accident. On Saturday afternoon a son of Mrs. Eastwood, a widow lady, residing at No. 154 Norfolk street, aged 8 years, being persuaded by his playmates in the neighborhood, escaped from his mother's observation and wandered as far as the ship yards in the vicinity of the dry dock. Having crawled upon the scaffolding of a ship upon the stocks he became dizzy, and was precipitated to the ground with great violence driving in upon the brain large portions of the skull. He was immediately carried home and Dr. Legget being sent for called in Dr. Miniurn Post, who performed the operation of trepanning the patient and raised the piece of bone. Great hopes are entertained of the child's recovery. [N. Y. Com.]

Great match race, between the Leviathan and Luzborough, four year old nags for $5,000 a side, four mile heats, was run over the Nashville course on the 23d. The track was heavy from the previous rains. The friends of Leviathan, brought to the stand James Jackson & co's. ch. f. Sarah Bladen, dam Morgianna, by Pacolet, and the friends of Luzborough, Dr. Merry's b. f. Leila, dam Sally Hope, by Archy.

The Luzborough filly was distanced on the fourth round. Time, 8m. 50s.

Twenty thousand dollars stolen. A tin box containing upwards of $20,000, in bank notes and drafts of New York, was taken from the Trenton rail road office in Philadelphia, on Wednesday last, and has not since been found. It was intrusted to the conductor to take to New York; he left it in the office, and in the hurry of departure, forgot it.

Mr. Clay, during his late visit to this place purchased of Mr. Samuel Canby, of Woodside farm, one of his short horned Durham calves, about 7 months old. The price was one hundred and fifty dollars. We trust our farmers will take notice of the fact, and of the inducement it holds out to the cultivation of this valuable breed of cattle. [Del. Journal.]

The reported murder of Dr. Brewster, of Georgia, by the Cherokees, proves unfounded. It was got up, no doubt, to operate on the members of congress against the humane proposition lately offered to the tribe by the president.

Michigan money is thus classed—First quality, Red Dog; second quality, Wild Cat; third quality, Catamount. Of the best quality, it is said, it takes five pecks to make a bushel.

Promotions. The Green Bay Democrat states that gov. Dodge is offered the situation of brigadier general in the army, and that the hon. Aaron Vanderpoel, of Kinderhook, is spoken of as his successor.

Dividend of the safety fund. The comptroller, since the resumption of specie payments, has made a dividend of 4 per cent. on the capital of the safety fund paid into the treasury, and has apportioned the same among the safety fund banks in proportion to the amount contributed by each. [Alb. Argus.]

A report has been made to the Boston common council, upon the subject, of erecting a city hall on the lot now occupied by the old court house. The expense is estimated at $100,000, which it is proposed to defray out of the city's portion of the surplus revenue which amounts to $140,000.

Count Confalonieri. We learn from the New York Evening Star, that the Italian exile, count Confalonieri, lately in New York, is now residing at Montpelier. There he can see at least the Alpine region on the coast of Italy, and in a bright day can almost catch a gleam of Sardinia.

American Genius. As Whitney's cotton gin made a revolution in that fabric by its simplicity of structure and expedition in movement, so Mr. Gay's patent winders are likely to do the same for silk—They wind the fibres directly upon the spools from the cocoons, and then twist them into threads with the same remarkable rapidity and precision. [Star.]

Frost. The Cincinnati Post of Saturday says, "there was frost this morning in the country, followed by a fine bright sun. P. M. cloudy."

The river has risen four feet in the last twenty-four hours to 12 m. and is still rising fast.

Cold in Boston. It was so cold in Boston on the 25th ult. that fires were found to be indispensable to comfort. The great body of ice still off Halifax, is said to affect the temperature of the atmosphere.

Canal and rail road tolls. The whole amount received this season on the Pennsylvania canal and rail road, up to the 13th of May, was $456,925 18.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 15.—Vol. IV.]

WASHINGTON CITY, JUNE 9, 1838.

[Vol. LIV.—Whole No. 1,398.]

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

Our congressional department is more than usually crowded this week; but the proceedings recorded are all of the highest interest, and could not well be omitted.

According to the New York Express the new treasury circular had struck the money market in that city with something like a panic—for the reason that the only city banks in the state of New York, which do not issue notes under five dollars, are the Manhattan, the Bank of America, the State Bank, and the Mechanics' Bank. It is, however, stated that there are treasury notes enough afloat to pay duties at the custom-house without a resort to bank notes.

Iowa. It will be seen by our congressional proceedings that Wisconsin territory has been divided, and a new territorial government erected to be called Iowa.

PETER FORCE, esq., was on Monday last re-elected mayor of Washington city, for two years from Monday next, without opposition.

CONSTITUTIONAL CHART. We have made an arrangement with Dr. MAYO of this city, which will enable us to present to our readers, as a supplemental sheet, his constitutional chart, in which is presented a comparative synopsis of the constitutions of the several states and of that of the U. S. From the admirable manner in which the chart is arranged, any fact in relation to the provisions of the different constitutions can be ascertained at a glance; and it is thus rendered a most valuable acquisition to all classes of politicians. The chart was formed to accompany Dr. Mayo's work entitled "Sketches of eight years in Washington," now in press, and is one of a series of similar charts which will be comprised in that publication—it is, however, so arranged that it can be bound in the "REGISTER;" and we feel assured that our readers will carefully preserve it, and, with us, admire the care, industry, and tact with which it has been formed.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The New York Express of Thursday, says this is rather a blue day in the stock market. Yesterday and day before they commenced falling, and to-day declined more than any other. The coming agitation of the sub-treasury bill in congress, the declaration of Mr. Cambreling that the subject would be called up and acted on next week, has created additional alarm in the monied circles. Monied men who were large buyers last week, are now sellers, either disposed to realise or to escape a further loss. Delaware, which but three days ago run up to 86 and sold yesterday at 85, was knocked off to-day at 81—a fall of 3 per cent in one day. Stonington and Harlem run down 2 to 3 per cent. Phoenix bank, Kentucky, Mohawk, New Jersey, and Long Island rail road, all fell 1 to 2 per cent. United States Bank has drooped a little, but is less affected than any other.

Tennessee money market. The Nashville Whig of June 1, says—

Exchanges grow better. Mississippi river notes are bought up freely at 17 a 18 per ct. by the brokers, and a little lower by transient buyers. The Manchester and W. Feliciana banks stand better than last quoted. Checks on Philadelphia, at sight, are offered out of doors at 10 per cent. in currency, and 12 per cent. in Alabama paper.

The Frederick County Bank has declared a dividend of three per cent for the last six months.

The board of directors of the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Frederick county have adopted the following resolution:

Resolved. That in anticipation of a general resumption of specie payments, by the banks of Maryland, at an early day, we will from this day commence the payment of all our issues under five dollars in specie, and fractional parts of a dollar on all checks on the institution.

Vol. LIV.—No. 15.

The Baltimore American states that at a meeting of the officers of the banks of Baltimore, held on Monday, it was determined to ask the banks in the eastern, southern and western states, to meet in convention either in Baltimore or Philadelphia, in the course of the ensuing month, for the purpose of fixing on an early day for a general resumption of specie payments.

The Richmond Enquirer says—We feel ourselves authorized to state, that our banks are prepared, and will resume specie payments the very moment they can ascertain that the banks of Baltimore have commenced, or will commence with them the same day. We all know, that that city is the great receptacle of our paper; and it is not perfectly safe for our banks to resume, until the Baltimore banks agree to receive our checks on Philadelphia, New York and Boston, instead of specie, in the redemption of our notes.

A committee on behalf of the banks of Philadelphia, which have had the subject of the resumption of specie payments under consideration, met on Wednesday evening last, but had not received replies to the letters sent to the institutions in other states, sufficient to allow them to recommend any specific course in regard to that measure. Several banks had replied to the circular sent out, but sufficient time had not elapsed for all to have acted upon, and responded to, the circular.

The New York Journal of Commerce of Monday says that the letters received from Philadelphia state that the United States Bank would forthwith pay specie whenever demanded. The Journal however is of opinion that there would be no demand, if drafts on New York were furnished low enough.

OUTRAGE ON THE NORTHERN FRONTIER. On the next page we have given some particulars of a daring outrage committed on the British steamboat Sir Robert Peel, whilst peaceably lying within our waters, by a band of lawless individuals supposed to be Canadian refugees. The circumstance has justly excited much feeling among the British authorities in that quarter, and we are fearful that it will lead to serious difficulties unless promptly redressed by our government. By the article from the "Globe" it will be seen that the war department has promptly ordered all the disposable regular force to the scene of the outrage, and gov. Marcy went thither by express as soon as the facts were communicated to him. From these movements we have a guarantee that the offenders will be brought to punishment, if the arm of the government can reach them, and we doubt not but that it will be aided by every lover of his country's honor in that quarter.

The New York Commercial of Tuesday says—“We learn from a bearer of despatches, who arrived this morning on his way to Washington, having left Montreal since the date of our latest papers, that Sir John Colborne, with his staff, has gone to take the command of the forces in upper Canada. A movement that seems to indicate apprehensions of something serious.”

Letters from Quebec state that a reward of $4,000 would be offered for the discovery and arrest of the pirates who destroyed the Sir Robert Peel.

Since the above was in type, we have received the following particulars of another outrage, which shows a deep state of excitement among the Canadian populace—but we sincerely hope the Montreal version of the affair is correct.

The following particulars are from the Rochester Daily Advertiser.

Captain Childs, of the steamboat Telegraph, states that on putting into Brockville, or rather while there, he was, about 10 o'clock on Friday night, fired into by the queen's militia, stationed at that place. From fifteen to 20 shots were fired, four of which we know to have struck the boat. An ounce ball passed through the ladies' cabin, near the centre, barely missing the chambermaid, who was standing by the stove. It must have been a narrow escape, judging from the holes in the wall compared with the position of the stove. It was known at Kingston that an attempt to destroy either the Oneida or Telegraph, was to be made that night, but the former passed without calling on them—

The Telegraph was fired on till out of reach, which was not long, as the engineer, suspicious of foul play, kept up during the stay of the boat a heavy press of steam. This wanton attack will serve to show the feeling against us in Canada, and admonish our government that means adequate to the protection of the frontier, cannot, with safety, be much longer withheld.

The officer commanding the guard at Brockville attempts an excuse by saying that the men had misapprehended his orders, which were to fire two muskets into the air as a signal, provided any suspicious boat should approach. The degree of suspicion that justly attaches to the Telegraph, may be learned from the facts, that her bell was sounded twice, as is customary at that place.

Col. Bonnycastle, in command of the queen's troops at Kingston, stated to capt. Childs, that he must be expected to be fired into so long as we acted as at present, adding, by way of taunt, that the next outrage from our side would be the signal for him to cross the line in a hostile attitude—that the Canadas could take the state without aid from England.

The tidings of this affair had reached Montreal on Tuesday, the papers giving a somewhat different version. We annex that of the Montreal Courier:

By passengers arrived from Upper Canada last night, we learn that the new steamboat affair, of which rumor had made so much through the day, was much less than rumor had made it. About 9 on Friday evening, it appears that the Telegraph, an American steamboat running between Ogdensburg and Rochester, touched at Brockville on her way up, with a vessel in tow. Just after she had left the wharf, she was hailed, and the captain desired any one who wanted to come on board to come out in a boat, as he could not come back.

No boat putting out, he again got under weigh and ten muskets shots were immediately fired into the boat, but without doing any mischief. The Telegraph let go the vessel she was towing and made off; and the men (two in number) who had fired, were seized, and their firing stopped by those on the wharf. One of our informants states that these men were volunteer sentries placed on the wharf; another understood that they were not on the wharf, but a little distance from it, and that the people were there for some time before they could stop them.

We are farther informed that the captain of the volunteer company at Brockville followed the Telegraph in the Kingston, and explained the whole circumstance to the captain, from whom he learned that no harm was done. It is added that the affair has not created any considerable excitement on the American side, and that the two men had been arrested.

Lord Durham had been received at Quebec with every demonstration of joy by the inhabitants of all political opinions. Immediately after he had taken the oaths, he issued a proclamation addressed to the people of both provinces, in which we find the following passage:

“In one province the most deplorable events have rendered the suspension of its representative constitution, unhappily, a matter of necessity; and the supreme power has devolved on me.

“The great responsibility which is thereby imposed on me, and the arduous nature of the functions which I have to discharge, will naturally make me most anxious to hasten the arrival of that period when the executive power shall again be surrounded by all constitutional checks of free, liberal, and British institutions.

“On you—the people of British America—on your conduct, and on the extent of your co-operation with me, will mainly depend whether that event shall be delayed or immediate. I therefore invite from you the most free, unreserved communications. I beg you to consider me as a friend and arbitrator; ready at all times to listen to your wishes, complaints, and grievances, and fully determined to act with the strictest impartiality.”

After his excellency had taken the oaths, he gave orders for a list of all the state prisoners to be laid before him on the ensuing morning.

IMPORTANT LETTER FROM MR. BIDDLE. The intelligence of the final passage through the house of representatives of the joint resolution repealing the specie circular, was received in Philadelphia on Thursday, and on the afternoon of that day the following letter from the president of the U. S. Bank was published in the National Gazette of that city. The Philadelphia papers of yesterday concur in expressing the expectation of an early resumption of specie payments.

Philadelphia, May 31, 1838.

My dear sir: In my letter of the 6th ult. I stated my belief that there could be no safe nor permanent resumption of specie payments by the banks, until the policy of the government towards them was changed.

The repeal of the specie circular by congress makes that change. I see now, what until now I have not seen, the means of restoring the currency.

I rejoice very sincerely at the termination of this unhappy controversy, and shall cordially co-operate with the government by promoting what the banks are, I am sure, anxious to effect, an early resumption of specie payments throughout the union.

With great respect yours,

N. BIDDLE.

Hon. J. Q. Adams, Washington, D. C.

MEXICO. Extract of a letter received from a gentleman dated Mexico, May 10, 1838.

"An act was passed on the 1st instant, by the house of representatives, conferring upon the president extraordinary powers for an unlimited time, excepting, however, the right to banish, or take the life of a Mexican citizen, save by process of law. Having been subsequently rejected by the senate, and sent back to the house of representatives for reconsideration, it was passed by a unanimous vote of that body, granting to the president the power to raise an army of one hundred thousand men, and the necessary funds, and to have resort to the means which he might deem most conducive to the interests of the nation, and the requisite to carry his plans into effect. It is understood that the portion of the priest party in the congress which advocated the measure in the first instance, for the purpose of enabling the president to take measures called for by the emergencies of the times, fearing that he might extend these powers to the confiscation of church property to pay the expenses of the war, have withdrawn their support from the measure, wishing to confine his powers to the raising of funds by the ordinary mode of taxation. Intelligence has been received from Yucatan that the whole of that state had pronounced for federation. A severe battle was fought at Merida, the capital between the national troops and the militia, six thousand of whom had obtained arms from Balize, Honduras. Four hundred men perished in the conflict." [Globe.

DESTRUCTION OF THE STEAMBOAT SIR ROBERT PEEL.

The following, which we find in the Albany Argus of Monday morning, contains the particulars of the transaction, alluded to in our first page, which, the editor of that print says, are from a source which entitles them to entire credence:

Watertown, June 2, 1838.

Dear sir: The following statement, relative to the seizure and burning of the British steamboat Sir Robert Peel, may be relied on as correct.

On her passage up the St. Lawrence she stopped at Will's island, seven miles below French Creek, about 2 o'clock on Wednesday morning, 30th May, to take in a supply of wood. While she was doing this, twenty-one—some accounts say twenty-two—persons entered on board, armed and disguised, took forcible possession of her, turned the crew and passengers on shore, and, after committing robbery, set her on fire, and she was burnt to the water's edge. There is some reason to fear that there was loss of life, but this is not certain.

I do not learn that there was any suspicion here that any such outrage was in contemplation, and the news of it caused a very general surprise. It has been subsequently ascertained that these marauders had two encampments on an island in the St. Lawrence, called Abel's island, lying about midway between French Creek and Will's island, at which they had rendezvoused a short time before their attack.

Ten persons have been already committed to the jail of this county on the charge of having participated in the outrage. All these, except one, are refugees from Canada. It is probable that a few American citizens were associated with them, but the perpetrators were mostly persons from the British provinces, and assigned, as the motive for destroying the boat, the desire to retaliate for the loss of their property in Canada.

The "Sir Robert Peel" was a boat of the middle size, new last year, and cost about $40,000. Three quarters of the boat were owned by British subjects, and the other quarter by Mr. Bacon, of Ogdensburg. She had not much freight on board. The robbers got considerable money, but most of it, ($6,000,) has been recovered, and is now in the possession of the civil officers of this county. A commendable degree of zeal and activity has been manifested by them to detect and bring to justice the offenders. They will probably be all ascertained.

This affair, as it was natural should be the case, produced great excitement in Canada, but the people of that province are becoming satisfied that this movement was not known or apprehended by our citizens, except the few that were engaged in it, that it is strongly reprobated here, and that proper exertions have been and will continue to be made among us to bring the perpetrators to justice.

In consequence of the above outrage, sir George Arthur has issued the following proclamation:

Proclamation—Upper Canada.

By his excellency sir George Arthur, knight, commander of the royal Hanoverian Guelphic order, lieutenant governor of the province of Upper Canada, major general commanding her majesty's forces therein, &c. &c.

Whereas information has this day been received that, on the thirtieth day instant, the British steamboat, Sir Robert Peel, while lying peaceably at an American island, was treacherously attacked by a body of armed ruffians from the American shore, set fire to and burned; the passengers, among whom were defenceless females, wantonly and brutally insulted; and a large amount of money, and other property on board the said boat was either plundered or destroyed: And whereas the said robbery and outrage cannot fail to excite feelings of the utmost indignation in the minds of her majesty's subjects, who may be induced thereby to resort to acts of retaliation for the redress of injury, without properly considering that it belongs to the government of her majesty to claim that redress and to the government of the United States to see that it be promptly rendered.

The steamboat Sir Robert Peel, with the persons and property on board, lay at a wharf on the shore of a friendly power, in the confidence of that security which every civilized nation extends over the subjects and property of foreigners, within its territory in time of peace, and free commercial intercourse.

The government of the United States, it may be confidently expected, will vindicate the national honor, and feel deeply the insult which this act of savage and cowardly violence, committed in the dead of night, has inflicted upon their nation. They will not and cannot, without regard to national character, delay to bring the criminals to punishment, or to render to the injured subjects of her majesty, redress—though it be too late in this instance to offer them protection.

The demeanor and conduct of the population of this province has been that of a people resting securely upon the sanctity of law, and the regular exercise of the power of the British empire of which they form a part; and accordingly, even during rebellion, and foreign invasions, this country has not been disgraced by any scenes of individual violence or revenge, on the part of its loyal inhabitants. The character which has thus been gained to this province, has commanded the admiration of the British people—demonstrated the proud superiority of British institutions—and is too valuable to be sacrificed in the smallest part, for the sudden gratification of indignant feelings, however, justly they may have been aroused.

I therefore express to her majesty's faithful and loyal subjects, my entire confidence in their dignified forbearance, and that the British flag which has been so nobly defended by them, will not now be stained by having outrage or insult offered to the persons or property of foreigners within its territory, and under its protection.

It need not be said to men who understand the character and institutions of England—that injury offered to one British subject, is felt by all—and that the mutual ties of duty and affection which bind a free and loyal people and their sovereign together, give the strength of the whole empire to an injured individual. This consideration is all that is necessary to restrain a loyal community within becoming bounds, and to insure their leaving to their government that claim for redress which this unprovoked outrage imperatively demands.

Until the American government shall have taken such measures as will ensure the lives and property of British subjects within the territory of the United States from spoliation and violence, the utmost guard and caution is required on the part of masters of steamboats, and other vessels, in entering American harbors as it is but too plain, that at present the subjects of her majesty may be sometimes placed in the power of lawless banditti, when they imagine themselves within the protection and authority of friendly government.

Given under my hand and seal at arms, at Toronto, this thirty-first day of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty eight, and of her majesty's reign the first.

G. ARTHUR.

By command of his excellency:

C. A. Hagerman, attorney general.

D. Cameron, secretary.

From the "Globe" of Thursday night.

We understand that as soon as the war department learned that serious apprehensions were entertained of disorders being committed on the northern frontier by the Canadians who had taken refuge within our borders, and who have lately shamefully abused the hospitality extended to them, the most prompt measures were taken to bring there where ever regular troops could be drawn from other stations without imminent risk to the interests of the public service. From the temper displayed by many of our citizens on the Canada borders, and from the efforts to be apprehended from the Canadian refugees to re-establish their fortunes, a large regular force is required on that frontier to preserve the good faith and maintain the peace of the country; and it is a subject of deep regret that there should have been so much delay in the house in bringing forward the bill, which has twice passed the senate, to increase the military force of the United States, and reported favorably upon by the military committee of the house. All who look to the defenceless state of our frontiers, must be convinced of the absolute and immediate necessity of the passage of this bill. Not only is it demanded by a due regard for the safety and honor of the country, but it is recommended by every consideration of enlightened economy. To be compelled to every trifling outbreak to authorize the employment of volunteers, occasions an expenditure of money which, in the most ample state of the treasury, cannot fail to be burdensome; and which, under present circumstances, is ruinous. It is, besides, drawing from their agricultural pursuits a large body of our most useful citizens, for the performance of duties extremely onerous to them and injurious to the best interests of the nation. It is therefore, to be hoped that an early day will be devoted to the consideration of this most important subject.

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, May 25, on a message received from the president explanatory of the objectionable papers which accompanied a former message in relation to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States.

The reports of committees having been received the next business coming up in order was the following resolution, moved by Mr. Cambreleng morning (after the receipt of the message transmitting the explanatory letter of Secretary Woodruff):

Resolved, That the committee to which the papers alluded to in the said message have been referred, be discharged from the consideration thereof, and that they be withdrawn from the files, and returned to the president.

Mr. Hoffman, who was now in his seat, (not having reached the house at the time the message was read,) rose, and said that he understood that, during his absence, a communication had been received from the president of the United States having an important bearing on the resolution he had offered. It would be remembered by the house that, at a time he offered the resolution, he had expressed hope, nay, the confident belief, that the president never could have authorized the transmission to the body of documents so offensive in their character as those to which the resolution referred; and now gave him cordial pleasure to say that, having perused the communication at the clerk's table, he was now enabled to say that the president had perfectly and completely exonerated from all blame in the transaction. It was manifest that the president had been imposed on by placing too great confidence in his heads of departments. When he found what sort of communications had been sent to the house, he probably called upon the secretaries of the treasury to furnish the reasons why papers of this character had been made to accompany a message, and the house had received a communication from that officer, which, while it completely exonerated the president from all intention to impose on the house by transmitting such documents in relation to its call, left the whole blame on the head of the secretary. The secretary, it seemed, had reported to the president that various communications on the subject of the importation of paupers had for years been received at the department, some in writing, others in print, and some by personal conversation. These papers had, without any critical examination, been ordered to be placed on the files of the department, and from thence had been transmitted to the house without being looked into.—But by whom had papers of this character been sent? What confidential friend of the secretary was it who had furnished him with extracts of this kind, which could only furnish aliment to the most corrupt and morbid passions, and which were full, from one end to the other, of the most libellous and rancid abuse on the corporate authorities of a great city, and on respectable and worthy men by name? How did it happen that documents like these were ordered to be placed on the files of one of the departments of this government? Did this secretary of the treasury mean to make his department a depository of all the revolting libels daily poured forth by the lowest presses of a party? Were productions like these placed there without being read? Had they been read, or even glanced at, the nature of their contents could not for a moment have been mistaken; and what right, then, had the secretary to direct such personal calumnies to be put on the files of the government?

But again: What had the president been requested to send to the house? He had been called upon to furnish it, not with matters of loose suspicion, not with scurrilous extracts taken from the newspapers, but with information, with authentic facts, which should form a basis for legislative action. Thus called upon, the president very properly referred to the head of the department; and the secretary was thus placed in a solemn and responsible attitude. He was required to perform a weighty and important duty to the representatives of the American people. And what does he do? Without examination, and, as it would appear, without reading or the slightest inspection, he transmits to the president, and the president to the house, as a foundation for its action, extracts from the lowest party newspapers, filled with base and scurrilous abuse of individuals. Mr. H. called upon the house to pause upon a fact of this kind, and to consider what degree of reliance could hereafter be placed on official communications from a department. When a document came to the house bearing the official stamp of the head of a department, the house had been in the habit of receiving it as entitled to consideration and worthy of credit; but what became of all such confidence if papers were officially communicated without being read or looked at, and without ascertaining the fact that they impeached the personal character of members of the community as respectable in all points of view, as the honorable secretary himself; nay, without knowing whether they did not contain a libel on members of the house, and on the very member who had originated the call? If a secretary could transmit a paper which impeached, in the grossest manner, the chief magistrate of one of our greatest cities, a citizen who had twice received the public testimonial of the approbation of his fellow-citizens, and which heaped similar abuse on others of the constituted authorities of that city's municipal government, because they were the friends of an honest and disinterested party, (the Native American,) why might it not have impeached the very member who called for information? Mr. H. rejoiced for the honor of his station and of the country that the president stood completely exonerated in the matter. But, in an honest and strict regard to the violated privileges of the house, and for the abused and outraged character of his own constituents, he could not but express his astonishment and indignation that the head of the department should dare thus to insult and trifle with that house. This occurrence threw a light strong and clear, on the mode in which the duties of that department were performed. It showed how important matters were entirely entrusted to clerks and subordinate agents. Mr. H., in conclusion, said he should not object that these papers should be withdrawn by the president, but he trusted that what had occurred on this occasion would read his secretary such a lesson, that documents like these should never again be sent to that house. If the papers were withdrawn, he hoped that they would not be left on print among the archives of this house, as the recorded slanders of a party press.

Mr. Dromgoole suggested that it would be a more regular course to lay the communication on the president and its accompanying documents on the table, and order them to be printed, that thus the explanation of this unpleasant transaction might go with it to the country.

Mr. Whittelsey inquired of the chair whether should the pending resolution be bound up in the volume of executive communications?

The Chair replied that ordinarily they would; but under peculiar circumstances of the present case, the clerk had stated to him that he should not order them to be bound up, but would send back the message and documents to be reprinted, with the omission of those now objected to.

Mr. Atherton said, if he had rightly understood the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) that gentleman was of opinion that both the president and secretary had relieved themselves from all suspicion of purposing to do any thing derogatory to the dignity of the house, and he was sorry to hear, from the remarks of the gentleman from New York, the expression of a different opinion. He could not conceive that the secretary of the treasury was placed in a different position when deceived by placing too great confidence in his clerks, from that in which the president stood by placing too great confidence in his secretary. It was well known to every gentleman at all acquainted with the course of public business, that the heads of departments must of necessity, trust in a great measure to their clerks. What was this case? In 1836, a resolution passed the senate, directing the secretary of the treasury to collect information from various sources as to the importation of foreign paupers into the United States. In reply to circulars from the department, information came in various shapes into the office, and was then placed on file by the clerks. It was probably examined only so far as to find to what general subject it related. When the call was made by the house, the secretary ordered his clerk to gather these papers together, and without particularly examining them, he transmitted them the house. He was sorry that the gentleman from New York had indulged in language which seemed to imply that the secretary of the Treasury had intentionally sent an offensive libel to the house. He believed it was admitted on all hands that if there was any thing for which that officer was distinguished, it was for assiduity and industry in the labors of his station. It was well known that he never shrunk from any toil in the discharge of his official duty; and he trusted the gentleman from New York would retract any language which implied that the secretary was negligent and shrank from bending all the energies of his mind to the trust confided to him. He was truly sorry to hear the abuse of remark from that gentleman. He could not conceive why the secretary was more chargeable with blame than the president and he thought it was honorable and candid in the gentleman from Massachusetts so promptly to exonerate both.

Mr. Briggs said that there had been, yesterday, but one sentiment in the house as to the character of two of the documents which had been sent with the president's message, and he believed there was but one opinion now relative to the manner in which the president had met the question. The president had frankly told the house that those papers were of such a character that, had he been apprized of it, he never would have sent them to the house. Mr. B. was sorry to say that the letter of the secretary was by no means so satisfactory. The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Atherton) had alluded to the authority under which the secretary had proceeded to collect information on the subject of foreign paupers. The senate's resolution had directed him to call upon custom-house officers and foreign consuls.

[Mr. B. was here reminded, by some member, that the words "other sources of information" were also added.]

Mr. B. admitted this; but here were extracts from a newspaper sent to the department, not by any individual officially called upon, but, as the secretary informed the house, "by somebody who felt an interest in the subject," and, on this authority, were permitted to go on the files of the department. And what did the secretary say in his communication concerning these infamous papers? He uttered not a word of disapproval of their contents.—He tells the house, that, in the pressure of business, documents had been sent, in which objectionable remarks were "mingled" with information sent. Now, did these papers contain a single sentence of information? A single word that was relevant to the inquiry? Were they not full of the rankest abuse of individuals? Yet, Mr. Secretary tells the house, that "concerning the correctness of those statements the department knows nothing." Was it possible that the head of the department did not know whether such communications were correct or not? Could he not say, at a glance, that they were incorrect in the highest degree? Not a word was stated as to how such papers got into the department, or when or from whom they were sent.

pressed in regard to them. Under these circumstances, Mr. B. could not but consider the communication of the secretary as unsatisfactory.

Mr. Cushman inquired of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Russell) who was at the head of the committee on this subject of foreign paupers, whether, when he offered the resolution calling for this information, he did not know that these newspaper communications were then on file.

Mr. Russell said that, after presenting a memorial praying for a revision of our naturalization laws, he had offered a resolution calling on the secretary of state for such information as was in that department respecting the introduction of foreign paupers into our cities. In answer to this call, the secretary of state informed the house that he had not the means of obtaining the information sought. He, however, stated that there were certain communications which had passed between the agents of this government and the agents of foreign nations touching the emigration of certain classes to this country; but as all such correspondence was under the immediate direction of the president, he was not authorized to send it.

Mr. R. had then drawn up a resolution, carefully guarded, requesting this information, and inquiring what steps had been taken to prevent the introduction of that class of foreign emigrants who were complained of as becoming so burdensome to our community. He had no knowledge whatever of the existence of such documents as had been sent till he found them upon his table.

Mr. Cushman read the instruction of the senate in 1836, and expressed great regret that any censure should have been cast on the secretary. Gentlemen were all aware of the extreme pressure on the department, and the impracticability of the secretary's examining every paper sent for by congress. He must, of necessity, trust to his clerks. The president had acknowledged, with the utmost candor, the mistake which had occurred. So had the secretary. Then why this attempt to heap censure upon him? He hoped that gentlemen would exhibit a more charitable temper, and would be governed by the golden maxim of doing as they would be done by.

Mr. Hoffman regretted to trespass on the time of the house, but felt it his duty to reply to the remarks which had fallen from the two gentlemen from New Hampshire, (Mr. Atherton and Mr. Cushman.) The former of these gentlemen had commenced his speech with an eulogy upon the secretary; with all that Mr. H. was not disposed to find fault. He had the authority of Shakspeare for saying that "it was a most beneficent peacemaker." If the honorable secretary was distinguished for any thing, it was for his great industry. The gentleman had asked why Mr. H. had distinguished between the cases of the president and his secretary. The president was in the habit of transmitting to the house documents officially submitted to him by his heads of departments. They were submitted in a mass, and so sent to the house; but the gentleman from New Hampshire must remember that these newspaper slips had each been sent, singly and by itself, from some confidential friend and correspondent. It could scarce be but that the secretary must have found leisure, during some interval in the morning, or at noon, or in the evening, to read them. He said that they were then ordered to be placed on file; but why? How could he direct that such documents should be placed on the files of his department?

[Mr. Atherton replied that it was the custom of the department to file all documents received.]

Indeed? Was every newspaper sent to the department, however irrelevant to the public business, and however teeming with a tissue of libels against respectable people, placed on file amongst the papers of the department? If Mr. H. should send the secretary, to-morrow, newspapers full of party abuse, would they be placed, without reading or consideration, among the public archives? If this was the established rule, the government would soon want another treasury building. The new one would not be large enough to hold the libels that would be poured into it. If it was to become a receptacle of matter of this description, the burning of the treasury ought to be hailed as a blessing, and not a misfortune; and it was well suggested by a gentleman near him that it would not be surprising if documents like these should produce spontaneous combustion. [A laugh.]

The other gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Cushman) is greatly surprised and grieved that I should have dealt in harsh epithets in regard to so meritorious a public officer as the honorable secretary. Now Mr. H. would appeal to the house—nay, to the gentleman himself—to say whether he had indulged in any harsh or censorious epithets.

said of his conduct in this affair. Mr. H.'s business was not with the man, but with the thing. He cared not for the secretary in this matter, but for his acts; and could he not hold up to public reprobation an official act, without being charged with using injurious epithets concerning the man who was guilty of it? This charge reminded him of one which was brought in the house of burgesses in Virginia against Virginia's orator and statesman, Patrick Henry. The words of power which fell from that unparalleled debater on that occasion had first been read by Mr. H. in his youth, and they had ever since lived in his mind. Patrick Henry had been censured for animadverting with some freedom on the conduct of a high officer of state. His answer was, "Yes; even from that great man, whose valor and prudence gave us our independence, would I demand the reasons for his public acts. The very independence he gave me teaches me that I ought to demand them." Could the gentleman from New Hampshire believe that a representative on that floor, whose constituents had been grossly and insultingly assailed in a public document sent to the house from an executive department, dare not speak of such an act as it deserved, lest he should be accused of disrespectful epithets toward the secretary of the treasury? The gentleman was too pure a patriot himself to hold such a sentiment. Mr. H. should continue to condemn the act of the secretary in sending such vile papers to this house, and he here protested against its being drawn into precedent hereafter.

He again inquired of the Chair whether, should the resolution be adopted, these documents (Nos. 7 and 8) would remain on the printed files of this house?

The Chair again stated that the clerk would see that they were not bound up in the volumes of executive communications.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, wished to make an inquiry of the chairman of the select committee, (Mr. Russell.) The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Atherton) had lauded the secretary of the treasury for his industry, and his critical attention to the duties of his place. In the present case, he believed that these documents were almost the only papers accompanying the message, save one or two of little consequence. Now, if the honorable secretary was so extremely attentive and laborious, how did it happen that he had not looked at these documents before he sent them here? The inquiry he wished to put to the honorable chairman of the select committee (Mr. Russell) was this: had these documents been sent to that committee in the usual written form, attested by the signature of the proper officer to give them authenticity? or did they consist of mere scraps cut out from newspapers?

Mr. Russell replied, and produced the documents as sent: one was from a newspaper printed in New York, and called the "Truth Teller;" the other was a fragment, cut out from a newspaper, which, from its appearance, seemed to have been taken from another number of the same paper. There were no designations, save some marks upon the margin, to induce the belief that they were public documents officially communicated.

Mr. Calhoun resumed, and expressed his regret and mortification at the disclosure thus made; it reflected little credit on the secretary of the treasury. That officer stood before the house, in this transaction, in no very desirable light. This was the first time he had ever known papers to be thus sent; he trusted it was the first and the last time that scraps cut out of newspapers would be sent by the head of a department in reply to a call of that body. It was an act of charity to believe that the secretary never saw these vile communications; if he did, the offence was an atrocious one; if he did not, he was neglectful of his duty, and forgetful of the relation in which he stood to that house. Mr. C. regretted this, for the sake of the character of the government and of the country.

Mr. Menefee said that no one could have been shocked more than himself, by the communication to this house, by the president of the United States, of the offensive documents to which the resolution of the gentleman from New York (Mr. Hoffman) related. Such a procedure on the part of the executive undoubtedly demanded the instant notice of the house of representatives; and, in the absence of an instant explanation their marked reprobation. That notice was attracted and explanation demanded by the resolution; but I must suppose all reprobation to have been averted by the message which the house has this morning received from the president, in which he states that the communication to the house of the exceptionable documents was not intentional. For myself, I am fully satisfied with this explanation; and do not, therefore, require the supplicatory appeals on the part of the friends of the president for an extension to him of the charity of the house. I extend to him what is more substantial than charity—justice; and justice simply, in my opinion, is all that is requisite to his defence under such circumstances.

This, sir, is but an instance of inattention to duty, or its violation, in one of the executive departments, by a subordinate officer, whose powers and duties are assigned by law—the president neither knowing nor participating. The just ground of complaint against the president, in such a case, is the continuance in office of the subordinate after the delinquency is known, rather than the original delinquency itself.

It must be acknowledged, however, that the President of the United States, judged in this instance by his own principles of presidential responsibility, has no right to demand, nor perhaps even a decent pretext for asking, the exoneration which has been thus promptly conceded; and I cannot allow to pass, unimproved, an occasion so appropriate for inviting the attention of the house to what those principles are—a task of no difficulty, as it consists merely in a reference to a document of no great antiquity, in which they are embodied in the most authentic form.

On the 17th of April, 1834, sir, the then president of the United States, whose principles and opinions are, by adoption, those of the now president, promulgated to the nation a paper among the most celebrated in its history: I mean his "solemn protest," of that date, addressed to the senate of the United States. In that remarkable state paper, the origin and history of which it is needless now to review, are expressed fully, the principles of that period, as entertained by that party, in regard to executive responsibility for the conduct of subordinate officers. Nor was that paper a mere abstract declaration of principles. It was, on the contrary, a practical display of principles, in upholding a high executive act; the highest, indeed, and the most high-handed executive act that disgraces our history. What are those principles?

That "the whole executive power" is "vested in the president;" that "he is responsible for its exercise;" that all subordinate officers are but agents and instruments "to aid him in the performance of his duties;" that the power of removal and appointment "is an original executive power;" and that for the conduct of all executive officers, "the president is responsible"—all, in turn, being "responsible to him."

Now, sir, in a land of laws under a limited constitution, these must be admitted to be extraordinary doctrines; which is not my present purpose to expose, but merely, by referring to them, to show what they are.

Executive unity was claimed, with all the qualities of individuality; and the thousands of executive officers in the civil, military, and naval service, in peace and in war, at home and abroad, on sea and land, in all their ramifications of government, were but bones and sinews, and muscles and nerves, of that vast constitutional unit of which they were parts—the president the whole! They were the eyes by which he saw, the ears by which he heard, the nerves by which he felt, and the bones, sinews, and muscles by which he moved forward, and, sir, by which he struck! The president, as the sensorium, directing all, moving all, responsible for all!

This was the doctrine maintained when an attempt was made to hold a high executive officer (the secretary of the treasury) responsible to the law, in a most critical period of our public affairs. The president interposed himself as the whole, undivided, indivisible, executive, responsible for the conduct of all his aids in the performance of his duties! He demanded to be held responsible for their delinquencies! In the career which that remarkable man was then running, he sought, with avidity, the responsibility of atoning for all the sins, if but allowed the pleasure of wielding all the power, of the whole executive department.

Yet, now, the president who represents these principles, and is committed to the execution of them, claims of the house exoneration from responsibility for an acknowledged delinquency of the head of an executive department! and of the same department!

It is well, I think, sir, to revert occasionally to the doctrines of yesterday; it inspires circumspection in the actors of to-morrow. In the present instance, there appears to be a striking propriety in drawing, though rapidly, across the vision of the president a picture of the past. It may serve to convince him that it is given to but few to demolish a free constitution and erect out of its strewn fragments an executive stronghold so stupendous as that erected, in practice, by his predecessor.

Sir, without expressing any opinion respecting the secretary of the treasury or others, I wholly exculpate the president, and do not, in a case like this, choose to withhold a public expression of the gratification which his late message has afforded. I recognise in that act, with profound satisfaction, the prompt performance of what was due, in my opinion, to the private citizen, to the house of representatives, and to a chief magistrate of the United States.

Mr. Sibley, of New York, expressed his entire concurrence in the sentiments of gratification which had fallen from his colleague, (Mr. Hoffman,) at the course proposed by the president in his message of this morning. For the reputation of the chief magistrate, and the honor of the country, I am glad (said Mr. S.) that permission to withdraw the extraordinary and offensive matter appended to his message of the 11th instant has been so promptly granted, and granted with entire unanimity. No member of the house can wish to see it degraded by becoming the medium of transmitting to the country the grossest libels of a partisan press upon the characters of private citizens or the constituted authorities of a municipal corporation. No citizen of this country can be willing to see this hall converted into a record-office for matter of that sort. I am glad, sir, that the good work of illustration is begun, and I shall be pleased to see it extended to another document, emanating from the same source, now lying upon your table, and soon to be bound up amongst the enduring records of the government.

I allude, Mr. Speaker, to that part of the president's annual message communicated to us at the commencement of the session, in which he arraigns, before the country and the world, the intentions and integrity of a large portion of the citizens of the state which I have the honor in part to represent.

That part of the recent message which the president now asks leave to withdraw, assails the reputations of only a few individuals residing at the metropolis of the state, and with much ribald personal abuse it mingles some strictures upon the public and official conduct of the gentlemen named. I look upon this latter feature as constituting some mitigation of the otherwise atrocious nature of the whole production; for, in relation to the official conduct of public men, I hold to the right of the severest scrutiny, and the freest animadversion of speech and of the press.

But, sir, that portion of the annual message which I would also give the president permission to withdraw is far more general and expansive in its assaults upon the character of our country. It involves the political purity and personal independence of multitudes of men in all parts of the state of New York; of men in the quiet and retired walks of life, occupying no public station, exercising no delegated trust, and in no wise accountable to any officer, high or low, of the federal government for the considerations which may influence them in the exercise of their original independent sovereignty.

In reference to the then recent election in New York, and for the purpose of inducing us to disregard that expression of popular sentiment in our deliberations upon the leading and favorite measure of the executive, the president has seen fit labor—in wary and ambiguous phrase, but with conclusions that have not been, and cannot be, misunderstood—"to bring the representatives of the people to believe that a large majority of the independent electors of that state, unmindful of the great interests staked upon our action, had cast their ballots in base subservience to what he is pleased to call, in that message, "the already overgrown influence of corporate authorities."

[Mr. Taylor rose to a question of order. He asked if it was now in order to discuss the annual message?]

If (continued Mr. S.) my colleague will indulge me for a few moments, he will perceive that my remarks do not violate any rule of order, or that I shall present to him a better opportunity of raising that question when I come to offer an amendment to the resolution under consideration.

[The chair suggested that Mr. S. should now send up his proposed amendment.]

It is my intention, sir, to offer such an amendment before I close; but I wish to introduce it with a few preliminary observations explanatory of its character and object; and, not intending to trouble the house again, I shall be willing, with the permission of the chair, to avail myself of the present speaking to assign some reasons for the adoption of the amendment, when it shall be offered.

I was proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to point out the exceptionable parts of the annual message to which my amendment, if in order, may be applicable.

The seventh page of that document represents to our consideration, in a short paragraph or two, the famous "sub-treasury scheme." But, no sooner does it give us a glimpse of its hidden mysteries—scarcely is our vision prepared to gaze into its dark recesses—when, as if fearful that our footsteps might turn from its gloomy passages into the brighter path to which public sentiment had directed them, the president begins to furnish us with reasons for disregarding that public sentiment. He tells us of the "more than one hundred and sixty millions of bank capital spread through all the ramifications of society"—of "its direct connexion with the then pending elections"—of "the feelings it was calculated to infuse into the canvass"—and of its having "exercised a far greater influence over the result than any which could possibly have been produced by a conflict of opinion in respect to a question in the administration of the general government more remote and less important in its bearings upon that interest." And, in immediate connexion with all this, he assures us that he is "more than ever convinced of the dangers to which the free and unbiassed exercise of political opinion would be exposed by any further increase of the already overgrown influence of corporate authorities."

Now, sir, no man doubts—no man can doubt—that, in all this extraordinary and unwarrantable criticism upon the motives which influenced the action of the people, the president means to say that that action was guided and controlled by the "overgrown influence of corporate authorities;" that the people of this country were capable of hartering the elective franchise for the favor of moneyed corporations; that the hardy yeomanry of New York had bowed down their free spirits before the golden calves which the president himself had erected before their eyes.

Mr. Speaker, if that portion of the annual message upon which I am commenting does not mean this, it means nothing. Strip it of this signification, and it is senseless. It has received this interpretation throughout this country and Europe. It has been used as authority for the grossest vituperation of the citizens of New York, by the public journals of our sister states, and abroad it has been quoted by the enemies of republican institutions, as evidence of the corrupting tendency of such institutions, and the degeneracy of the people who live under them.

Sir, I regard all this part of the message as unprecedented in the annals of executive communication; as conveying a severe and unmerited imputation upon the political independence and integrity of the citizens of my state, which ought not to remain upon the public records of the country. As we are engaged, this morning, in the business of purifying those records, I am willing that the president should, if he pleases, take back that part of the annual message of which I complain, along with the portion of his recent message which he has asked permission to withdraw; and, if my amendment prevails, he will have leave to do so.

[The Speaker. Such an amendment will not be in order. It is not connected with the subject now before the house. It may be in order as an original proposition, when the house is again in committee of the whole on the annual message.]

I am aware of that, sir, (said Mr. S.) but the difficulty is, the house will not again be in committee of the whole upon that message. I must, therefore, avail myself of the present occasion to show cause why the character of my constituents should not be impaired by the grave charges made against them by the federal head of the nation, or that opportunity will be gone. And I propose now to demonstrate to the house and the country, that all charges and insinuations, from whatever quarter they may come, that the recent political revolution in the state of New York was the result of bank influence, or that the free-thinking and independent men by whom that revolution was wrought out are capable of surrendering their judgments and consciences to such influence, are not only destitute of any foundation in fact, but that they are wholly impossible to be true.

[The Speaker. That discussion will not be in order, and cannot be permitted.]

Mr. Sibley. I shall, of course, be under the direction of the chair, and submit, with great deference, to the decision. I had hoped, indeed, that when the chief magistrate of the nation comes into this house and presents a bill of indictment against the people of a state, the representatives of that people (who are not here to answer for themselves) might at least be allowed the poor privilege of pleading not guilty. But I will say no more upon the unwelcome topic, and pass to some considerations more immediately connected with the subject actually before us.

The message of the president of the 11th instant, Mr. S. further remarked, when looked at in connexion with that which he has sent us this morning, presents a novel spectacle in the history of executive and legislative intercommunication. Let us contemplate it for a moment.

On the 30th ult. we adopted a resolution respectfully requesting the president to communicate to this house "copies of all correspondence and communications which have passed between this and any foreign government, and the officers or agents thereof, relating to the introduction of foreign paupers into the United States;" and "also, what steps, if any, have been taken to prevent the introduction of such paupers into the United States."

On the 11th instant, the president transmits to us a message, with accompanying documents, which he informs us are in answer to our resolution. As soon as these documents are printed, it is discovered that by far the longest of them, and comprising more than a fourth part of the entire communication, consists of an article having nothing to do with the subject of inquiry, extracted from a partisan newspaper edited by a foreigner in the city of New York, and containing little else than the most scurrilous and loathsome attacks upon the private and public character of the mayor and members of the common council of that city.

As soon as this outrage falls under the notice of my honorable colleague, (Mr. Hoffman,) he calls the attention of the house to the subject, and proposes a resolution discharging the select committee from the further consideration of the libellous effusions of the "Truth-Teller," and returning the offensive matter to the president. This movement of my colleague doubtless attracted the attention of the president for the first time to the exceptionable character of that part of his message, and he informs us this morning, with great propriety, and in a manner perfectly satisfactory, so far as he is concerned, that the extracts from the "Truth-Teller" "are of a character which would, if attention had been directed to them, have prevented the transmission to the house, and he requests permission to withdraw them."

Along with this last message, the president has sent us a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in which he attempts to excuse this invasion of our privileges, and perversion of his official position, in sending here this impertinent and scandalous matter. And what is his explanation? He does not tell us, indeed, that he has never read these newspaper extracts. But he says that, "without a critical examination, they were placed on file with the clerk having particular charge of that business;" that they were sent to the president in the pressure of business without noticing the personal character of the remarks, "and which, had they been observed at the time, would not have been communicated."

Now, sir, I am not satisfied with this excuse of the secretary. It does not go far enough back. It does not explain the extraordinary fact that such matter should have found its way to a place on the files of the treasury department. How came it there at all? It is because the clerk drew it from the files that our documents have been polluted with such foul stuff. It is because it was there that the president has been made the unwilling instrument of transmitting it to this house. Did it find its way there without such examination, "critical" or otherwise, as made the secretary acquainted with its true character? This is impossible; for no person can glance at the very caption of the article, or scarcely at any line of it, without discovering its true nature.

I had supposed, sir, that nothing was fit for a place upon the files or records of our executive departments which was not also fit for the public eye; and that every thing which might properly be deposited there might, at any time, be drawn from thence, and presented to this house, and to the nation, without any violation of dignity or decency. But it seems that the secretary of the treasury has contrived to accumulate upon his files such matter as, having accidentally found the light, he is ashamed of, the president is ashamed of, we are ashamed of; and all are anxious to hurry it back into the special care and keeping of the "financial head" of the government.

Mr. Speaker, we were told this morning by the honorable member from New Hampshire (Mr. Atherton) that if the secretary of the treasury was distinguished for any thing, it was for untiring assiduity in discharging the laborious duties of his office. Whatever eminence, sir, that high functionary may attain by patient toil and plodding industry, he will be yet more distinguished, I apprehend in the future history of this country, as having been the first head of an executive department who converted the public archives of the government into a receptacle for disgusting libels upon the people of the country whose servant he is. That these foreigners, new landed upon our shores, should, "after eating from our basket and drinking from our cup," turn upon us, and "pour the senseless libels upon a people at whose firesides they were warmed," is quite enough to task the forbearance of a generous and hospitable nation; but that the high officers of this government should lend themselves to the work of rescuing from oblivion, and placing upon lasting record—that they should make our public archives the depositories of these stale slanders, from whence they may be drawn forth under all the sanctions of official approbation, to be turned against the characters of the living or the memories of the dead, is such perversion of official responsibility as ought not to pass without animadversion.

Mr. Speaker, the citizens of my own state seem of late to have become the peculiar objects of executive assault. At the commencement of the session, their representatives were compelled to sit here and listen to the grave charge preferred by the president in his annual message; but a few days ago, and it was deliberately and solemnly declared on this floor, in the face of the assembled representatives of the nation, that our principal city had been, from the commencement of the government to within a few months past, the victim of the unjust and oppressive legislation of that state as well as of this government; and now, sir, a portion of our citizens are attacked with foreign arms wielded with all the force and dexterity of the secretary of the treasury. Sir, if the federal government must war against the people of the states, I cannot but regret that its pugnacious favors are not a little more generally distributed.

New York, it seems, is to be assailed not only by imputations upon her political integrity and independence, but also upon the private characters of her citizens. And more than all, her whole career of legislations—ay, of democratic legislation—from the very origin of the government down to the late free banking law, is boldly denounced as characterized through all its course by injustice and oppression towards a portion of her population, whose rights and interests were committed to her care, whom she was bound, by every consideration of honor and duty, to cherish and protect, but of whom it is alleged she has made a victim and a sacrifice. The language employed by the chairman of the committee of ways and means, (Mr. Cambreleng) in debate the other day, was this: "New York has been, from the commencement of our government, the victim of unjust and oppressive legislation, state and national."

Now, sir, this is a grave and serious charge. It ought not to be lightly made; for if true, and wherever it is believed, it ought to, and it will, disgrace the government and people of that state in the eyes of the civilized world—if true, it would justify revolt and rebellion by the people of that city. But sir, it is not true. The legislation of the state of New York, toward that noble city, has, at all times, been liberal and just.

[The Speaker. The words upon which the gentleman from New York is now commenting were spoken in debate upon another subject, and cannot be replied to in this debate.]

Mr. S. proceeded. I am aware that, in this respect, I was trespassing somewhat upon the strict rules of debate. My object is answered, however, by calling attention to what I regard as a most unfounded charge upon those who have so long held a controlling influence in the legislation of my state, and upon those who have, in all past time, occupied seats in her legislative halls.

I will conclude by assuring gentlemen, that if the people of the state of New York, in their individual or representative character, are to be made the targets for the bolts of executive vengeance, and if this city and this hall are to become the vantage ground from which those bolts are to be discharged they will find New York buckling on her armor also; and I greatly mistake the character of the state if there will not be found amongst all her sons, without distinction of party, sufficient state pride and self-respect to repel these unfounded and undeserved assaults.

Mr. Cary moved the previous question.

Mr. Reed was very anxious to say a word or two and Mr. Cary agreed, at his request, to withdraw the motion, on condition that Mr. Reed would renew it.

Mr. Reed promised to do so. He wanted to call the attention of the house to a suggestion in regard to the clerk. He wished to propound to the chair the inquiry whether the clerk was authorized to withhold any portion of the documents which had been printed by order of the house from taking its place upon the printed archives of this body?

The Chair explained, and said that that was a matter within the power of the house. The clerk would be subject to its direction. He had supposed that no objection could be made, and that it would be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. Reed insisted that the documents must be published and bound up with the rest.

This was the regular course. Besides, if these documents should be withdrawn, the message of the president, received this morning, would be unintelligible to those who should come after them, as there would appear nothing on the record to which it referred. Mr. R. wished to avoid an evil which he should consider even greater than this, and that was an expunge. He then, according to promise, moved the previous question.

Mr. Harlan was anxious to speak, but Mr. Cray refused leave for Mr. Reed to withdraw the motion.

The call was seconded by the house—ayes 102, does not counted.

The previous question was put and carried.

The resolution of Mr. Cambereleng was then agreed to.

Mr. Harlan, of Ky. called for a division of the question; and it was divided as of right.

The question on laying upon the table was agreed to.

The question then coming up on the printing, Mr. Harlan, after thanking Mr. Cray for his courtesy said that his object had been to call the attention of the house to a remark of the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. Atherton) in defence of the secretary. That gentleman might be called, indeed, the advocate general of that blundering officer. He wished to state that the Truth Teller—

The Chair observed that this was not in order on the question to print.

Mr. H. said he wished to give reasons why these documents should not be printed. This certainly was in order.

The Chair assented.

Mr. H. went on to say that this paper called the Truth Teller was published in the city of New York by an alien editor, and was notorious for its strains of low abuse on respectable men. The number of that paper which had been sent here bore on its margin, in the proper handwriting of Mr. Secretary Woodbury, a direction to the clerk to place that paper on file among the papers relating to the introduction of foreign paupers. Where now was the gentleman's excuse that this had never been seen by the secretary, but had gone on the files in the ordinary routine of business? The secretary must have read and examined the paper, and then wrote that direction on its margin.

Mr. H. had one excuse for both the president and his officer. Ever since the news of the democratic reaction throughout the country, the action of the secretary had been one series of blundering from day to day.

Mr. Cray said that anticipating what would be the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. Harlan,) he had refused to withdraw his call for the previous question. Had he supposed they would have been of a character similar to those of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams) he should have withdrawn the motion with pleasure. He returned his thanks to the gentleman from Kentucky for demonstrating just what Mr. C. thought he would demonstrate.

The printing was then ordered; and the house passed to the consideration of private bills.

The following are the articles from the "Truth-Teller," which accompanied the report of the secretary of the treasury, and gave rise to the above discussion:

From the N. Y. Truth Teller of June 24, 1837.

ALIEN PASSENGERS—THE NEW COMMON COUNCIL—DASTARDLY CONDUCT.

The course pursued by the leading aristocrats of the present common council, particularly in the board of aldermen, is, beyond any thing we ever heretofore witnessed, ungenerous, ungentlemanly, and unjust—a course which only escapes the indignation of a few, to meet with the unqualified contempt of the many. The aristocrats, unused to power, but now possessing, unfortunately, an excess of it, act like men ordinarily temperate, who have for once engaged in a debauch and indulged too freely with liquor. Their demeanor is marked by a coarse and unfeeling recklessness towards the minority, than which nothing could be more pitiful; and when we reflect that they have been chosen to represent the aristocratic party, which includes in its numbers men of talent, and education, and decency, we are forced to wonder why such obscure, and, in some cases, illiterate individuals, have been elevated over men who, however fixed and unalterable in their political opinions, would yet never cast aside all regard for gentlemanly deportment and generous and liberal sentiments, to degrade their minds and souls by worshipping the idol of prejudice, and listlessly succumbing to the basest commands of the fiercest political bigots. Yet the aristocrats, guided by the same readiness to sacrifice principle and obtain power which urged them to uphold the famous Gulick, elected the obscure Mr. Clark to the mayoralty, and returned to the common council, inter alios, George W. Bruen, esq., the nondescript politician; Matthew C. Patterson, esq., a lawyer of very limited capacity, and of mushroom popularity, even amongst his own friends; and Mr. I. T. Merritt, the cheap grocer, and, par excellence, leader of the native American party, vice Dr. Paris M. Davis, now ruralizing at Blackwell's island. Mr. Bruen is, without exception, the most bitter, malignant, and narrow-minded politician known to this city; Mr. Patterson seems to be emulating his example with vanity that knows no bounds; and Mr. Merritt, like the frog in the fable, swells himself to bursting in the attempt to attract attention, and to attain importance to which he has no claim whatever.

We propose to make our readers acquainted with the conduct of this triumvirate at a meeting of the board on Monday last. The special committee on the subject of "alien passengers," consisting of Messrs. Bruen and Whitehead, (the latter of whom is so notorious for his flagrant breach of faith with the friends of Mr. Riker, the late chief engineer,) made a report, in which, after sundry observations about "the authorities of Jersey" &c., they recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the commissioners of the almshouse be, and they are hereby, authorized, if in their judgments they see fit, to contract for the transshipment back to their own country, with their consul, of such alien paupers as may now be, or are like to become, a public charge at the establishment at Bellevue or elsewhere, upon such terms and conditions as they may think will best promote the public interest, and at the same time shall prove no prejudice to the cause of humanity."

When this resolution, so perspicuous, lucid, and correct in language, was offered, it elicited severe comments from alderman Brady, who is ever watchful to protect all classes of citizens from unmerited insult, and whose sentiments are always of the most philanthropic and liberal character. He animadverted in strong terms on the injustice of stigmatizing as "paupers" all those who come here from Europe; mentioning the fact that one gentleman who landed a day or two since, had thousands of guineas in his possession, and, so far from being a "pauper," was a man of wealth. When Mr. Brady had concluded his remarks, the cacoethes loquendi took possession of Mr. Merritt, and off he started on a crusade against the English language, plain truth, and common decency—his success in which must have filled his fellow-aristocrats with envy. He said he was desirous all emigrants should be sent back to their native land, and he considered alderman Brady "very uncharitable" for wishing otherwise. Having delivered himself of his "speech," he resumed his seat, and was then doomed to find his own insignificance and inconsistency exposed by the individual whom he had undertaken to meet in argument. Mr. Brady, by a gentle mondo, conveying the suggestion that Irishmen are not ungrateful, reprehended Mr. Merritt, who, by selling groceries of a certain kind, at a certain rate, has won that little advance in which he now glories. His customers have chiefly consisted of Irish families, and he always spoke well of them (as Mr. Brady declared) until he discovered that the enlightened patriots of the thirteenth ward required the exercise of his splendid talents in our city legislature.

But the harmless chattering of alderman Merritt deserves little notice, while the fierce language and sweeping charges of Mr. Bruen are before us.—Mr. Bruen attacked Alderman Brady, the alien passengers, and adopted citizens, with the utmost fury; uttering statements which certainly require attention. He declared that "he knew that three thousand votes were, in 1834, fabricated on the oath of a single convict;" and repeated this statement, only omitting that the fabrication of the votes was not on the oath of one person. We are glad Mr. Bruen made this statement, because it affords us the means of showing how corrupt and dangerous he is, how unmindful of his duty as a citizen, or how totally destitute of veracity. He states that he knows personally that three thousand individuals were illegally naturalized in 1834, in this city. If this be true, why did not Mr. Bruen, at the time the votes were "fabricated"—why does he not now—institute a criminal prosecution against the illegal voters, and the person or persons who are alleged to have perjured themselves when the votes were "fabricated," or against some of the offenders? How great is his presumption in calling himself a good citizen, and a friend to his own country, and an upholder of "the constitution and the laws," when, according to his own statement, he knew in 1834 of the commission of three thousand perjuries, and took no steps whatever to have the perjurers arrested! Is this upholding the laws? Is this preventing crime and infamy? Is this protecting the rights of citizens? We will explain the reason why Mr. Bruen did not endeavor to expose the perjuries he speaks of—they were never committed. It is utterly impossible that Mr. Bruen's statement can be true, unless the clerk of the court in which the three thousand aliens were illegally naturalized violated his oath and the law of the land; and if he did so, Mr. Bruen can easily detect and prove his guilt, and have him punished. We beg our readers to recollect this, and to be careful in perusing the following proofs of the statement we have just made.

The laws of the United States provide that, in order to entitle an alien to become a citizen of the United States, he must, have declared on oath or affirmation before some court of record, having a seal and a clerk, and possessed of common law jurisdiction, or before a circuit or district court of the United States, or before a clerk of either of the said courts, at least two years before his admission, his intention to become a citizen, and to renounce allegiance to any foreign government. When an alien declares his intentions, he is furnished with a certificate of the fact by the clerk of the court where the declaration is made; which certificate must be, and always is, impressed with the seal of such court. When he applies for admission as a citizen he must produce this certificate, or another or precisely the same kind, unless the declaration was made in the same court in which he applies for admission; in which case, the clerk, by referring to the records, can always ascertain if the declaration were duly made. The production of this certificate under seal, or finding the declaration in the records of the court admitting the citizens, is in all cases indispensable to the admission of the alien, unless he proves that he has continued to reside here since 18th June, 1812, or that he arrived in this country under 18 years of age, and resided here five years, including the three years preceding his attainment of majority. Unless this be proven, each alien who seeks to obtain admission as a citizen illegally must perjure himself, procure another person to do the same, forge such a certificate as is above mentioned, and counterfeit the handwriting of the clerk, and the seal of the court from which the spurious certificate would purport to emanate.

This proves that Mr. Bruen's statement cannot possibly be true. But in every point of view it is so absurd, and so preposterous, that no man in his senses can believe it. We defy him to substantiate his assertion by any reasonable or creditable testimony. He might as well endeavor to show that the moon is an icicle, or that alderman Merritt is a gentleman.

When Mr. Bruen made the gross charge which we have confuted, alderman Ingraham, whose coolness, and eloquence, and good judgment, make him so formidable an antagonist to the aristocrats, exposed the fallacy and injustice of Mr. Bruen's statement with much force of argument. This aroused the ire of Mr. Bruen, and he attained the climax of demented folly by saying that this country belongs to the Americans—that "if Irishmen assisted in obtaining our independence, they have been well paid for it;" and he thanked God the power of adopted citizens was at an end.

Alderman Patterson was foolish enough to state that his party did not exercise proscription, when he might just as rationally have denied being alive. He challenged alderman Ingraham to prove that adopted citizens have been proscribed. This is the ne plus ultra of brazen effrontery. A man stands by the stake on which he has seen hundreds of individuals suffer martyrdom for opinion's sake, and exclaims, "No one has suffered for his belief; this stake, these bones, and this scathed ground, are the evidences of the existence of civil and religious freedom." An incendiary stands on the smouldering ruins of the buildings he has destroyed, and proclaims that the buildings have not been consumed.

We have pursued this subject so far that we must leave it for the present, merely observing that the resolution we have copied passed, with a proviso that no alien passenger be sent back to Europe without his own consent. We will comment freely on this measure next week.

From the N. Y. Truth Teller of June 24, 1837.

To Aaron Clark, esq,

SIR: In the letter I addressed to you last week I pointed out to you the infamous notoriety which must attach to your name from the document which you have put forth in relation to the emigrants arriving at this port. I did not expect that a brand would have been fixed upon you by one of your own party, in relation to this matter; but I perceive by the published debates of the common council, that your own partisans have, in the presence of your fellow-citizens, with their own red hot hissing instruments of punishment, left the scar-mark of your disgrace broad upon your forehead. Alderman Bruen has told the country that what the mayor stated, in relation to the emigrants was not true. The alderman stated that he had examined the passengers, and, with but few exceptions, they were not the poor, miserable, and degraded wretches Mr. Clark had represented them! What, sir, must be your feelings now? You are despised by your opponents; you are contemned by your supporters. Your calumnies have been thrown back in your teeth by those who have placed you in your present position; and they cannot, in their consciences, sustain one whose career has thus brought upon him the condemnation of every liberal mind. I am not disposed to deal in vituperation. Abuse injuries not the abused, nor does it add to the character of him who indulges in that species of attack. The arm that is raised to strike at you, is stayed when it is observed how low and degraded is the object upon which the blow may be inflicted. The regret that must enter into the minds of even your own friends must be indeed great when they behold you bringing the petty arts and practices of the lottery-office into the discharge of the duties of the office of mayor of the city of New York. They may indeed hang their heads with shame, when they read a document which resembles a lottery advertisement in more respects than one; when they see how far it assimilates to that species of writing in its pompous diction, its misrepresentations, and, above all, its studied effort to deceive the public mind and to produce erroneous impressions. It shows evidently that the habits of life cannot be thrown aside at once, and that the practices with which they are familiar in private, are apt to mark the public career of man.

You have, as I before said, been branded with having stated that which was not warranted by your own friends. Let me ask you to turn to the records and books of the commissioners of the alms-house, and answer some questions which I will put to you. Your object, evidently, in writing your message, was to produce the impression, not only that the passengers arriving here were paupers, but that the number arriving this year was greater than at any other previous time. Now, sir, will you answer whether or not the number arriving between the 1st of March and the 1st of June, of this year, was not less by several thousands than during the same period of time of the preceding year? If not will you give the public information on that point? And here, sir, let me lead forth into the public gaze one who feels proud of being harnessed to the same political car with yourself. I refer to one who has brought in a report on the subject of immigration, and who has with great adroitness, endeavored to sustain the impressions which your message was calculated to produce. He, sir, is the son of one of the descendants of the "land o' cakes," and yet seems eager to stigmatize as paupers the friends, and, for aught the public knows, the relations of his own father. Why, sir, did he not make inquiry into this subject and he would have found that the passengers arriving from Aberdeen were in possession of money to the amount of several thousand pounds. Let alderman Patterson not ride this hobby of Native Americanism too hard. The blood of old Scotia, transmitted from his sire, flows through his veins; and his cheek ought to redden with shame when he finds that he is reiterating the slanders of some of those who came from Nova Scotia, and who have been settled by his party on one of our city departments. He ought to hesitate before he heaps contumely on the children of the land of Burns and of Scott. Let him, as an honest politician, examine every subject fairly, and be distinguished above his associates, by always putting the saddle on the right horse. He ought to have more pride than to second the views of such men as are the leaders of the Native American faction, and let him leave that work to Master Walter, of the thirteenth ward.

To return to your honor. You have suggested that the passengers arriving during the present season are in a most wretched condition as regards health. Sir, at no season has less disease been among passengers than at the present time. At other periods we have had more passengers, more misery, more disease, greater expense on our alms-house establishment than at present, and yet we have no noise. It was not deemed necessary for political purposes that our democratic commissioners should make tremendous statements, or that our democratic mayor should deal in misrepresentation. It was left for your administration to enter upon this line of conduct, which, in the end, will be found not only to degrade the character of the city, but deprive it of a revenue which, for years, has been paid into your treasury. You will find passengers arriving at other ports, and making their way to this city, in spite of laws, unless you build a Chinese wall around us, and, moreover, alter the constitution of the United States; and, at the same time, the amount heretofore received from commutation-money (in some years amounting to nearly forty thousand dollars) will be wholly withdrawn from the public treasury. You will, at the conclusion of your career, prove that you have been as incompetent for the discharge of the duties of your station, from your ignorance and want of judgment as you have already displayed yourself unworthy of it by your illiberality, inhumanity, and want of regard for the feelings of your fellow-men.

It is with feelings of any nature but those of a pleasant character that I address you. It is indeed humiliating to attempt to castigate one whose armor of hide is impervious to the lash. Surrounded as you are by a fetid political atmosphere, where malignity, falsehood, and slander alone can exist, it is with but little hope of reforming your conduct that I indite these letters. Your course of conduct, brief as it is, is blackened sufficiently to excite the disgust of every candid man; and you may rest assured, however those around you may, from interested motives, make you believe that you are growing popular, that there is a spirit of intelligence and liberality abroad, which silently but powerfully is advancing, and will never rest until it has consigned you to that retirement from which it had been better, both for your own character and that of our city, you never had been called.

PATRICK HENRY.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

June 1. After some business of minor importance had been disposed of,

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill to divide the territory of Wisconsin, and to establish the territorial government of Iowa, (west of the Mississippi.)

On motion of Mr. Crittenden, the term of service of the members of the higher branch of the legislative council was reduced from four to two years, and of the lower from two to one.

The amendment from the judiciary committee, changing the term of the judges from that during good behaviour, to four years, was advocated by Messrs. Webster, Morris, Grundy, Allen, and Sevier, chiefly on the ground that the requisition of the constitution, that the judges of the United States should continue in office during good behaviour, had reference to the States considered in a strict geographical sense, not including the territories; and that in a new country an opportunity would probably soon arise of selecting better men for judges; and it was opposed by Messrs. Clay, of Alabama, Norvell, and Prentiss, on the ground that the expression in the constitution, "the judicial power of the United States," meant the whole judicial power of the general government, whether in the states or the territories, geographically considered.

The committee's amendment, limiting the judicial tenure of office to four years, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, all but while males were expressly excluded from the right of suffrage under the bill.

On motion of Mr. Crittenden, two new sections were added to the bill regulating the election, &c. of the members of the legislative council, and making temporary provision in relation to the judicial districts, and to the times of holding the courts.

Some minor amendments also were offered, and agreed to.

The bill itself was briefly opposed by Messrs. King and Sevier; and it was advocated by Messrs. Crittenden, Clay, of Alabama, and Buchanan; the arguments having mainly a reference to the size of the portion of the proposed territory inhabited by whites, (disputed, from 50 by 180 miles to 90 by 300 miles,) to the number of the white population, (from 25,000 to 80,000,) and to the comparative advantages of protection from Indian hostilities.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, without a division. Subsequently read a third time and passed.

Some time was spent in considering the bill making appropriations for the completion of certain roads in Michigan; but, before the question was taken, it was laid on the table. Ayes 19, nays 14.

On motion of Mr. Trotter, the bill to reorganize the district courts of the United States in Mississippi was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. The bill to confirm certain pre-emption claims under the act of 1834 was taken up, opposed by Mr. King, advocated by Mr. Trotter, and laid on the table with a view to amend it, on the suggestion of Mr. Webster, so as to exempt from its operation cases of litigated claims. On motion of Mr. Benton, the senate held an executive session. After which the bills ordered to a third reading to-day were, by consent, severally read a third time and passed.

The senate then (with a view to summer arrangements in the chamber) adjourned over to Tuesday next.

June 5. After a number of petitions had been presented and disposed of,

Mr. Hubbard, from the committee of claims, reported the house bill referred to them, for the relief of the heirs of Robert Fulton, without amendment, stating that two of the committee were of opinion that the whole amount allowed by the house of representatives was justly due to the claimants; another member thought that about $20,000 was due; but the other two members of the committee were of opinion that nothing whatever was due to the claimants. Mr. H. therefore gave notice that, when the bill should come up, he would move for its indefinite postponement.

Mr. White, from the committee on Indian affairs, to whom were referred the message of the president, the communication of the secretary of war, and other documents, in favor of two years' further delay in removing the Cherokee Indians, of further appropriations for indemnities, and of leaving the management of their removal, as far as practicable, to the Cherokees themselves, made a report, chiefly adverse in its tenor to the propositions submitted by the secretary of war.

The report was read; and, after arguing the great difficulty of submitting the question of the proposed two years delay to the respective legislatures of the states concerned, recommend that the removal should be effected as soon as it could be safely and conveniently done, in the opinion of the executive; that a sufficient sum of money for this, and for the purposes of indemnity, should be placed at the disposal of the executive; and that the removal should be managed by government authorities, so as to protect both them and the people of the places through which they might pass.

On motion of Mr. White, the report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the committee on the post office and post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the employment of an additional number of clerks in the general post office department, to meet the demands of the increase of labor and the extension of business.

On motion of Mr. Davis, the secretary of the treasury was directed to inform the senate of the amount of the annual expenditure in the collection of the revenue on imports for the last twenty years, discriminating between what has been paid for services and on other accounts.

Mr. Morris offered a resolution, which lies over one day, that congress adjourn on Monday, the 2d of July, to meet on the second Monday in November next; that no member of Congress receive compensation for services during the recess; (and another item unheard.) The following bills were read a third time and passed: To reorganize the United States district courts in Mississippi. To authorize the location of certain pre-emption certificates in Arkansas. Making disposition of certain copies of the Biennial Register, and to supply the committees of congress with certain books.

On motion of Mr. Lyon, the senate took up the bill making appropriations for the completion of certain roads in Michigan.

On motion of Mr. Lyon, the bill was amended by adopting a substitute, granting to Michigan, for the purpose contemplated, five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in Michigan, from June 23d, 1835, to July 1, 1836, on the ground that during that time Michigan was entitled to have been a state of the union; one-fifth only of the above amount to be expended during the present year. The amount of this one-fifth, Mr. Lyon stated, in reply to an inquiry by Mr. Southard, was something more than $100,000.

On the call of Mr. Davis, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the bill, so modified, was ordered to a third reading as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lyon, McKean, Mouton, Norvell, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, Webster, Wright, Young—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clayton, Davis, Knight, Lumpkin, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, White—21.

The bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for arrears of 1837, was received from the house, read twice, and referred to the committee on finance.

Mr. White gave notice that he should move, early on Friday morning, to go into executive business, with a view to clear the docket of all such business that called for the action of the senate before the final passage of the appropriation bills.

On motion of Mr. Trotter, the bill to confirm certain purchases of the public lands, under the act of the 19th of June, 1834, was taken up, amended by exempting cases of litigated claims from its operation, and, so modified, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill granting the right of way through the public lands, to the state of Illinois, was taken up, advocated at considerable length by Mr. Young, and opposed by Mr. King and Mr. Southard, chiefly on the ground that a general bill on the subject had been passed at this session, doing equal justice to all the states, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

The bill to grant a township of land to the French university of St. Louis, Missouri, was advocated by Mr. Benton and Mr. Sevier, opposed by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, and indefinitely postponed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Rives, Roane, Ruggles, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Wall, White, Williams—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Fulton, Linn, Lyon, Mouton, Norvell, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Webster, Young—13.

The bill to confirm certain entries of public lands permitted to be made by the registers and receivers of the land districts, under the belief that the tracts had been offered at public sale, was explained and advocated by Mr. Fulton, amended by a substitute offered by him, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The house bill for the relief of John P. Converse and Henry J. Rees was discussed at much length by Messrs. Merrick, Niles, Robinson, and Grundy, and was lost on the question of ordering it to a third reading: Ayes 14, noes 16.

The bill for the relief of the widow and heirs of col. Albert Pawling was discussed by Messrs. Hubbard, Prentiss, King, Norvell, Tallmadge, White, Sevier, Niles, and laid on the table: Yeas 20, noes 18.

The senate adjourned; after an executive session.

June 6. On motion of Mr. White, the message from the president, received yesterday during the executive session, relating to Indian affairs, was referred, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Trotter and Mr. Mouton presented petitions from individuals. Referred.

Mr. Linn, from the special committee on the establishment of a new territory on the Columbia or Oregon river, made a report on the subject, (the bill having been reported several days ago,) which report, on Mr. L.'s motion, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on Finance, reported, without amendment, the bill from the house referred to them making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for the year 1838, and for the payment of arrears in 1837; Mr. W. giving notice that he would ask the senate to consider it at an early hour to-morrow morning.

A number of bills were reported from committees and ordered to a second reading; which will be noticed in the further progress.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the vote of the senate rejecting the bill for the relief of John P. Converse and Henry J. Rees, was considered, and the bill was recommitted for further investigation.

Mr. Lyon presented a resolution, which, being objected to, lies over one day, calling on the secretary of war for copies of letters from gen. Scott, and other documents in relation to certain charges made by the British colonel Maitland and others against the conduct of authorities of the United States and of the state of Michigan in the late frontier troubles.

Mr. L. accompanied the resolution with some remarks referring especially to the approbation expressed by the British authorities, by capt. Marryat and others, of the destruction of the steamboat Caroline, and to the recent destruction of a British steamboat, which Mr. L. considered mainly as a consequence of that approbation. His desire was that the truth on the subject might be fully ascertained, and that the actual offenders might be brought to punishment.

On motion of Mr. Benton, 8,000 extra copies of the documents from the secretary of the treasury, stating the rates of exchange and prices of bank notes, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster submitted the following, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury communicate to the senate a copy of any order or circular issued by him to the collectors and receivers of public moneys, since the passage of the joint resolution of the 1st of June, 1838, "relating to the public revenues and dues to the government."

Several bills were received from the house of representatives, read twice, and referred.

The following bills were read a third time, and passed: The bill to confirm certain purchases of the public lands under the act of June, 1834. The bill for the completion of certain roads in Michigan. And the bill to confirm certain entries of public lands permitted to be made by the registers and receivers of the land districts, under the belief that the tract had been offered at public sale.

The following bills were considered and ordered to a third reading:

The senate bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana.

The senate bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefit of the act granting pre-emption rights, approved June 18, 1834.

The senate bill to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of the paymasters in the army. [Explained and advocated by Mr. Benton.]

The senate considered the bill to grant to the Mount Carmel and New Albany rail road company, of Indiana, the alternate sections of the public land on the route of their road, on condition that the company should carry the United States mail for twenty years, and that the U. S. troops, arms, and munitions of war, forever free of expense.

This bill was at much length explained and advocated by Messrs. Tipton, and Smith, of Indiana, and opposed by Messrs. Benton, Niles, and Allen.

Mr. Hubbard, with a view to make way for a substitute for the bill, moved to strike out all but the enacting clause, which motion prevailed: Ayes 23, noes 11.

Mr. Tipton then offered a substitute for the bill, authorizing the company to enter the alternate sections, on a credit of six years, at $1 25, on condition that the road should be completed in that time. That the company, in the mean time, might purchase any of the remaining land at the government price; that in case of failure to pay for the land at the end of six years, it should revert to the government; and that the company should, at all times, transport the United States arms and munitions of war free of charge.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the bill was laid on the table, and made the special order for to-morrow.

The Senate took up the amendments of the other house to the bill to create the territory of Iowa.

Mr. Preston moved to lay the bill on the table. Negatived as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Lumpkin, Preston, Sevier, Spence, Strange, White—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Roane, Robinson, Ruggles, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Trotter, Wall, Webster, Williams, Young—33.

The senate then concurred in the amendments of the house.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

June 7. After a number of petitions had been presented, and several bills reported, that will be noticed in their progress, the resolution offered on the 6th instant by Mr. Morris, relative to the adjournment, was taken up, and, after having been explained and advocated by the mover, was, on motion of Mr. Lumpkin, laid on the table.

Mr. Webster's resolution, offered yesterday, calling on the secretary of the treasury for a copy of such order as he might have recently issued in regard to receiving bank notes, coming up for consideration.

Mr. Webster said a treasury order had been published, which it was proper should be officially communicated to the senate. When speaking on the joint resolution which lately passed, (said Mr. W.) I observed that some further legal provision would be necessary, if the resolution should pass. This expectation is quite confirmed by the new circular. As to some of the conditions, or limitations, stated by the secretary, it is true that they are imposed by existing statutes, and must be regarded; such as that the bills of no bank should be received, which bank, since June, 1836, has issued, or paid out, bills less than five dollars. As all the banks in some of the states, and nearly all in others, are in this predicament, it is necessary, undoubtedly, that some act of legislation should be passed, in order to make the recent resolution of any practical effect in those states.

There are other parts of the new circular, however, of which I do not see the necessity, even as the case now stands.

It is proper, however, that the paper should be officially before us, as undoubtedly some further legislation will be necessary; and I shall myself propose some measure on the subject at an early day.

The resolution was adopted without dissent.

The Vice President presented a communication from the treasury department, in pursuance of a senate resolution of May 2d, with a condensed statement of the condition of the state deposit banks, derived from the latest returns, together with the returns on which the statement was founded. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Several bills were received from the house, read twice, and referred.

The senate concurred in the amendments of the other house to the bill to establish the office of surveyor general for Wisconsin. The following bills were read a third time, and passed the bill for the relief of Robert Keyworth. The bill to authorize John E. Metcalf and others to locate certain pre-emption claims to land in Indiana. The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, who were deprived of the benefit of the act of June, 1834, granting pre-emption rights; and the bill to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of paymasters in the army.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to consider the house bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrears in 1837.

An earnest discussion arose on this bill, (not in opposition to its passage,) in which Messrs. Webster, Wright, Preston, Clay, of Alabama, Lumpkin, Strange, Southard, and White participated. Some of the principal topics were the manner of conducting the Florida war; the unparalleled expense (about $20,000,000) which had been incurred during its continuance; the great uncertainty as to the additional time and expense necessary to its termination; the hasty examination into the conduct of General Scott, on a letter from his second in command, as contrasted with the want of all examination into the management of his accuser and successor; the want of full and satisfactory information as to the war; the late alleged treaty with the Cherokees; the supposed intention of the executive (which was denied) to extend the time of executing the treaty; and the prospect that by the prompt and skillful conduct of general Scott such delay would not be necessary.

The bill, without amendment, was ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Calhoun, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Knight, Linn, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Mouton, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Preston, Rives, Roane, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Wall, Webster, White, Williams, Wright, Young—40.

The bill was about to pass by unanimous consent, when

Mr. Hubbard stated that Mr. Benton had expressed to him a desire to address the senate on its third reading; and,

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, May 30. Mr. Garland, of Louisiana announced that the agreeable duty had been confided to him of apprising the house that the people of Mississippi had affirmed their decision of November last in favor of Messrs. Prentiss and Word, as their representatives in the twenty-fifth congress, and that those gentlemen were now in attendance, ready to take their seats. The Choir. "The members elect will please present themselves for qualification." Messrs. Prentiss and Word came to the table, and as the speaker was about to administer the oath, Mr. Prentiss remarked that, before being sworn, candor compelled him to inform the house, on behalf of himself and colleague, that they did not claim their seats by virtue of the recent election in Mississippi, but by virtue of the election in November last; that they looked upon the recent election as unconstitutional and wholly invalid.

"Mr. P. further said that his colleague and himself could not conscientiously take the oath under any other election than that of November, and that upon their consciences they should take their oath and seats, if they took them at all, by virtue of that election alone.

"Mr. P. said that a high sense of duty, both to himself and the house, called upon him for this avowal, that, if any wished to make objection, they might have the opportunity of so doing."

The Speaker said that the statement of the member from Louisiana, that the gentlemen were the elected representatives from Mississippi, was sufficient to authorize his administration of the oath of office to them; and he administered the oath to both gentlemen accordingly.

Mr. Boon rose and expressed a wish to act upon the joint resolution received from the senate yesterday. It was not his wish to embarrass the progress of the Indian appropriation bill; and he should therefore move for the suspension of the rules for one hour, for the purpose of taking up and considering the joint resolution of the senate in regard to the currency.

Mr. Pickens said, that he hoped the house would not spend time in discussing a collateral matter, at this late period of the session, while a bill covering the whole subject, which has passed the senate, and is lying on the table, yet remains unacted on. The Chair reminded Mr. P. that a motion to suspend the rules was not debatable. Mr. Pickens said he had risen to demand the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. Boon. The yeas and nays were ordered; and the house decided the question of suspending the rules for one hour, for the purpose indicated in the motion, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, Banks, Bell, Bicknell, Bond, Boon, Briggs, Brodhead, Buchanan, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Casey, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Connor, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, J. Garland, R. Garland, Goode, W. Graham, Grantland, Grennell, Hal-y, Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, Kemble, Kilgore, Legare, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, J. M. Mason, May, Maxwell, R. McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Parmenter, Pearce, Peck, Phelps, Pope, Potts, Pratt, S. S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Ridgway, Robinson, Runney, Russell, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Shields, Slade, Snyder, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Tillinghast, Toland, Vanderveer, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Beirne, Cambreleng, Chapman, Clowney, Craig, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Haynes, Holsey, Holt, Hubley, N. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, McKay, A. McClellan, McClure, Paynter, Pennybacker, Pickens, Potter, Reilly, Rives, Shepler, Spencer, Titus, Turney, Webster, J. W. Williams—34.

So the rules were suspended.

The resolution was then read twice, as follows:

"Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, &c. That it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to make, or to continue in force, any general order which shall create any difference between the different branches of revenue, as to the money or medium of payment in which debts or dues accruing to the United States may be paid."

And the next question in course being upon the ordering the resolution to a third reading.

Mr. Boon immediately moved the previous question, which was seconded; and the main question was then ordered to be put, without a division.

Mr. Sherrod Williams demanded the yeas and nays upon the question of ordering the resolution to a third reading. They were ordered; and, being taken stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, Anderson, Ayerigg, Banks, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, W. B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Dawson, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Fairfield, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Gallup, J. Garland, R. Garland, Glascock, Goode, Wm. Graham, Grantland, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes,

Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Holsey, Hopkins, Howard, R. M. T. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, N. Jones, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Lewis, Lincoln, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, James M. Mason, Maury, May, Maxwell, R. McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Parmenter, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Potter, Pratt, S. S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reilly, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Runney, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Shields, Slade, Snyder, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Vanderveer, Webster, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—151

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Cambreleng, Clowney, Coles, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Isaac Fletcher, Fry, Holt, Hubley, Keim Leadbetter, Logan, McKay, Abraham McClellan McClure, Moore, Parris, Petrikin, Rives, Shepler, Spencer, Thomas, Turney, J. W. Williams—27.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The house then decided that the third reading should take place this day; and the bill was read accordingly. Mr. Duncan moved to recommit the joint resolution to the committee on public lands, with the following instructions:

"That this joint resolution be committed to the committee on public lands, with instructions to report the following amendments, viz. Provided, That no portion of the public domain greater than $20 acres shall be sold to any individual; nor shall any portion of the public domain be sold or disposed of to any individual, or body corporate, except for the purpose of immediate occupation."

On this motion Mr. Duncan asked the yeas and nays. Mr. Boon immediately moved the previous question, (cutting off the motion to commit,) and it was seconded; and the main question was then ordered to be put. Mr. Chapman, of Alabama, asked the yeas and nays on the question. "Shall the joint resolution pass?" And they were ordered.

The yeas and nays, thus taken, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, Anderson, Ayerigg, Banks, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Bond, Boon, Briggs, Broadhead, Bronson, Buchanan, William B. Calhoun, J. Calhoun, W. B. Campbell, Casey, Chambers, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Clark, Connor, Corwin, Craig, Crary, Cranston, Crockett, Cushing, Dawson, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, Fillmore, Gallup, J. Garland, R. Garland, Glascock, Goode, Wm. Graham, Grantland, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Halstead, Hamer, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, R. M. T. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Kemble, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Lincoln, Loomis, Mallory, Marvin, J. M. Mason, Samson Mason, Martin, Maury, May, Maxwell, R. McClellan, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Morgan, C. Morris, Murray, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Ogle, Owens, Parmenter, Patterson, Peck, Pennybacker, Phelps, Pickens, Pope, Potts, Pratt, J. H. Prentiss, S. S. Prentiss, Rariden, Randolph, Reed, Reilly, Rencher, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Runney, Russell, Sawyer, Sergeant, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Shields, Slade, Snyder, Stanly, Stuart, Stratton, Taliaferro, Taylor, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Underwood, Vanderveer, Webster, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, Worthington, Yell, Yorke—154.

NAYS—Messrs. Atherton, Bouldin, Camberleng, Clowney, Coles, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, I. Fletcher, Fry, Harrison, Holt, Hubley, Keim, Leadbetter, Logan, McKay, A. McClellan, McClure, Moore, Parris, Petrikin, Rives, Shepler, Spencer, Thomas, Turney, Jared W. Williams—29.

So the joint resolution was passed, and returned to the senate. [It requires only the approbation of the president to become a law.]

Mr. Ewing gave notice of an amendment it was his intention to offer to the Indian appropriation bill under consideration; and it was ordered to be printed. Mr. Patterson and Mr. Cushman made ineffectual attempts to present resolutions relating to post routes. On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house again went into committee of the whole upon this bill, and Mr. Holsey resumed the floor in its support. The remainder of the day was spent in proceedings upon this bill, of which an account shall be given in our next.

In the course of the day, Mr. Lyon, of Alabama, asked the leave of the house to record his vote in favor of the passage of the joint resolution from the senate relating to the public revenue and dues to the government.

He said, when the vote was unexpectedly taken on the passage of the resolution this morning, he was necessarily absent from his seat in attending to the claims of two or three revolutionary soldiers of his district, whose pay had been refused at the agency nearest their residence, under a regulation which, in his judgment, imposed upon the pensioners and their representatives much unnecessary trouble. He alluded to the regulation which required, in the event of their failure to apply for their pay for a specified time, that they should be paid at the treasury, and not at the agencies convenient to them.

He said, in common with the great majority of his constituents, he felt much interest in the passage of the resolution prohibiting a discrimination in the kind of money to be received by the government in payment for public lands, and for duties. He was gratified that congress had, by a vote so decisive, determined to put an end to a regulation of the late executive, by which specie had been required in payment for public lands while bank notes were authorized to be received in payment for duties. If he had been aware that the resolution would have been put upon its passage so soon after it came down from the senate, his desire to serve even a revolutionary soldier would not have prevented him from being present, and voting for it. He hoped the house would allow him now to have his vote recorded.

[This request of Mr. Lyon was not granted.]

Mr. Holsey, having concluded his remarks in support of the bill, and in favor of the immediate ratification of the treaty at New Echota, was followed by

Mr. Naylor, who, in a warm and energetic speech, reviewed the history of this government's negotiations and treaties with the Cherokees, all of which he described as constituting a premeditated system of oppression towards that tribe, for the purpose of obtaining their lands. He dwelt upon the expulsion of the Indians from their native homes as an act of disgraceful injustice, and enlorgized very highly the character of Ross, and praised, in terms of great eloquence, the firm and intrepid character of that chief, who, amidst so much detraction and denunciation, had stood up boldly in defence of his people and their rights. Much of his speech consisted of documentary reading, going to show that the treaty of New Echota was fraudulent, whence he argued that to enforce such a treaty would be grossly cruel and oppressive.

Mr. N. gave way, during his remarks, at the request of

Mr. Noyes, who moved that the committee rise, to enable him to move that the resolution of the senate (that day received, and then on the table, asking for certain papers which, through mistake, had not been sent up, with a bill from that house, requiring immediate action) be taken up and considered.

This motion prevailing, the committee rose, and the message from the senate being taken up, the request it contained was granted without a division; and then, the house having again gone into committee of the whole, Mr. Naylor resumed the remarks he had been making, and closed with a declaration of his fixed resolution not to vote one dollar for the purpose of carrying the treaty of New Echota, fraudulent and oppressive as he deemed it, into execution.

Mr. Chapman defended the Indian policy of Alabama, at some length, and replied to those remarks of Mr. Naylor, which were eulogistic of Ross, and in which he commented so severely upon the treaties hitherto entered into with the Cherokees.

Mr. Dawson next took the floor. He defended the treaty, as the only representative in congress from what at home is called the Indian party. He declared himself friendly now, as he had ever been known to be—most friendly to the Indians. He compared the Cherokee Indian policy, especially so far as Georgia is concerned, with the policy constantly pursued towards other tribes in other parts of the country; and deduced from that comparison the argument that it was inconsistent for the people of those states, by whose policy the Indian tribes within their limits are now entirely or comparatively extinct, to condemn the present policy of Georgia towards the Cherokees.

Mr. Bell followed, and commenced a speech in review of the whole Indian policy of the government, and dwelt to some extent on the fact that the estimates, upon which the present bill was based, were grounded on a state of things that did not now exist, and that, consequently, there was not now the necessity which then existed for so large an appropriation as the bill demanded; when,

On motion of Mr. Wise, the committee rose.

A motion being made that the house adjourn—

Mr. Dromgoole demanded the yeas and nays which were ordered; and, at half past eight o'clock the house adjourned.

Thursday, May 31. Mr. Loomis, after an explanation, obtained leave to call up the following resolution, offered by him on the 19th March last:

Resolved, That the postmaster general furnish to this house an estimate, showing, as near as he can ascertain—

1. What proportion of the mails of the United States consists of free parcels estimated by weight;

2. What proportion consists of free parcels estimated by amount of postage on parcels that pay postage, and accounting all printed documents at pamphlet postage;

3. What would be the proportion of the amount of postage to be paid by government, in case all free parcels were charged to government at the same rate that private parcels are charged;

4. To how low a rate the tariff of postage would be reduced, and sustain the department, in case all parcels conveyed by mail were chargeable with postage;

5. To how low a rate the tariff of postage can be reduced, now or prospectively, within two years, retaining the present franking privilege, and sustain the department, with a rate of tariff deemed judicious and proper by him, in case such reduction should be ordered.

This resolution was read and agreed to.

Reports were now received from committees, among which were the following:

By Mr. Whittlesey, of Ohio, from the committee of claims, reported, without amendment, senate bill to authorize payment to be made to the Missouri volunteers whose horses were lost or cast away on the voyage to Tampa Bay.

Mr. W. from the same committee, also reported against the case of Polly Estes.

By Mr. Worthington, from the committee on commerce, a bill, entitled "An act to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans."

On motion of Mr. Lyon,

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law prohibiting, under certain penalties, persons in command of vessels from discharging ballast into the channel or anchorage ground of any bay or harbor in the United States so as to obstruct the navigation thereof.

On motion of Mr. Bell,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary inquire into the expediency of amending the several acts prescribing the mode of taking depositions, by authorizing all persons, authorized by the laws of the states, to take depositions in causes pending in state courts, to take depositions in causes pending in the courts of the United States, and by enacting such other provisions as shall in their opinion promote the convenience of suitors, without removing any of the restrictions necessary to the safe administration of justice.

Mr. Worthington, from the committee on commerce, reported for the action of the house the following resolution, which gave rise to a brief discussion between Messrs. Whittlesey, Cushman, Fillmore, Bronson, Cray, and Marvin, and was then laid on the table till to-morrow.

Resolved, That the secretary of war be instructed to communicate to the house of representatives, at the commencement of the next session of congress, a copy of each survey, and chart accompanying the same, that has been heretofore made of the shores, harbors, inlets, and waters of Lake Erie; also, a copy of each similar survey that has been made of Lake Michigan.

On motion of Mr. Whittlesey, the order of the day for Saturday was altered, by directing that the revolutionary pension bills assigned to that day be taken up at half past 10 instead of 12 o'clock. A bill from the senate, to require the holding of a district court in West Tennessee, being taken up, was opposed by Mr. Bond, and advocated by Mr. Garland, of Virginia, and Mr. Crockett, who moved the previous question, but consented to withdraw it at the request of Mr. Shields. Mr. Fillmore inquired how it happened that an application from New York for a similar accommodation to that proposed by this bill had been refused by the committee while this was so favorably reported on? Mr. Garland said he could give no explanation: the chairman of the committee (Mr. Thomas) was not in his place. Mr. Fillmore now (according to promise) renewed the call for the previous question. The house sustained the call. Mr. Bond moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays: but the house refused to order them, and the motion was negative. The previous question being put, Mr. Bond again demanded the yeas and nays, but they were again refused. The bill was then passed.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, to further consider the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. Bell resumed his speech in support of the following amendment proposed by him some days since to the bill:

"Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal west: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation, unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the president shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the government.

"Sec. — And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supply themselves, and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the president shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. Bell went extensively into the general subject of our Indian relations, and repelling the imputation that his own views of them had changed. Mr. B. spoke until 3 o'clock. When he had concluded, Mr. Everett presented, in a succinct form, the heads of an argument which he should dilate and fill up were there time, but which he should present in a fuller form in a written report of his speech. He went at some length into an examination of the treaty of 1835, and though he denied its obligation on the Cherokees, yet gave it as his opinion that their interest and the necessity of the case rendered it expedient for them to remove. He supported the amendment proposed by the committee on Indian affairs; commending the spirit in which the president's communication had been made, and expressing his confident expectation that, should the additional money be granted, the Cherokees would remove peaceably and speedily.

Mr. Cray next addressed the committee, and though differing very widely from Mr. Everett in almost all the principles and positions he laid down, he agreed with him in the conclusion to which that gentleman had come in favor of the amendment proposed by the committee on Indian affairs. He spoke at some length in reply to the speech of Mr. Bell, and in defence of the administration in its course of Indian policy.

Mr. Turney followed in a speech which he continued until a quarter before eight, when he gave way for a motion that the committee do rise. His speech consisted chiefly in a personal reply to Mr. Bell, large extracts of whose former speeches he quoted and commented upon.

The motion to rise prevailing, the committee rose.

Mr. Cambreleng moved to make this bill the order for to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and hoped it would be done with the understanding that the bill should be got through with on that day.

The house then adjourned at 8 o'clock.

Friday, June 1. The morning hour allotted to resolutions, was occupied in the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. Worthington, from the committee on commerce, relative to the surveys of the lakes; but before a final decision upon it, the house, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Howard in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Indian hostility appropriation bill.

Mr. Turney resumed the floor, and finished his speech in support of the bill.

After Mr. Turney had concluded his remarks,

Mr. Bell rose, and, having complained of the attack of his colleague as unprovoked and unexpected, disclaimed any particular ill-will to him, on the ground that he was acting only as a conduit for the concocted and long-cherished malice of others, who had never thought proper to meet him personally. His colleague was acting as an instrument—as a tool—as the tool of tools.

Here Mr. Turney (who sat immediately before Mr. Bell) rose, and, looking him in the face, said, it is false, it is false.

Mr. Bell thereupon struck at Mr. Turney in the face, and blows were for a short time exchanged between them.

Mr. Turney repeated his assertion that it was false, and the attack was renewed.

Great confusion ensued. Members rushed from their seats, and cries were heard for the "Speaker!" and the "Sergeant-at-arms!" Mr. Duncan, said that such things must be the consequence of the abuses which was going on. One or two other members, while crowding to the spot, had some rather sharp verbal encounters.

The Speaker hastily took the chair, called on the sergeant-at-arms to preserve order, and read a British precedent, (see Jeffersons Manual, p. 132,) where the speaker of the house of commons had, in like manner, interposed to quell a disturbance which had arisen while the house was in committee of the whole.

Mr. Howard explained, in his own justification, that the occurrence had taken place so suddenly, that, though he was most anxious to preserve order, he had not had time to interpose until the speaker had, very properly, assumed the chair. At this he felt nothing to complain of. The house had naturally more confidence, at such a moment of excitement, in an officer who was their own choice, than could be reposed in a member only presiding for a short time. What was the proper course to be now pursued, it was difficult for him to suggest, and he did not suggest any.

Mr. Wise said, that the excitement which had arisen was, as had correctly been observed by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Howard,) very sudden, and it had now already blown over. There was no disorder in the house; none, certainly, that was visible; the best mode of disposing of the matter, was for the house, calmly, and with dignity, to go back into committee.

The Speaker. The impression of the chair is—

Mr. Mercer here rose, and said that, on a recent occurrence of a similar character, he had submitted a resolution declaring that it was proper for the house to enforce the rule which requires that in case of such unpleasant occurrences, both the parties concerned must, before leaving the house, enter into a promise that the affair should proceed no further. The house, however, had, to his great pain, laid the resolution on the table. He could not now consent to make such a motion; but the case was perfectly plain. He thought the rules of the house were the laws of the house; but if the house would not execute its own rules, Mr. M. could not perform his duty in it: There could be no more dishonor in supporting one rule than another. It was no dishonor to support a peace officer in the discharge of his duty; all were bound to do so. The rule was palpable. He did not rise to comment on the controversy; he had not heard the remarks of one of the gentlemen, (Mr. Turney,) and therefore could not judge of the provocation which had been given. If the house had not morality enough to support its own laws, Mr. M. could only regret it.

The Chair put the question on going into committee of the whole.

Mr. Fletcher, of Vermont, commenced to address the house, expressing his pain at seeing the dignity of the house trampled on, and listening to disparaging remarks by gentlemen against each other—

The Chair reminded him that the question was not debatable. Mr. Mercer said he was reducing a motion to writing, and would, in a few moments, be ready to present it. Mr. Owens moved that the house adjourn.

On this motion Mr. Mercer demanded the yeas and nays; but subsequently withdrew the demand.

Mr. Yell said he hoped the gentleman from Virginia would not insist on the motion he seemed about to make, or make any proposition in the case. It might seem extraordinary that a gentleman from Arkansas should stand up in that house on such an occasion as a peace-maker, yet such was now his design. If the gentleman from Virginia was desirous of promoting peace, his best course would be to do nothing. Mr. Y. had the pleasure to be well acquainted with both the gentlemen from Tennessee. If they were let alone, the momentary excitement would quickly subside, and the whole matter would stop here; but if the gentleman introduced his resolution, it would be a question of privilege, the house would get into a debate, and the two gentlemen would be removed to so great a distance, that all attempts at reconciling them would be hopeless. He had never known any good to follow from the efforts of the gentleman from Virginia in such cases, though he gave him every credit for good intentions. If the matter was to be debated, then the house must go into an examination of the causes of the rencontre, and its circumstances; all this would be productive only of evil. He knew both the gentlemen well. It would be best to leave them to their own good sense.

Mr. Wise coincided with the gentleman from Arkansas in referring this request to his colleague, (Mr. Mercer.) He begged him not to attempt to enforce the rule he had alluded to. It would only widen the breach. These gentlemen's age and standing would induce them to preserve the decorum of the house. From what both had declared in their speeches, there could be no previous ill-will between them. He did not doubt they were already ashamed of their momentary heat. They were already more punished than by any resolution or discipline of the house. He protested against the solemnity with which every casual difference was taken up in this house. This was the spring of the year, and what the house had witnessed was a mere April gust, and would pass off and be forgotten. His colleague had tried this course frequently before. [Mr. Mercer. Never but once.] Well, I suggest to my colleague that he will withdraw the resolution.

Mr. Mercer now moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That warm words and a mutual assault having passed between two members of this house, viz. John Bell and H. L. Turney, of the state of Tennessee; they be called upon by the speaker to declare, in their places, that they will not prosecute any quarrel."

Mr. Duncan asked whether there was not a motion pending to go into committee? and whether this resolution was in order? The Chair reminded Mr. D. it was a question of privilege.

Mr. Yell moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Mercer on the table, and it was done: Ayes 80, noes 52.

A gentleman here rose to order, and inquired whether it would be in order now to move the previous question, and thus act upon the bill under debate? The Chair replied in the negative. The house could not act upon the bill until it should have been reported from the committee of the whole.

Mr. Bronson spoke on the same point; but the chair adhered to its decision.

Mr. Bouldin moved that the house adjourn. The motion was negatived without a count.

Mr. Pennybacker said that it was a farce that the house should have rules, and refuse to enforce them. He then moved the following resolution:

"The hon. H. L. Turney and the hon. John Bell having violated the privileges of this house, by assaulting each other in the house, whilst sitting, it is, therefore,

"Resolved, That the said H. L. Turney and John Bell do apologise to the house for violating its privileges, and offending its dignity."

Mr. Yell inquired whether this was not, in substance, the same resolution which had been offered by his colleague (Mr. Mercer.)

The Chair replied in the negative.

Mr. Yell then moved to lay the resolution also on the table.

Mr. Grant demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The roll had been called about one-third part through, when Mr. Wise rose and stated to the house that both gentlemen were ready and desirous to make the apology required; and proposed that the call be suspended; but the roll was called through; and the yeas and nays resulted as follows: Yeas 21, nays 165.

Mr. Bell then rose and said he had been ready at any moment, to acknowledge that he had violated the order of the house. He, however, appealed to the older members of the house to say whether it had been his habit to use unparliamentary language in that house. He regretted extremely that he had violated the decorum, and offended against the dignity of the house.

Mr. Turney followed, but in a tone so low, that but little of what he said could be heard. He was understood to say that he had no intention to insult the house, or to violate its rules.

The resolution was then laid on the table, and the house went back into committee of the whole, when Mr. Bell resumed the course of his speech in reply to his colleague, (Mr. Turney,) and in vindication of his past political conduct and character. He dwelt with much particularity and emphasis upon the attempts which he alleged had been made, for some years, by political opponents, at home, to destroy him politically; and, having completed his remarks, was followed by Messrs. Halsted and Underwood, in opposition to the bill as reported, and in favor of the proposed amendment.

After they had finished their remarks the house grew impatient, and loud cries of "question!" were reiterated from all parts of the hall.

The question was then taken on the following amendment of Mr. Bell, and it was adopted, by tellers—Ayes 77, noes 70. Add to the end of the bill as follows:

"Provided, That, if the president shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that the government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply two millions of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

As soon as the vote on this amendment was announced by the Chair, Mr. Cambreleng rose, and said he must insist upon another count thereon. The Chair said such a course would be irregular. Mr. Cambreleng hoped that some gentleman who had voted for it, as he had no doubt many had done, under a misapprehension, would move to reconsider the vote. Mr. Everett expressed the hope that the chairman of the committee on Indian affairs would bring forward the amendment introduced by order of that committee. Mr. Anderson moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment above stated was adopted. Mr. Dromgoole said it was not in order to move a reconsideration in committee of the whole. The Chairman decided that it was in order to do so.

Mr. Rice Garland appealed from that decision, referring the chair to the parliamentary manual in corroboration of the point of order made by Mr. Dromgoole. Here Mr. Bell offered the following amendment, introduced by direction of the committee on Indian affairs:

Add to the end of the bill as follows:

"Sec.—And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal west: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the president shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the government.

"Sec.—And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supply themselves, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the president shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. Garland withdrew his appeal upon the point of order. Mr. Anderson withdrew his motion to reconsider.

Mr. Wise said that it was his intention, before the bill passed through the committee of the whole, to reply to the gentleman who had preceded him on the Cherokee part of the bill. But, at the desire of several friends, who were desirous that the question should be taken in committee, he had foregone his intention. He had had something to offer, moreover, in relation to the Seminole part of the bill, by way of bearing himself out in the assertion with which he had commenced this discussion—that the war in Florida was wicked in its inception, more wicked in the manner of conducting it, and, most of all, disastrous in its results; that it was disgraceful to the country,—a brutal and inhuman war, costing the government millions of its treasure, and the country some of its best blood. Such had been his intention: but, after the cries he had heard of question! from all parts of the hall, he would not then detain the committee.

Cries of question! were here renewed, more loudly than before. Mr. Cushing took the floor. "Question! question!" from all parts of the house. Mr. Cushing proceeded to point out a clerical error in the second section of the bill. The Chair gave notice that it should be corrected.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by the direction of the committee on Indian affairs, which was adopted without a division. Mr. Cambreleng then moved that the committee rise, and report the bill with the amendments; which motion prevailed, and the speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cambreleng hoped that the amendment offered by Mr. Bell, as for himself, and adopted in committee, would not be accepted. He moved that it be considered by itself. The others, he hoped, would be adopted. The object of the amendment to which he took exception was to reduce the appropriations for that part of the army stationed in the Cherokee country, to keep the peace there, $2,000,000, upon the assumed ground that the Florida war was now over. It was now the first of June, and he would ask gentlemen what portion of what is now asked for the appropriations for the army in Florida, for the first half of this year, could be cut off? Nor could he conceive that there was any safety or propriety in cutting off any portion of the Cherokee branch of the appropriation. There was, as he learned by letters received by gentlemen upon that floor, already great danger of collisions between the Indians of the Cherokee country and the whites, and he could not believe that the proposition of Mr. Bell had been voted upon understandingly in committee of the whole. He hoped, therefore, that that amendment would be rejected by the house. Mr. Pope said he had intended to give his views at length upon this question while it was up in committee of the whole. He was not in the habit of troubling the house when it was impatient, and he would not say any thing now, unless the house were quite willing to permit him. He denied the power of the president of the United States to order a military force into the Cherokee country, to make war—the war-making power being vested in the house, and not in the president. He thought the amendment of Mr. Bell to be, therefore, perfectly correct. He considered a great principle to be involved in this bill, but expressed his determination to do or say nothing to embarrass its passage. Such an intention, he did not believe, actuated a single member upon that floor. He could not forbear expressing it as his opinion, however, that the treaty in question was no treaty at all. Ever since the year 1830, he thought it the settled policy of the administration that all the Indians of the country should remove west of the Mississippi—a policy to which he had given, what it seemed to be impossible to withhold, his assent. He wished to give his views upon all these points, and he had risen to move an adjournment of the house, to enable him to do so hereafter.

Mr. Pope here gave way to Mr. Bronson, who moved for leave to make a motion to refer certain bills from the senate upon Wisconsin affairs, which it was expedient to put in a train for immediate action thereon. The motion for leave was objected to. Mr. Pope then asked leave to move that the bill under consideration, as amended, be printed. This proposition was also objected to. Mr. Thompson then moved an adjournment. Mr. Yell asked for the yeas and nays. Not ordered.

Tellers were then called for, and ordered; and the house refused to adjourn by the following vote: Ayes 74, noes 81.

Mr. Thompson did not desire to say many words on this question. He had recently seen a letter from a United States officer in the Cherokee country, in which it was stated that, while the Cherokees did not mean to resist force, they did mean to remain upon their lands, passive and without willingly moving a muscle towards going. Unless propitiated, the officer believed their removal would cost millions of dollars to the country. Thus, said Mr. T. if not propitiated, millions must be expended for their removal; if conciliated, then the sum, comparatively small, now proposed by this amendment, will be expended humanely and nobly. He would leave the choice between these courses to all who had the hearts of men, and he could not believe they could hesitate which to choose.

From the first, all his sympathies had been with the Cherokees. He had never viewed this New Echota transaction as a treaty. Had he been in the senate of the United States when it came before them for ratification, he would not have voted for it as a treaty; although as a law upon the ground that congress has a right to extinguish the Indian title to lands within those states, he might have gone for it. And he would moreover say that, never from the day that Columbus discovered America till this time, had there ever been so advantageous a treaty made with any of the aborigines as this very treaty. Put up at auction, the fee-simple of all the Cherokee lands could not yield so much, by a great deal, as this arrangement contemplates, over and above the consideration that a fine territory also awaits them west of the Mississippi. But all these considerations did not make this arrangement a good treaty.

Mr. T. passed a high eulogy on the character of John Ross, the Cherokee chief, and upon the people of that tribe generally, to whose rapid advance in learning and civilization he paid a handsome tribute. Differing as he did, and as he ever should, in most points, so long as that officer kept his present political associates, he still honored the secretary of war for having written his recent communication to the Cherokee delegation.

Honoring, as he did, the feelings which had influenced the secretary of war, he believed that he was greatly in error in asking one hour's delay in the removal of the Indians. It was a great, a fatal mistake, with reference to the interests of the Indians themselves. Mr. T. looked at it as a practical question, as all questions of humanity were practical questions. Mr. T. knew the state of things there; he knew that the Indians would not be allowed to remain; and they ought not. You have pronounced the transaction at New Echota a treaty by all the forms known to the constitution, and the moment you did so, the land became as absolutely vested in the state of Georgia as any other foot of her soil—as that on which Millidgeville stands. You have no right to look behind it, and to disturb the rights of a third party which become vested by it, no more than you have to reconsider the treaty of 1817, by which a small tract of country was added to his own (Mr. T.'s) district. He repeated, that Georgia's right was complete; that the moment this government hesitated to give her possession, she would take it, as it was her right and duty to do.

Mr. T. concluded by avowing his readiness to vote the additional sum proposed in the amendment under consideration, not only to quiet the Cherokees, but his own conscience; and by declaring that he looked with no little apprehension upon the effects of the policy which was going on, of concentrating, on the northwestern frontier of the country, every element of fury and revenge. He would rather that these people should go there with kindness in their hearts towards the whites, as friends, not as deadly foes.

Messrs. Underwood, Howard, Reed, Cambreleng, Pope, McKay, and Peanybacker followed in a desultory debate upon the effect of adopting the amendment of Mr. Bell, and that of the committee on Indian affairs together. Their remarks were mostly inaudible to the reporter, such had become the confusion and disorder in the hall.

Mr. Wise said that he had forbore to say what he had desired in committee of the whole, with the understanding that there was to be no more debate upon the bill in the house. Every body had seemed to know all about it, and to be perfectly prepared to vote. During the debate in committee, gentlemen had gone whithersoever they saw fit, and had left their seats vacant day after day. Just at nightfall they had now assembled to vote on the bill and the amendments proposed, and no two of them could now agree, it would seem, as to the effect of the amendments, or to the character of the bill. And so, said Mr. Wise, we must begin this whole debate over again. For himself, he had matter enough upon his hands, in relation to the two chapters of the bill, the Seminole and Cherokee chapters, to occupy him in a speech of several hours, yet—[Here ensued cries of "Go on! Go on!" "Question! Question!" "Adjourn! Adjourn!" &c.] Mr. Williams, of N. C., (Mr. Wise yielding the floor for the purpose,) moved an adjournment. Mr. Shepler demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered. Mr. Petrick asked for tellers, which was ordered. And the house, (at a quarter before eight o'clock,) by a vote of ayes 89, noes 81, adjourned.

Saturday, June 2. On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the Indian hostility bill, with all the amendments proposed thereto, was ordered to be printed.

The Speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting the following report from the secretary of state:

Department of State,
Washington, May 31, 1838.

To the President of the United States:

The secretary of state, to whom was referred the resolution of the house of representatives of the 28th instant, requesting the president to communicate to that house, if not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence not heretofore communicated, between this government and that of the republic of Texas, and also with the government of any other country, relating to the annexation of the said republic of Texas to the United States; and to inform the house whether the application for the said government of Texas to the United States, for admission into this union, has been withdrawn, has the honor to report to the president, that all the correspondence between this government and that of Texas, respecting the annexation of that republic to the United States, has been already communicated to the house of representatives, and that the proposition of annexation, made by the Texian government, having been disposed of in that correspondence, has not been since deemed within the control of the United States.

No correspondence upon the subject of such annexation has taken place between this government and that of any other country.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN FORSYTH.

On motion of Mr. Dromgoole, referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Mr. Lincoln again made an appeal to the humanity of the house in favor of the workmen who had been employed on the new treasury building, and moved a resolution setting apart a portion of Monday next for the consideration of the bill for removing the wall of that building and the erection of a new post office.

Much opposition was made to the resolution, but Mr. Lincoln having modified it so as to set apart Friday next, from 10 o'clock till 1, for the consideration of that bill, the previous question was called by Mr. Craig, seconded and carried, and the resolution, as modified was then agreed to by a very large majority. So Friday next at 10 o'clock is assigned for the consideration of the bill.

A number of gentlemen obtained leave to report bills from their respective committees, which will be noticed in their progress.

A communication was received from the secretary of war, transmitting a report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, furnishing as correctly as possible the information called for by a resolution of the house of the 23th ult., in relation to the valuation of improvements, and the amounts paid thereon under the Cherokee treaty of 1835.

Mr. Grennell submitted the following resolution, and the rules being suspended, the same was agreed to by the house:

Resolved, That all private bills providing for pensions or payments to the widows of officers and soldiers be added to the special order of assignment for this day.

The house, in pursuance of the special order of the 29th ult., resolved itself into a committee of the whole house, (Mr. Elnore in the chair,) on the bills reported from the committee on revolutionary claims, and on the other bills included in said order; and having considered them severally, reported them to the house, when they were ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

[At three o'clock, a division of the committee disclosed the fact that no quorum was present.

A motion was made by Mr. Duncan to adjourn, but negatived; and a call of the house was ordered.

The list of members was called, through Mr. Mercer moved to suspend further proceedings under the call; but the house refused. Mr. Petrick moved that the house adjourn, and the names of the members present to be entered on the journal; but this motion was pronounced out of order. Mr. Adams suggested it would be better to place upon the record a list of members absent. The absentees were then called, and excuses received. A quorum appearing, the house went again into committee, and having gone through with the residue of the bills committed to them, rose, and reported a part of the bills, and asked and obtained leave to sit again on the remainder.] All other bills of the character of the above were either not reported from the committee, or being partly considered, were postponed. The bill for the relief of Josephine Nourse having been reported, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading,

Mr. Underwood opposed it, and called for explanation from Mr. Mason, of Ohio, who had reported the bill. Mr. Mason and Mr. Grennell replied, when, on motion of Mr. Turney, the house adjourned.

Monday, June 4. Mr. Phillips, of Massachusetts, after some weeks' absence, upon unavoidable business at home, took his seat this morning.

Several bills from the senate were read twice, and appropriately referred.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of war, in compliance with the resolution of the house of the 2d March, 1837, in reference to the contemplated bridge across the Ohio at Wheeling.

Mr. Cambreleng gave notice that, as soon as the call of the states for petitions should be finished, he should move to take up the Indian hostility appropriation bill.

Petitions were now called for, when a large number were presented.

Mr. Cushing asked leave to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of state of the United States be authorized and directed to deliver to the secretary of the senate 40 copies, and to the clerk of the house of representatives 300, (in addition to the number which he is now authorized to deliver to those officers,) of the 1st volume of the 4th series now published of the "Documentary History of the American Revolution," published by Messrs. Clarke and Force; and that he deliver a like number of copies to each of those officers of every succeeding volume of that work, as soon as may be after the same shall have been delivered to him by the publishers.

And be it further resolved, That the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives be, and they are hereby, directed, of the copies so furnished, to distribute one to each member of the senate and house of representatives, and to each territorial delegate of the 23d, 24th, and 25th congresses, who are not entitled to receive the same under some former act or resolution of congress.

Objection being made, Mr. C. asked the suspension of the rules, for the purpose of considering this resolution; which motion prevailing, the resolution was taken up and considered.

The yeas and nays were demanded on the engrossment of this resolution, but were not ordered, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading this day.

Mr. Adams (when the state of Massachusetts was called for petitions) rose, and said that he held in his hand certain joint resolutions of the legislature of the commonwealth of Massachusetts, in relation to the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; that, upon a former day, other similar resolutions of that state had been laid upon the table; whereupon, his colleague had moved to withdraw them from the table, which motion was still pending. Mr. A. said he should not offer the resolutions until this motion of his colleague should have been acted on, and it should be ascertained whether the house would or would not deliberately decide to lay on the table, without reading, without printing, without consideration, the joint resolutions of the legislature of a sovereign state of the union.

Mr. Ingham (the state of Connecticut being called for petitions) presented joint resolutions of the legislature of that state, expressive of the opinion that the resolution of the 21st December last, whereby all memorials upon the subject of slavery were ordered to lie on the table, should be rescinded. He moved that they be printed.

Mr. Cushman moved that these joint resolutions be laid on the table. Mr. Ingham said he had no objection to their being ordered to lie on the table, but he did hope the house would order them to be printed. The printing was ordered, and they were laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. Grantland,

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to lay before this house any communication which may have been received by him, or by the secretary of war, from the governors of the states of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, or Alabama, on the proposition of John Ross and his associates for extending the time of removing the Cherokee Indians from those states.

On motion of Mr. Owens,

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a general law exempting from duty iron imported into the United States for the construction of iron steamboats; as also into the expediency of allowing Cassaway B. Lamar, of Savannah, Georgia, to import, free of duty, iron materials for the construction of two iron steamboats; also, into the expediency of remitting the duty stipulated to be paid by the Iron Steamboat Company of Georgia on iron imported by said company for the construction of an iron steamboat.

On motion of Mr. Chambers,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary claims take into consideration the propriety of providing by law for the issue of land scrip for the satisfaction of such warrants for bounty land as have issued, or may hereafter issue, for revolutionary services.

Mr. Kilgore wished to offer the following, but, its reception being objected to, he waived his purpose for the present:

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the operation of so much of the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie-paying banks which have issued since the 4th of March, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

And be it further resolved, That the operation of the 2d section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriation for the payment of the revolutionary and other pensions of the United States for the year 1836," be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the period of two years.

The resolution presented by Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, on the 19th March last, relative to modifying the judiciary system of the United States so as to abolish the chancery practice in the courts of the United States for the state of Louisiana, was considered and agreed to, with the following modification: "And that the said committee inquire also into the expediency of repealing so much of the 30th section of an act of congress entitled 'An act to establish the judicial courts of the United States,' approved September 24th, 1789, as dispenses with notice to parties, according to the provisions of said act, where they reside at a distance of more than one hundred miles from the place of trial."

On motion of Mr. Lyon,

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions inquire into the expediency of repealing the law requiring pensioners who fail to claim payment of their pensions for the space of two months, to apply at the treasury department, and of making provision by law for the payment at the most convenient pension agency, upon satisfactory proof of identity, and explanation of the cause of any delay in claiming payment, or of making such provision by law as will authorize the pension agents to give to pensioners orders or drafts on the treasury department for the amount due them.

Mr. Sergeant rose, and asked the chairman of the committee of ways and means at what time it was his intention to bring forward the bill to establish an independent treasury?

Mr. Cambreleng replied, in the course of next week.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the Indian hostility appropriation bill was again taken up, with the amendments reported by the committee of the whole.

Mr. Wise took the floor, and went at length into the subject, sustaining the amendments, opposing the bill as reported, and reviewing all the arguments on the other side, with much earnestness and minuteness.

Mr. Wise was followed by Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, who expressed the opinion that there was now but one alternative; the Cherokees must leave the country; and that extermination would be the necessary consequence of the non-removal, forthwith, of those people. He was opposed to the amendment of Mr. Bell, and in favor of that presented by direction of the committee on Indian affairs.

Mr. Biddle went at length into an examination of the manner in which the late campaigns against the Indians have been conducted, and into a general opposition to the bill. Mr. B. was followed by Mr. Downing, of Florida. When Mr. D. had concluded his remarks in defence of the bill, and in response to those gentlemen who had reviewed his former speech upon this question, many cries of question were raised from all parts of the house; in the midst of which, Mr. Cushman, of New Hampshire, rose and said that he should like very well to be permitted to vote for the amendment offered by direction of the committee on Indian affairs; but really he could see no prospect of any immediate termination of this wide and protracted debate, save by the action of that very useful rule of the house, the previous question; which he moved accordingly.

Mr. Wise here asked the Chair what that question would be?

The Chair replied, on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, without the amendments reported to the house by the committee of the whole.

Mr. Hamer then demanded whether or not either of the amendments reported by the committee of the whole had been adopted?

The Chair responded in the negative: and the house then refused to second the previous question, 62 only voting (by tellers) in the affirmative, the 202 not counted.

Then ensued most deafening and vociferous cries for the question! from the house, and order! from the Chair.

Mr. Biddle then got the floor, and responded to some passages in the remarks of Mr. Downing.

Mr. Campbell, of Tennessee, vindicated the Tennessee volunteers in the Seminole campaigns against the imputation of having refused to do their duty, and to labor, which had been thrown out by general Jesup, in some of his official communications, and which had been drawn into this argument.

After he finished, a few more words of explanation ensued between Messrs. Biddle and Downing, when the question was taken on the amendments proposed by the committee of the whole. Seven amendments, going materially to reduce the appropriations as originally demanded, were adopted, as reported by the committee of the whole, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng. And then the question recurred upon the following amendment, as offered by Mr. Bell:

Add to the end of the bill the following:

"Provided, That, if the president shall ascertain that all discontent and further opposition on the part of any portion of the Cherokee Indians to the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five can be allayed or avoided, by allowing an additional compensation for the lands ceded to the United States by the said treaty, and that the government may thereby be saved the expense of keeping on foot the large military force in the Cherokee country now contemplated, he is hereby authorized to apply a sum not exceeding two millions of the sum appropriated by this act to that object."

Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, asked if an amendment proposed by a standing committee did not take precedence of one offered by an individual member?

The Chair said, in reply, that the question should be taken, as a matter of course, upon the amendments in the order in which they were reported to the house by the committee of the whole.

Mr. Cambreleng here took leave to say to the house that the amendment under consideration was not the amendment adopted on the motion of the committee on Indian affairs.

The yeas and nays were ordered on this amendment, and it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bonl, Borden, Briggs, William B. Calhoun, William B. Carter, Chambers, Cheatham, Childs, Corwin, Crockett, Cushing, Darlington, Davies, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, R. Garland, Goode, W. Graham, Graves, Grennell, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, H. Johnson, Kennedy, Kilgore, Lincoln, Marvin, S. T. Whittlesey, Sherod Williams, Jared W. Williams, Yell—112.

The question then recurred on the following amendment proposed by the committee on Indian affairs:

"Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the further sum of one million forty-seven thousand and sixty-seven dollars be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full, for all the objects specified in the third article of the supplementary articles of the treaty of eighteen hundred and thirty-five, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, and for the further object of aiding in the subsistence of said Indians for one year after their removal west: Provided, That no part of the said sum of money shall be deducted from the five millions stipulated to be paid to said tribe of Indians by said treaty: And provided further, That the said Indians shall receive no benefit from the said appropriation unless they shall complete their emigration within such time as the president shall deem reasonable, and without coercion on the part of the government.

"Sec. — And be it further enacted, That, for satisfying all claims for arrearages of annuities, for supplying blankets and other articles of clothing for the Cherokees who are not able to supply themselves, and which may be necessary for their comfortable removal, and for medicines and medical assistance, and for such other purposes as the president shall deem proper to facilitate the removal of the Cherokees, one hundred thousand dollars be appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. McKay asked for a division of the question, and that the first section of the amendment be acted on first.

Mr. Cushman demanded the yeas and nays on this amendment. Ordered.

The first division of the amendment was adopted by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, W. B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, W. B. Campbell, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, York—189.

NAYS—Messrs. Bouldin, Bynum, Casey, Coles, Connor, Griffin, Harrison, Haynes, A. McClellan, Sawyer, Snyder, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Yell—15.

The question recurring on the second division,

Mr. McKay said he would explain the grounds upon which he asked that the question should be decided. He objected to making another appropriation for the supply of medicines, &c., as they had been provided for in the other sections of the bill. Besides, this section placed at the disposal of the president of the United States a fund of $100,000, to be used as secret service money, to buy up the Cherokee delegation, and for such other purposes as, in his discretion, the president should see fit to apply it to. These were his objections.

Mr. Thompson suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. McKay,) so to modify his objection to this section as to prescribe the administering of lobelia instead of calomel, as a cheaper drug, and so to carry out this small business of objecting to petty expenses. As to the gentleman's dread of placing secret service money in the hands of the executive, where, he would ask, were those apprehensions of the gentleman slumbering, when the motion to place a certain $3,000,000 of dollars in the hands of the president of the United States, to be used at his discretion, was pending in that house?

Mr. Everett explained, and defended this section.

The house then adopted the second branch of this amendment by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Briggs, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, W. B. Campbell, J. Campbell, Carter, Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Childs, Cleveland, Clowney, Corwin, Cray, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davies, DeGraff, Dennis, Dunn, Edwards, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Farrington, Fairfield, Richard Fletcher, I. Fletcher, Fillmore, Gallup, R. Garland, Goode, J. Graham, Wm. Graham, Grantland, Grant, Graves, Grennell, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Hammond, Hamer, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Henry, Herod, Hoffman, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, R. M. T. Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Slade, Southgate, Stanly, Stuart, Stone, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Titus, Toland, Toucey, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Wise, Word, York—174.

NAYS—Messrs. Bouldin, Casey, Coles, Connor, Dromgoole, Griffin, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Holt, McKay, A. McClellan, Morgan, Noble, Sawyer, Snyder, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Yell—20.

Mr. Everett then offered the following amendment, to come in after the 18th line of the bill: "for making treaties with hostile Indian tribes, ten thousand dollars."

Mr. Hopkins moved the previous question, which was seconded, 84 to 61.

Mr. Everett demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question. Lost.

The main question being ordered (without a division,) Mr. Graham, of N. C., asked the yeas and nays on the engrossment. Lost.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time this day.

Being read a third time, and the question recurring on its passage, Mr. J. L. Williams asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered, and the bill was passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Heman Allen, John W. Allen, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Ayer, Banks, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Birdsall, Bond, Boon, Borden, Brodhead, Bronson, Buchanan, Bynum, Cambreleng, W. B. Prentiss, Randolph, Reilly, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Rives, Robinson, Russell, Sawyer, Sheffer, A. H. Shepperd, Charles Shepard, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stuart, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thomas, Toucey, Towns, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, J. L. Williams, Word—143.

NAYS—Messrs. Alexander, Biddle, Bouldin, W. B. Calhoun, Dennis, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Goode, Wm. Graham, Grennell, Halsted, Hawes, Henry, Hoffman, Lincoln, Milligan, C. Morris, Naylor, Ogle, Patterson, Phillips, Potts, Rariden, Reed, Ridgway, Rumsey, Sergeant, Slade, Stanly, Stratton, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, Wise, Yell, York—37.

On motion, the house (at 4 o'clock) adjourned.

Tuesday, June 5. On motion of Mr. Bouldin, it was Resolved, That Monday, the 11th of June inst., after the hour of 12 o'clock M., be assigned for the consideration of all such matters of business as relate to the District of Columbia, which may be then pending before the house.

The whole of this day having, by resolution, been set apart for the consideration of business relating to the territories, the house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Sergeant in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the territorial bills, upon which the whole day was spent. [The most important of these bills was that from the senate to divide the territory of Wisconsin into two territories, and establish the territorial government of Iowa. A motion to strike out the first section of this bill was negatived.]

Several of the bills were ordered to a third reading, and then finally passed. But the Iowa bill was laid over for further consideration.

The house adjourned at five o'clock.

Wednesday, June 6. After the transaction of some business of minor importance, the senate bill, as amended by the committee of the whole, and reported to the house, providing for the appointment of a surveyor of public lands for Wisconsin territory, was read a third time and passed.

The senate bill, as reported by the committee of the whole to the house, providing for running and marking the southern boundary line of the territory of Wisconsin, was next read a third time and passed.

The senate bill, as amended and reported by the committee of the whole, dividing the territory of Wisconsin, and establishing that of Iowa, was next taken up.

This bill was debated by Messrs. Shields, Adams, Bond, Mercer, Harlan, Thompson, Bynum, and Pope. During the debate, the previous question was demanded by Mr. Downing, but was not seconded by a majority.

Mr. Bond having moved (in the course of the debate) to reduce the salary of the governor from $2,000 to $1,500, and as Indian agent from $1,500 to $1,000, Mr. Bronson accepted the proposition as a modification to his motion. Mr. Thompson moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the house by a vote of 42 yeas to 134 nays, negatived the motion.

The following was then the state of the question:

The bill, as reported by the committee on Indian affairs, reads: "The governor shall receive an annual salary of $2,000 as governor, and $1,500 as superintendent of Indian affairs."

Mr. Bond had moved an amendment in committee of the whole, to amend by giving $1,500 as governor, and $1,000 as superintendent of Indian affairs.

The amendment was adopted in the committee of the whole; and the question now pending is, will the house agree to the amendment adopted by the committee of the whole? The amendment was then adopted. Mr. Mercer proposed to amend the bill by striking from the first section of the bill "from and after the 8d July next," and to insert "when Wisconsin shall become a state." Lost. Mr. Bell moved that the salary of the judges for the new territory be reduced from $1,800 to $1,500. Adopted.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and being read, and the question being upon its passage, after a few remarks from Mr. Ewing, in opposition to the bill, Mr. Cushman moved the previous question, which was seconded and ordered; and the house then proceeded to vote upon the bill, as amended, and it was passed by the following vote: Yeas 118, nays 51.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Bronson, went again into committee of the whole, and took up the bill "to grant a quantity of land to the territory of Wisconsin, for the purpose of aiding in opening a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with those of Rock river."

Several amendments (of which a more accurate description than can now be given will be furnished) were offered and acted on.

The committee then, on motion of Mr. Bronson, took up the bill to reorganize the legislative council of the territory of Florida; to which certain amendments were offered and acted on; and next in order was the bill for the completion of the public buildings in Wisconsin; to which no amendment was offered. The committee then took up the bill authorizing certain roads in Florida, which was also passed without amendment. The senate bill to make certain roads in Wisconsin was next considered. Amendments to this bill were offered and acted on. The bills making provision for a university in Wisconsin, and for a railroad in Florida, were then considered, amended, and ordered to be reported. At this point, Mr. Potts moved that the committee rise, and report the bills acted on. The motion prevailed.

The house then took up and passed the senate bill for establishing a university in Wisconsin; the bill of this house making certain roads in Florida; the bill for completing the public buildings of Wisconsin; the Florida railroad bill, (with the amendment reported by the committee of the whole;) the bill for the making of certain roads in Wisconsin, (as amended;) and the bill to reorganize the territorial government of Florida.

The bill granting land for the Milwaukee canal, to which amendments had been offered in committee, came next in order.

Mr. Petrikin moved its postponement till to-morrow, and that the bill, with amendments, be printed; which motion prevailed.

Mr. Bronson moved to go again into committee of the whole, in further pursuance of the special order.

A motion was here made to adjourn, but was withdrawn, for the purpose of allowing the Speaker to present an executive communication, in reply to a resolution of Mr. Grantland, with regard to the correspondence upon the removal of the Cherokees. Mr. Bronson renewed his proposition to go into committee of the whole.

Pending this motion,

Mr. McKennan moved to extend the special order so as to devote to-morrow to the transaction of territorial business. The motion to adjourn was then renewed, and carried: Ayes 64, nays 49.

And then the house adjourned.

Thursday, June 7. But little business of importance was transacted this day, the greater portion of the sitting having been spent in committee of the whole on the bill from the senate to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands; several amendments were offered, and others designated and read for information. But, without coming to a decision upon the bill, the committee rose, and ordered the bill and amendments to be printed.

The joint resolution for surveys on the lakes and in the waters of North Carolina, was read a third time, and, after a renewed debate of some warmth, was passed, and sent to the senate.

After the committee had risen, Mr. Thompson rose, and asked permission to say, in reference to words of an exciting character which had recently passed, in the order of debate, between a gentleman from Pennsylvania and a gentleman from Florida, that the interposition of friends, in advance of any communication between the parties, had left to a mutual disclaimer of offence and withdrawal of all exceptionable language; and that, in the opinion of the honorable Mr. Hoffman and himself, by whom the adjustment has been made, both gentlemen have done all that was demanded by their established character as gentlemen.

FRIDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In senate, after the presentation and reference of a number of petitions,

Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the senate bill to ascertain and mark the southern boundary of Wisconsin, with the amendments of the other house referred to them, with other amendments from the senate committee, merely changing "Wisconsin" into Iowa, in accordance with the Iowa bill that recently passed the senate. These amendments of the other house, and of the committee, were concurred in by the senate, and the bill was sent back to the other house for their concurrence in the change to "Iowa."

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, in compliance with the senate resolution of Mr. Webster, of the 31st of May, instituting inquiries as to the competency of the secretary of the treasury to use as depositories, and to receive the notes of banks that, since the passage of the deposit act of July, 1836, had suspended specie payments, or had issued notes of a denomination less than five dollars; and, also, as to the expediency of so modifying that deposit act as to authorize the reception of the notes of banks that had issued such notes, made a report on the subject, and moved that it be laid on the table, and printed.

Subsequently, on the call of Mr. Norvell, the report was read; from which it appeared that the majority of the committee considered it competent in the secretary of the treasury both to use as depositories, and to receive the notes of banks that had merely suspended specie payments, but to do neither in regard to such banks as, at any time since July 4, 1836, had issued any notes of a denomination less than five dollars. In so much of the report the minority of the committee were understood to concur. The majority of the committee were further of the opinion, in which the minority did not concur, that any new legislation on the subject would be inexpedient, at least till the fate of the sub-treasury bill should be finally decided, as any such legislation as that proposed would interfere with the provisions of that measure; and would, also, be acting against the already expressed will of the senate, in passing the sub-treasury bill.

The motion to print was followed by a most animated and earnest debate, (to be given hereafter,) taking a general range among the various topics less or more remotely connected with this subject; in which debate Messrs. Webster, Norvell, Wright, Benton, and Niles, participated.

Mr. Webster in the course of the debate, gave notice that, in consequence of his differing from the majority of the committee, he would ask leave to introduce a bill to provide further for the collection of the revenue, embodying his views of what ought to be done on this subject.

The report was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the committee on military affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force the act of January, 1837, to make indemnity for the loss of horses and other property in the service of the United States.

The bill making appropriations for the suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrearages for 1837, having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage, Mr. Benton spoke at length on various topics connected with the bill, particularly eulogizing those who have been concerned in the management of the Florida war.

Mr. Preston spoke briefly in reply, and in regard to certain strictures on his remarks of yesterday, published in the Globe of last night, some of which, Mr. P. stated, were in the very words used in the senate by the senator from Georgia.

Mr. Lumpkin expressly denied all knowledge of that publication before it appeared.

The bill was then passed without dissent; and, after an executive session, the senate adjourned.

In the house, Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the last term of the circuit court of the United States for the state of Louisiana, and into the conduct of the United States district judge of the said state in attempting to remove the clerk of the said district and circuit courts without sufficient cause.

Mr. Chapman objected; and Mr. Lincoln claimed that the special order of the day (respecting the public buildings) be enforced. Mr. Chapman then withdrew his objection to Mr. Johnson's motion, and the resolution was offered and adopted.

The house next took up the special order, being the bill providing for the removal of the treasury building.

The house went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Pope in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of that bill.

The pending motion was to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, (to reject it.)

Mr. Naylor was entitled to the floor, and went at some length into a defence of the bill.

Mr. Keim opposed the bill, replying to the remarks of Mr. Lincoln made on a former day.

Mr. Pratt, of the committee, sustained the bill, in reply to Mr. Keim, making statements with a view to show that economy, and the necessity of the case, required the taking down of the buildings.

Mr. Lincoln defended the bill, in reply to all the objections against it, until the hour of one o'clock arrived, at which time the committee, as a matter of course, rose, and the Speaker took the chair.

The chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

A motion was made by Mr. Lincoln, to suspend the rules for the residue of this day, in order to go again into committee on this bill.

[A good deal of confusion took place. Some members wished the committee to take the question depending before the committee rose; but this was declared to be out of order, the hour having expired. Others wished the motion so modified that only one hour should be allowed for the further consideration of the bill. This was especially urged by Mr. Sherrod Williams, of Kentucky.—Mr. Yell wished to lay the whole subject on the table.]

The question being taken on Mr. Lincoln's motion, it was decided in the affirmative, the rules suspended, and the house immediately went again into committee of the whole, (Mr. Pope again taking the chair,) and the debate proceeded.

After Mr. Lincoln had concluded his remarks, (which, with the rest of the debate, we will hereafter lay before our readers,) the question was taken upon the motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

After three attempts, a quorum having been found present, this was decided in the negative: Ayes 59, noes 66.

The amendment of Mr. Lincoln, being as follows, was then adopted:

"Strike out in the 2d section all after the word 'appropriated,' where it first occurs, and insert: 'Any unexpended balances remaining in the treasury from former appropriations to the construction of a treasury building, not exceeding $150,000, in addition to the materials to be taken from the treasury buildings.'"

The following amendment was then offered by Mr. Rencher:

"And be it further enacted, That there shall be erected, on or near the former site, a plain substantial fire-proof building for the treasury department, constructed of brick, and corresponding in style and architecture with the three other executive buildings; and that for this purpose there be appropriated, out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000."

This was debated by Messrs. Rencher, Mercer, Williams, of N. C., Lincoln, Everett, and Duncan. Mr. Rencher's amendment was then adopted.

The committee then rose, (on motion,) and reported the bill as amended. Mr. S. Williams moved to lay it on the table. Pending which, Mr. S. Williams moved a call of the house. Ordered.

One hundred and forty members answering to their names,

Mr. Marvin moved to suspend the call. Mr. Duncan demanded the yeas and nays. Mr. Marvin withdrew the motion to suspend, and the list of absentees was called for excuses.

Excuses were made for the following members. Those italicized were not excused. The remainder were.

Messrs. Ayer, (absent from town,) Birdsall, Bruyn, Buchanan, Calhoun, of Ky., Coffin, Cranston, Curtis, Ewing, (all illness,) Glascock, (absence at home on private business,) Gray, (gone home on business.)

[At this point, Mr. Robertson moved that the call be suspended. Mr. Duncan demanded the yeas and nays. Not ordered. Mr. Robertson's motion to suspend the call was rejected; and it proceeded.] Messrs. Rhett, McClure (left for home with his wife who is indisposed,) and Miller, (illness.) The list being finished. Mr. Sibley moved for a suspension of the call, (many members being absent,) but the motion did not prevail. Mr. Polts renewed the motion (the rule of the house, prescribing the action of the house in such cases, having intervened) to suspend the proceedings under the call, and it prevailed. Mr. Sherrod Williams' motion to lay the bill on the table was then in order. Mr. Lincoln demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the motion prevailed by the following vote: Yeas 89, nays 82.

So the bill lies upon the table. The remainder of the sitting was occupied in the consideration of private bills, a large number of which were passed. After which the house, on motion, adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

Fire at Nantucket. The Boston Mercantile Journal gives the following particulars of a destructive fire at Nantucket:

"Nantucket, June 2, 1838.

"A fire broke out in J. James' steam ropewalk, on South Beach, so called, about three o'clock this morning. It spread very rapidly, and in about three hours and a half it entirely demolished about twenty-five buildings, among which were the ropewalk, three large oil and candle manufactories, besides some smaller ones—a boat builder's shop, and ten dwelling houses, besides a number of other buildings. The quantity of oil connected with the sheds in this section of the town was very large. The loss cannot yet be ascertained, but it is generally thought that it cannot fall short of from three to four hundred thousand dollars!"

A correspondent of the Morning Post says that from 150,000 to 200,000 gallons of oil were consumed, together with all the contents of the various houses and shops—loss variously estimated, probably not exceeding one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. "The greatest losers are said to be James Athearn, D. Jones, P. H. Folger, Nathaniel Hussey & Brother, Joseph James, Matthew Crosby, and French & Coffin. The wind being at the south, and very fresh, strong fears were entertained that all the property from Commercial wharf to the new north would fall a sacrifice, but the flames were at last arrested by blowing up five wooden buildings, which left so large a space that the fire was soon under control."

A letter from the editor of the Nantucket Inquirer estimates the loss at about $300,000.

The New Bedford Mercury states that it is feared that the whole amount of insurance on the property destroyed does not exceed $10,000.

Late from Vera Cruz. By the barque Ann Eliza, capt. Biscoe, 17 days from the above port, we learn that the French squadron, consisting of the frigate L'Hermine, com. Baroche, and brig Alcibiade, was still blockading that place, and had made prizes of two Mexican vessels; one the brig Unico Hijo, from Cadiz, and a schooner. The ports of Metamoros, Tampico, and Campeachy, were also blockaded by the four other brigs of war, viz: L'Eclipse, Dunois, L'Perouse, and Saurier. The French frigate L'Ephigénie was expected from Havana to join the blockade. The United States ship Ontario, capt. Breese, was at Sacrificios, to sail the 19th of May for Tampico and the coast of Texas; also the United States ship Vandalia, capt. Gwinn.

Commodore David Porter, our charge at Constantinople, is daily expected in this country on a visit.

Later from Barbadoes. The decision of the legislature to allow the slave population (80,000) to pass to a state of absolute and entire freedom on the first of August, is confirmed.

Lieut. col. Twiggs, of the 1st dragoons has been assigned the command of the country from Micanoopy to the Atlantic. His head quarters are at Garey's Ferry.

We understand that twenty-four Indians have delivered themselves up at Fort King, to captain Tompkins, and that an expedition is in preparation at that post to scour the country up to the Oklawaha and Orange Lake, where the Tallahassee are reported to have planted largely, undisturbed, since the beginning of the war.

Rise of water at Lake Erie. The Cleveland Herald mentions the fact, that the waters of Lake Erie, at that point, are at least three and a half feet higher than they were three years ago, and eighteen inches above the level of last year. A similar rise has been observed in the Upper Lakes.

Connecticut copper mine. The copper mine at Bristol, Conn., to which the public attention was first called by prof. Shepard, is found to be exceedingly rich and productive, and a large number of men are now employed upon it, with every prospect of making it the source of great wealth to the state. About twenty tons of the ore have been shipped to England as a sample, and one hundred more are now on the ground ready for the stamp mill. The ore is represented as very rich.

Connecticut. The legislature of this state on the 26th May, passed the following resolutions unanimously:

"Resolved, That the members of the senate of the United States and the representatives in congress from this state be requested to use their endeavors to procure the passage of a law to indemnify the citizens of the United States for losses sustained by them from the French prior to Sept. 30, 1800.

"And be it further resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to our senators and representatives in congress a copy of these resolutions."

Mississippi elections. Official. Prentiss, 12,722; Word, 12,077; Claiborne, 11,776; Davis, 11,346. Prentiss' majority over Claiborne, 946. Word's majority over Claiborne, 295. The above result was handed to us by the secretary of state, and is, of course, correct. [Columbus Democrat.]

The authorities of Charleston state that the loss by the late fire in that city cannot be less than four millions of dollars, and taking into consideration the amount of population and extent of resources, it is believed that on this occasion Charleston has sustained a greater loss than was suffered either by London or New York on the occasion of what are emphatically called "the great fires in those cities."

The Milledgeville Journal of May 22d says:

"We are happy in being able to correct the rumor in circulation respecting the death of Dr. J. Brewster, late surveyor general. We have received a letter under his hand, dated on the 13th May, which, although it does not allude to the matter, furnishes conclusive evidence that the writer was 'in esse' at that time. The report, therefore, of his death by the hands of the (Cherokee) Indians, turns out to be only 'a lie with a circumstance.'"

The U. S. corvette St. Louis, capt. Paine, arrived at New York, on Wednesday evening, from the West India station. Officers and crew all well.

A curious case was, at our last dates, engaging the attention of the United States circuit court for the Louisiana district. Judge Lawrence, the newly appointed district judge, having the power of appointing the clerk of the court, also assumed that he had the right of removal without cause, and he therefore removed, as far as he had a right to do so, the clerk, Mr. Hennen, and appointed another, John Winthrop, in his stead. The old clerk refused to give up his papers.

On the opening of the circuit court, judge McKinley, of the supreme court, took his seat as the presiding judge. The question came up for adjudication, and, after an able argument, the court divided; judge McKinley deciding that the removal, without cause, was illegal; and judge Lawrence still maintaining his right, as resulting from his power to appoint. The case will, therefore, have to go to the supreme court for final decision.

French ships. The French line of battle ship L'Hercule, of 84 guns, admiral Casy, and corvette Favorite, captain Rosanel, arrived at Newport R. I. on Monday morning, 4th instant, from Norfolk.—The admiral fired a salute, which was returned from fort Wolcott by the Newport artillery—there being no United States troops at that post. The cutter also fired.

Ohio. At the Ohio state whig convention, held at Columbus on the 31st ultimo, the following, among other resolutions, were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That concert of action by the whigs throughout the United States can be best secured by means of a national convention; and this convention, therefore, concur in the recommendation of the state whig convention, held at Columbus in July last, to that effect; and also concur in the proposition lately made by the whig members of congress, as to the time and place of holding a national convention.

Resolved, That this convention have undiminished confidence in the patriotism and talents of our distinguished fellow-citizen, William Henry Harrison; and concur with the convention of July last, in presenting his name to the national convention as a candidate for the presidency; but, at the same time, pledge their cordial support to the nomination of that convention, should it fall on either of the other distinguished statesmen, Henry Clay, or Daniel Webster, whose names are prominent as whig candidates for that important office.

The New Orleans Bulletin says:

Three years since the exports to Texas were hardly worth reporting, while the trade to Mexico ranked the third in the exports from New Orleans. The reports of our custom-house for last quarter, show, in the trade of our city, Texas now ranks the third nation in the value of exports. No estimate can now be made of the immense value of the trade of the new republic to the United States.

New Orleans slips of the 26th ult. mention the arrival there of three companies of the 3d regiment artillery from Tampa Bay. They were on their way to the Cherokee country.

The following officers are with them: Surgeon general Lawson, surgeon Satterlee, lieutenant col. Gatos, 3d artillery, lieuts. Poole, A. P. Allen, do.; C. Tompkins, do.; Wm. Frazer, do.; E. G. Step-

Nelson and Cote acquitted. Drs. Nelson and Cote, who surrendered to general Wool, on the Vermont frontier, in March, and were placed under heavy bonds to appear at the United States circuit court on the 21st of May, were tried on that day before Judge Thompson and acquitted. Nineteen witnesses, including general Wool and his staff, were examined, but nothing was produced to prove any organization of the patriot forces within the Vermont lines.

A new coach. There is now in the course of building, at a coachmaker's in the metropolis, a coach of a description at once novel, elegant and safe. It is the invention of a scientific gentleman named Stafford, who has secured a patent for the same. Before we give a description of the vehicle, it may be proper to state that, on the suggestion of the superintendent of the royal mails, a similar coach, intended for the country, was built, in order that its mechanical construction might be fully and practically tried and tested. Accordingly a public trial of one built at Nottingham was made in the presence of several hundreds of the most respectable inhabitants of that town. Frisby an experienced and well known whip, took the reins; the coach was drawn by four spirited horses, and had, inside and out, the full complement of passengers. In descending the hill to New Radford it was several times intentionally, when running at the top of speed, suddenly swerved off the road, the near wheels working upon a bank three feet high and the off wheels in the drain. In each emergency the coach retained its vertical position like a mariner's compass, so much so that the gentlemen who composed the inside passengers were altogether insensible to their (to others) apparently perilous situation. The body of the new coach, instead of resting, as in the case, upon springs below, is poised upon two upright supporters rising from the beds and axles, and passing up between the body and the boots. The tops of these supporters are surmounted by elliptic springs, on which the body is so suspended that, on meeting inequalities on the road the centre of gravity of the vehicle is freely adjusted and the liability to overturn it completely conquered.

Rates of vessels. The following article shows the manner in which vessels are rated:

A 1. A vessel under 8 years old; coppered and copper fastened, and in complete order.

A 2. Similar to the above, as to age and condition, but not coppered and copper fastened; both are necessary to constitute her A 1.

Also a vessel formerly A 1, between 8 and 12 years old, rates A 2.

A 3. A vessel formerly A 1, when over 12 years old, if sound and in good order.

A vessel not coppered and copper fastened, over 8 years old.

It is understood that a vessel never rates lower than A 3, whatever her age may be, while in good order and fit for sea.

B. Denotes a vessel unsound, or defective in sails, rigging, or hull, and not to be trusted. A vessel may therefore be transferred to a higher rate by undergoing suitable repairs.

Vessels of this rate are considered non-insurable.

In Hingham during the present year, 57 vessels have been engaged in the mackerel fishery. The number of barrels taken during the present year, 17,134 1-2. In 1836, 49 vessels were engaged in the business. Number of barrels taken, 14,486. In 1835, 57 were engaged. Number of barrels taken, 15,399.

Close sharing. By the official return of votes for senators in all the districts in Maine, it appears that the aggregate whig vote, is 34,181 and the Van Buren vote 34,165. It is well known that the whig candidate for governor run considerably ahead of the whigsenator's ticket in nearly all the districts, and there can therefore be no doubt of this election by a considerable majority.

Tacks. There are three manufacturers of these little articles in Plymouth county, who manufacture an aggregate number of 45,000,000 per week. In the whole state it is estimated that at least 75,000,000 are made weekly, making 3,800,000,000 a year.

Union Bank. In a suit brought by this bank against one of its debtors, the exception was raised, that the bank had forfeited its charter by a suspension of specie payments, and was therefore incompetent to bring suit. The point has been argued, we understand, before Judge Buchanan, and a decision given in favor of the bank maintaining its charter and corporate rights. Some difference in the provisions of their respective charters led to a different opinion as to the effect of a suspension of specie payments upon the Atchafalaya and Union

Banks. It is no doubt fresh in the recollection of our readers, that the charter of the former institution was adjudged forfeited, in consequence of having refused to redeem her issues in gold and silver.

West Indies. Accounts from Jamaica to the 27th of April, say that there was a heavy gale at Anatto bay on the 20th and 21st of that month. The waves, it is said, rose to an extraordinary height, and the whole extent of the harbor was one continued sheet of foam and breakers. Two vessels, the Woolington, and Young Reynold, were overset and sunk. Several boats were manned to rescue the crews of the capsized vessels. They succeeded in saving five of the eight persons from a watery grave, but in returning to their vessels, two of the boats were upset. The steward and a seaman belonging to one of the vessels were drowned. Much damage was done to the shipping.

Latest from Cape Palmas. By an arrival at Boston, intelligence down to the 18th January last has been received from Cape Palmas, the settlement of the Maryland State Colonization Society on the coast of Africa. All the letters received concur in representing the affairs at the colony in a happy and flourishing condition. The Niobe, which sailed from Baltimore on the 17th November, arrived out after a pleasant passage of forty-three days. Two were born on the passage making eighty-seven emigrants in all landed. The health of the missionaries is represented as good, and their cause as prosperous.

Business at Pittsburg. The Pittsburg Advocate of Friday last says:

"The river is high. The arrivals and departures of steamboats have been quite numerous; and as freights have been reasonably abundant, and the travel extensive, a good business would have been done in this branch of our trade, but for formerly low prices. We believe we never knew downward freights so reduced as they are at this moment. Large quantities of produce continue to arrive destined for the eastward, via the Pennsylvania canal. Except in bacon and flour, the transactions in produce here have not been large.

Chronometers. In looking over the London Nautical Magazine, for September, we notice that the firm of Arnold & Dent, of London, have had awarded to them the premium, from the British government, of £3,000 sterling, for their improvements in chronometers. Of the many on trial, one of theirs performed with astonishing exactness of losing, in twelve months, but 54-100ths of a second! These valuable instruments have attained such a degree of correctness that the mariner is now able to ascertain his longitude at sea with the greatest degree of accuracy.

CONNECTICUT. The legislature of this state, at its recent session, adopted the following resolution in relation to the sub-treasury:

"Therefore resolved, That it is the will of this general assembly, that our senators and representatives in congress vote against said bill, or any other containing similar provisions, and use all legal and proper means to prevent the passage thereof, and that they be and hereby are so instructed."

ACQUITTAL OF RICHARD H. WHITE. On Thursday last the jury impaneled to try Richard H. White for burning the treasury building in 1833, rendered the following verdict, which, after some objections on the part of the prisoner's counsel, was ultimately recorded: "We the jury find the prisoner, R. H. White, under the plea of limitations, not guilty."

After the verdict was recorded, Mr. W. L. Brent moved the court that the prisoner be discharged; and, the district attorney making no objection, he was discharged accordingly.

Before the jurors left the court-house, nine of them tendered the following to White:

"We the jury, who tried Richard H. White, declare that nine of us were for acquitting him entirely of the charge of burning the treasury department, and believed he did not do it; but that three of the jurors not agreeing with us, we compromised by finding the verdict we did, but would not have consented to it had we thought it would have left any imputation upon him as to his innocence."

(Signed by Wm. Cleary, B. Cox, Wm. Young, W. G. Deal, Matthew Sexsmith, Daniel Hauptman, Remigius Burch, Franklin Little, Leroy Edward.)

The reporter of the "Intelligencer" states that the jury retired at about 3 o'clock on Wednesday, with the permission of the court to go home at 8 o'clock in the evening, provided they could not agree upon a verdict; but with directions to assemble on the next morning, at 8 o'clock, for the purpose of making a final disposition of the subject. At a quarter past one o'clock on Thursday, they returned the verdict stated above. This was the fourth trial of White, and was continued for nine days.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The New York Express, of Monday, states that it was currently reported that the Bank of America has either discounted a million of dollars of treasury notes, or has, by some arrangement, received treasury notes to that amount, and has placed a million of dollars in specie at the disposal of the government. It is also reported that a large house, in Wall-street, has also made a negotiation, by which they part with some two or three millions of their specie to the government for their treasury notes. We alluded to the fact, some days since, that government were selling large sums of treasury notes for specie.

In relation to the above, the Baltimore Patriot of Monday says: a gentleman in Baltimore conversant with the recent transactions of the treasury department in the exchange of treasury notes for specie, authorizes us to terminate all conjectures on the subject, by stating the fact, that the holders of specie in New York to the amount of one or two millions, have preferred to invest it in treasury notes bearing 6 per cent. interest, as exchange on England could not be sold at less than 84 per centum, which results in a loss of 84 per cent on the importation. If exchange should rise to 10, the precious metals will then flow back as the cheapest remittance. All demands on the treasury are now paid in specie drafts.

Kentucky money market. The Louisville Journal of the 9th instant has the following report on the money market:

Exchange.—Continues to grow better. The banks of this state are corresponding with those of the neighboring states with regard to the resumption to specie payments. There is no doubt that all the western banks will resume in a few weeks. This fact, together with the fact that the banks will shortly commence drawing on the proceeds of the late large sale of Kentucky bonds, makes exchange droop. Our bank rates are merely nominal. Out of doors good checks on New York can be bought at 8 per cent. premium, and on Philadelphia and Baltimore at 2.

EXCITEMENT IN PHILADELPHIA. On Friday morning the 8th instant, a miserable lunatic, a colored man, who escaped on Thursday afternoon from the lunatic department of the almshouse, assailed one of the Southwark watchmen, named John Batts, with a club, in so violent a manner as to cause instant death. The mayor and sheriff immediately instituted an inquiry into the circumstances, and the result is, that the murderer, as above stated, is proved to be in a state of frantic lunacy, that he escaped from his cell, his clothes bearing the usual almshouse label, showing his disease. This event was construed by some evil disposed persons into an evidence of an insurrectionary spirit among the colored population, and apprehensions of a riot were entertained. A proclamation from the mayor, however, explaining the condition of the murderer, and enjoining good order, had the effect of calming the public mind. But on Sunday last the city was again greatly agitated by another scene of violence and bloodshed, in which a negro was the principal actor. The circumstances, as stated in the Inquirer, were as follows:

On Saturday evening, between 8 and 9 o'clock, while Mr. Francis McKearney, a victualler, residing in Seventh street, near Shippen, was standing and talking with his sister in front of his own house and Rodgers' tavern, a negro man came up to him, and, without any known dispute between them, stabbed him with a knife in the abdomen, by which he was wounded so severely that he died a few hours afterwards at the Pennsylvania Hospital.

The perpetrator of this foul deed was instantly pursued, and, after some difficulty, captured. He was forthwith taken to prison, where he awaits his trial and the penalty of his sanguinary crime. One of the rumors is, that he owed the deceased an old grudge, and the other, that he was intoxicated.

As it was expected that much excitement might possibly grow out of the above melancholy affair, the authorities were on the alert, the sheriff and mayor, with a large force under their command, being fully prepared to preserve the peace of the city which, fortunately, had not been disturbed.

CANADA FRONTIER. The last advices from the Canada frontier represent both parties as desirous to adjust the recent unfortunate incidents in an amicable spirit; and we have no doubt but that quietness and order will soon be restored. To insure their continuance, however, the guilty should meet with prompt punishment, and the utmost vigilance be exerted by the authorities of both countries, to restrain all persons disposed to widen the breach which has unfortunately taken place.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser of Monday.

It will be seen by the following paragraph, copied from the Buffalo Journal of Thursday last, that an attack was to have been made on some of the towas on the Canada shore, on Wednesday night, by a party of refugees from Lewistown—fortunately, they could not get together a sufficient number of scoundrels to warrant a safe retreat. Their object, no doubt, was to plunder and destroy some of those elegant seats on the borders of the Niagara river, in the vicinity of Queenstown.

We have letters this morning from the Upper Province, which state that the intercourse between Oswego and the province has almost ceased, and unless speedy measures are pursued, the lives and property of those that reside on the border are in jeopardy.

Previous to the destruction of the Sir Robert Peel, we believe there was almost a daily intercourse between Toronto and Oswego—but now the American boats do not touch at Toronto as usual, nor do the British boats call at Oswego, as heretofore. We hope that a short period only will intervene, before the regular intercourse shall be restored.

"More disturbances." An attempt we learn, was to be made last night by a number of Canadian refugees, to cross over at Lewiston, and make an attack of some kind upon the Canadian shores; the enterprise was, however, abandoned, on account of their not then mustering in sufficient strength. United States troops were to leave this city, in the afternoon train of cars, for the above place, to put a stop to such attempts hereafter."

The Toronto Herald of Monday mentions that the steam packet William IV, did not proceed lower down than Brockville, in consequence of information having been given that an attempt would be made to destroy her.

The steamer Coburg arrived at Toronto on Monday with 460 men, being the right wing of the 34th regiment.

The Buffalo Advertiser of Wednesday evening says:—"A gentleman direct from Youngstown called at our office this afternoon, and informed us that down the river, on both sides, every thing was quiet. Governor Marcy was expected at Lewiston this evening. Three other persons, named Lester, Hunter, and Thayer, who were concerned in the assault on the Sir Robert Peel, have been arrested. An armed chopper, carrying six guns, has been fitted out by the British to cruise among the Thousand Islands."

From the Kingston Herald of Tuesday.

Two companies of militia have been sent to Brockville, and a schooner is fitted out, to carry six guns, (together with a tender and gun boats) in order to cruise on the river, and ferret the pirates out of their hiding places. This is essential, as among the Thousand Islands the ruffians might lodge, and find shelter all summer. Bill Johnson, if not one of his sons also, was one of the party that robbed the Peel, but neither he nor his boats have been seen at French Creek since. They are doubtless concealed somewhere among the islands, and it will be no easy task to find them, as the places of concealment are so numerous and complete. About one third of the Sir Robert Peel was owned in Ogdensburg, the remainder in Brockville. She is valued at 11,000.

Governor Marcy came yesterday to Cape Vincent, and addressed a letter to the mayor, requesting an interview, and he is expected here in the course of to-day. Scanlan has been bailed on his own recognizance. Bill Johnson, it is ascertained, is on the Duck Islands, at the foot of the lake. He is lying in wait for some lake steamboat.

On Sunday morning, the commodore Barrie brought down from Toronto twenty-two of the state prisoners, among them Theller, Sutherland, John G. Parker, Montgomery, the brothers Shepherd. They were all taken to Fort Henry, to be kept there until Lord Durham has considered their cases.

A militia order published in the official Gazette, prohibits militia officers from wearing their uniform when passing to the United States on leave. Commandants of corps and stations are to see that the order is punctually complied with.

From the N. Y. Courier, June 11.

The accounts from the frontier, we are happy to say, represent our state authorities and the people as anxiously endeavoring to obviate the unpleasant consequences which it was at first apprehended would grow out of the destruction of the British steamboat Sir Robert Peel and the firing on the Telegraph, whilst at Kingston. The magistrates of the latter place had invited the United States district attorney to be present at the legal investigation which had been made into the circumstances connected with the last occurrence. He had attended, and it was stated was perfectly satisfied with the course taken. The governor of this state had also expressed to the mayor of Kingston a desire to have an interview with him, which was about to take place.

Proclamation of the governor of N. York. Whereas William Johnson, late of French Creek, in the county of Jefferson; Daniel McLeod, a refugee from the province of Upper Canada; Samuel C. Frey and Robert Smith, also refugees from the same province, have been duly charged on oath with having been engaged with others in seizing, plundering, and burning the steamboat 'Sir Robert Peel,' at Wells' island, in the river St. Lawrence, and have hitherto eluded the civil officers in their attempts to arrest them; I do hereby offer the following reward for the arrest of each one of them, and for his delivery to the custody of the sheriff of the county of Jefferson, viz:

For William Johnson, $500
For Daniel McLeod, $250
For Samuel C. Frey, $250
For Robert Smith, $250

Besides the persons already arrested, and those above named, there are good reasons for believing that several others were associated with them in committing the crimes above mentioned. I do further offer a reward of one hundred dollars, for the detection and delivery as aforesaid of each one of the offenders, who are not named above, or have not been already arrested.

And I do hereby order and command all civil and ministerial officers of this state to be vigilant and active in their exertions to cause the said offenders to be brought to justice.

Previous to committing the offences above specified, the depredators had their encampment upon the "Ten Thousand Islands," in the St. Lawrence, which are situated partly in the province of Upper Canada, and partly within the limits of this state, and it is believed the places of their refuge at this time are among the islands.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the state, this 4th day of June, 1838.

W. L. MARCY.

DURHAM. By his excellency the right honorable John George, Earl of Durham, Viscount Lambton, &c. &c., knight grand cross of the most honorable order of the Bath, one of her majesty's most honorable privy council, and governor general, vice admiral, and captain general of all her majesty's provinces within, and adjacent to the continent of North America, &c. &c. &c.—A proclamation.

Whereas information has been received by me, that, on the twenty ninth day of May last, at a certain island, called "Wells' island," in the river St. Lawrence, within the territory of the United States of America, a body of armed men, at midnight, seized upon a certain steam vessel called the Sir Robert Peel, belonging to certain subjects of her majesty in the province of Upper Canada, then moored at the said island, to which she had resorted in the peaceable prosecution of her accustomed voyage, for the purpose of taking in fuel; and having with violence driven the passengers of the said steamboat upon the said island, deliberately plundered, burnt, and destroyed the said steamboat.

And whereas, many of the said passengers were females, and were thus assailed with a total disregard of their sex, and their condition at that hour of the night, thereby greatly aggravating the outrage: And whereas, the due protection of her majesty's subjects, and the demands of justice, imperatively require that the perpetrators of such a crime should not escape unpunished: And whereas, with that object I am desirous of co-operating with and giving every facility to the authorities of the United States: Now, know all men by these presents, that I do hereby promise the sum of one thousand pounds to any person or persons who shall identify and bring to conviction before any competent tribunal, any person actively engaged in, or directly aiding and abetting the perpetration of this last mentioned outrage.

To allay the alarm which has again unhappily disturbed the peace of the frontier of the province of Upper Canada, I hereby proclaim to the subjects of her majesty residing therein, my determination to secure their present and permanent protection by the employment of every means at the disposal of her majesty's government; for which purpose a sufficient military force will be immediately concentrated on such points, as shall best protect the frontier line from all aggressions on the peaceable inhabitants of these provinces. I shall also lose no time in appealing to the government of the United States, to vindicate its own honor, by avenging the insult which has been offered by a band of lawless pirates, and repairing the wrongs which have been inflicted on her majesty's subjects.

Pending such appeal, I earnestly exhort all her majesty's subjects, notwithstanding the aggravated provocation they have received, carefully to abstain from any act of retaliation which may expose them to the imputation of a disregard of their own honor, by a violation of the rights of adjoining powers.

Given under my hand and seal at arms at the castle of St. Lewis, in the city of Quebec, in said province of Lower Canada, the second day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight, and in the first year of her majesty's reign.

By command:

CHARLES BULLER, chief sec'y.

Lieut. gen. air John Colborne, the commander of the forces, accompanied by two sons, col. Rowan, the hon. Col. Gore, Lieut. col. Eden, and capt. Goldie, arrived here this morning in the Canada, and left again about ten, on his way to the upper province. The object of his excellency's journey, we have learned is to investigate, near the scene of the late outrage, into the circumstances attending it, and to endeavor to allay the excitement which the atrocious attack upon the Sir Robert Peel, is so well calculated to produce among the people of our sister province. LETTER OF MR. JAMES M. MASON.

Washington, May 25, 1838.

To the editor of the Virginian:

Sir: In your paper of the 23d, I observe quoted the annexed paragraph from the Globe of the 14th inst. professing to sketch the proceedings of the house of representatives on the Saturday preceding, during the debate on the bill for a new issue of ten millions of dollars in treasury notes:

"It seems, from the report of the Intelligencer, which we have before us, that Mr. Mason, of Virginia, about sun-down on Saturday, began the work of frustration of the known intentions of the majority. At a quarter past six, we are told by the Intelligencer's report, 'Mr. Mason moved that the committee rise; which motion was rejected by sixty-four yeas to eighty-six nays.' This was after full debate—after all amendments were disposed of, and after the sessions had been protracted much beyond the ordinary period on any day, but especially on Saturday. From this, Mr. Mason and every member in the house saw that the house considered the discussion exhausted, and was resolved to vote.

"Mr. Mason proceeded until 7 o'clock, and then gave way to a motion to adjourn.

"It was rejected by a still stronger vote.

"Mr. Mason continued until after 8 o'clock; and then gave way for another motion to adjourn.

"Mr. Mason then resumed, and finished.

"This was the first attempt to drive the house to an adjournment against its will."

However wilfully false all that is there said in reference to the part I bore in the debate is, I should never have descended to notice the calumny, but that its translation to your paper would seem to carry some warrant of authority at home for the facts it professes to state, were I to remain silent.

I cannot feel at all offended at the motives ascribed to me by the Globe, for taking part in the debate, springing as they do from a source so utterly incapable of comprehending any honorable incentive in public affairs. I seek only to correct the misrepresentations of fact.

It is stated in the paragraph that my motion for the committee to rise after 6 o'clock in the evening was made "after full debate, after all the amendments were disposed of," and after "Mr. Mason and every member in the house saw that the house considered the discussion exhausted, and was resolved to vote."

Whether the debate had been "full" or whether "the house considered the discussion exhausted, and was resolved to vote," will best be inferred from the fact that the debate had commenced only on the day before on so important a bill; that it was continued on the same night for more than four hours after I had concluded—was resumed again on Monday, and not ended until after dark on the Wednesday night succeeding.

Next, as to the declaration of the Globe that I did not take the floor until "after all the amendments were disposed of," the facts are, that no vote or action of any kind had been taken on any amendment whatever, except that one offered by my colleague (Mr. Hopkins) had been ruled out, and (as the columns of the same paper show, in which the falsehood is editorially vouched,) an amendment offered by another colleague (Mr. Robertson) was pending when I rose to speak. And, again: it is further true that seven several amendments, proposed by as many different gentlemen, were printed, before us, and all undisposed of, when they were cut off by the previous question on Wednesday night, three days after my speech was made.

So much for the facts of the Globe!

I will say, only, in addition, that much as I was opposed to the expensive mode of raising the money by an issue of treasury notes, when, as I thought demonstrable, a loan until the government was prepared to cancel the debt would have been a far cheaper mode of raising it, yet, when by the previous question the house refused to entertain the bill in any other form, I could see no propriety in voting against it, and accordingly gave my vote for the bill as it stood.

You will do me the honor to publish this letter, and thus oblige, yours,

Very respectfully, &c. &c.

JAMES M. MASON.

LETTER FROM THE HON. J. W. CROCKETT.

House of Representatives,

Washington City, April 30, 1838.

My very dear sir: Your very laconic, but not very courteous, letter of the 16th instant, demanding me to send you and others Mr. Benton's speech, is just received, and I hasten to reply.

As to your assertion that "that there are a large majority of administration men in Weekly County," that is a question upon which there may be between us an honest difference of opinion. Be that as it may, however, it is a matter of no importance, and I have therefore only to return you my thanks for your politeness in furnishing me with the information, and to assure you it is duly appreciated.

It gives me very great pleasure, sir, at all times to be obliging, and I have frequently undergone considerable inconvenience to accommodate my friends when requested to do so in respectful language; but my own views of propriety and self-respect compel me, under existing circumstances, with all due respect, to decline a compliance with your request. Hundreds of thousands of Mr. Benton's and Mr. Calhoun's speeches, as I am informed, have been printed gratuitously, and circulated by "the party" throughout the land.

My own opinion is, honestly, that they are paid for out of the public treasury, and I believe it could be proven to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind; at any rate I should like to know how dear Blair, "the printer of the Globe, can afford to print so many thousand speeches" for nothing, and find himself? No man can believe it who is not as blind with party prejudice as a snake in dog-days. The cost at the ordinary rate cannot, I think, be less than from $3 to $400,000.

But, for my part, I have to pay for all the speeches I send to my constituents at the rate of from 2 1/2 to $5 per hundred. This affair of sending speeches, sir, you must know is a private concern, paid for, so far as the whig members are concerned, out of their own private purses; and have the fact that I only send such as, in my opinion, set forth sound and correct views and principles.

I have no doubt I could obtain thousands of Mr. Thomas H. Benton's speeches, without cost to me, but they would be paid for out of the people's money; and, to be candid and frank on the subject, sir, I must say that, if I could obtain a million of them for a red cent, I have too much respect for my franking privilege to be guilty of so gross an abuse of it as I believe it would be to frank even one of them. I would have no objections to circulate the fair and candid examination of those measures to which I am opposed, by the friends of the administration; but such a bundle of demagoguism as Benton's speech contains, got up to gull and mislead the public mind, can never receive my endorsement while I keep my senses.

I have taken the liberty of showing your letter to my friend and colleague, col. C. H. Williams, and he requests me to present you his respects most affectionately.

Very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

JOHN W. CROCKETT.

MAJOR CROSS' ACCOUNTS.

The resolution referred to by Mr. Underwood having been published in the National Intelligencer, Major Cross requests the editors of that journal to do him the favor to insert the following letters on the subject:

Representatives' Chamber, June 6, 1838.

Sir: I deem it proper to inform you that I offered a resolution this morning calling upon the secretary of the treasury to furnish the house a copy of your accounts as presented for settlement, &c. The resolution was adopted, and you may probably see it in to-morrow's papers. The cause of this movement is: An individual named Maguire called on me a day or two since, and informed me that he believed there were illegal practices prevailing in the settlement of accounts at the treasury; that allowances were made for extra services, and as a per centage on disbursements, the legality of which was doubted, and that your accounts would illustrate the matter, &c. Since the resolution was adopted, gen. McKay came to my desk and explained the relation between Maguire and yourself, (of which I had previously heard,) and stated that you had a petition before the military committee, asking compensation for extra services, from which he inferred that no payment on that account had been made you.

I feel it to be my duty to inquire into abuses alleged to exist by any citizen, and I have also deemed it proper to make this communication, as the inquiry may possibly affect you.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. R. UNDERWOOD.

Major T. Cross.

Quartermaster General's Office,
Washington, June 6, 1838.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive your note of this date, informing me that, at the instance of a man by the name of Maguire, you had introduced a resolution calling upon the secretary of the treasury to furnish the house of representatives with a copy of my accounts, as presented for settlement.

I am much obliged to you for the kindness which prompted your notice to me of the course you had deemed it your duty to pursue on the occasion. Far from taking any exception to it, I recognise the obligation of every public functionary, when official abuses are alleged, to inquire into them, even if the allegations do not come from the most respectable source. I have always acted upon this principle myself, in the discharge of the duties confided to me, and am disposed to commend rather than condemn it in others.

It will be my pleasure, sir, to meet the most searching investigation into all my official acts, and especially into all my pecuniary transactions with the public, whenever they may be deemed worthy of inquiry by the competent authority. This I may challenge with a boldness inspired by a consciousness that they defy even malignity itself.

But I do not understand from your note that my official integrity has been at all impugned. If "illegal practices do prevail in the settlement of accounts at the treasury," the responsibility is on the accounting officers of that department, to whom is confided the power of construing the laws, and passing upon all claims presented against the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Your most obedient servant,

T. Cross,

Maj. U. S. A. Act'g Q. M. G.

EXPLANATORY LETTERS.

Senate Chamber, Saturday, June 9, 1838.

Gentlemen: In the Globe of yesterday evening, under the head of "proceedings in the senate," the following paragraph occurs:

"INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

"On motion of Mr. Wright, the senate proceeded to consider the house bill making appropriations for the prevention and suppression of Indian hostilities for 1838, and for the payment of arrearages in 1837.

"On ordering this bill to its third reading, Mr. Webster addressed the senate, and was answered by Mr. Wright, when Mr. Preston spoke at length, reflecting generally on the war and its causes which he attributed to the fault of the administration.

"Mr. Lumpkin addressed the house as follows:"

Here follows Mr. Lumpkin's speech at large. This representation of the debate, which occurred on the day of the above publication, produces the impression that I opened a discussion on the subject of the Cherokee Indians, and the proceedings of the executive in regard to them, which brought out gov. Lumpkin in reply; and this impression is strengthened by his speech appearing to be entirely in answer to me. This is altogether erroneous. The course of the debate was this: I made some remarks upon the Florida war, without the slightest allusion to the Georgia affairs. Mr. Lumpkin followed, making no allusion whatever to any thing I had said, but went at once and exclusively into a discussion of the correspondence between John Ross and the executive, stating that his object was to disabuse the public mind of some misapprehensions in regard to it, and also that the executive of the United States had the authority of gov. Gilmer for the course it had pursued. To this I replied, and endeavored to show that the proceedings of the executive were impolitic, and calculated to embarrass gov. Gilmer and gen. Scott, and to impede the execution of the treaty; and I contended that gov. Gilmer did not authorize the extension of the time of removal of the Indians for two years, &c. &c. Gov. Lumpkin replied to these remarks, and so the debate proceeded. Of gov. Lumpkin's first speech, which opened the whole ground, and led to the debate there is no mention in the Globe.

I should not have thought this correction necessary, but my attention was called to the report of the debate by these two circumstances:

1st. That the Globe, published on the evening of the debate, contained the extracts from gov. Gilmer's letters, which had been read by Mr. Lumpkin.

2. That Mr. Lumpkin's speech, as published in the Globe, manifestly prepared by him, leaves the impression that all which he said on the subject of the Cherokees had been elicited by my remarks: whereas, he had preceded me, and brought on the discussion.

WM. C. PRESTON.

Hall of Representatives, June 11, 1838.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton: Gentlemen: When the yeas and nays on the bill to remove or alter the building in progress of erection for the treasury office, (reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning,) were taken, I was not in my seat to vote upon it, having been confined to my room, by indisposition, for two weeks. Had I been present, I should have voted against laying that bill on the table.

I deem it due to myself to say so, as the inquiry originally instituted was under a resolution, which I offered during the extra session. In offering the resolution, I did not design to reflect a censure upon the late or present executive, nor upon the architect; but simply upon the building itself. Indeed, I take pleasure in cordially commending the course which Mr. Van Buren has pursued, in co-operating in having a suitable examination made of the propriety or impropriety of making a change of construction or location. The building is inconvenient, and the site is badly selected. The rooms will be small and dark, and will be unhealthy. It is, at least, doubtful if the building will endure long if erected. And I believe that a more convenient building could be erected, and a saving of three or four hundred thousand dollars effected.

Instead of being heated by flues, there is to be a fireplace in each room.

These are some, and the chief of the considerations which would have induced me to vote against the motion to lay the bill upon the table.

By inserting this note you will greatly oblige your friend.

WM. C. JOHNSON.

TO THE EDITORS.

Gentlemen: In the sketch which appeared in the National Intelligencer this morning, of the debate upon the pre-emption bill, I am reported to have "explained at some length the grounds on which I had voted against the amendment" of my colleague, (Mr. Ewing,) proposing to allow the state of Indiana to purchase the lands recently obtained from the Miami at the minimum price.

This is erroneous. I voted for that amendment. The substance of my remarks, which were made after that vote was taken, and upon the amendment reported by the committee on public lands excepting the Miami lands from the general provisions of the pre-emption bill, was, that, although I regretted to see that bill embarrassed by any heterogeneous provisions, which might distract its friends, I hoped that the vote just taken would not be wrought into an argument against us, when the subject of my colleague's amendment should be presented as an independent proposition, and I declared myself in favor of its justice.

I voted also for the amendment reported by the committee on public lands.

ALBERT S. WHITE.

June 11, 1838.

House of Representatives, June 11, 1838.

Gentlemen: It seems by your report of the debate on the pre-emption bill, in the Intelligencer of this morning, that I was understood to have offered an amendment that would give pre-emption rights to those who have "already settled" on the Miami reserve lands in Indiana, when, in truth, my amendment (which is on file as presented on the 7th instant, and shall be revived when the bill be reported to the house,) as well as my remarks upon the occasion of presenting it, were directly adverse to any such grant. About half a dozen original settlers on the tract alluded to, before the date of the treaty, (by consent of the Indians,) and, as represented to me, having improved the quarter sections they occupy, should not, in my opinion, lose their labor by a change of ownership; and, with the exception of such, I contended, as my amendment requires, that the state should have a pre-emption to the entire purchase; that she had brought herself clearly within the principles of the bill, by extending her improvements into the wilderness; and, by her policy and action, had imparted value to the land, which should now accrue to her benefit, for public purposes, upon every principle of equity.

I am perfectly aware of the great difficulty unavoidably experienced by reporters in catching the precise views expressed by members, but that difficulty does not extend to amendments offered in writing.

The "Globe" has published the same erroneous statement of my amendment, and it is important, upon this matter, that I prevent misrepresentation at home. I copy my amendment as offered, and let it speak for itself:

"Provided, however, That the state of Indiana shall have the exclusive privilege for one year to enter at the legal minimum price all the lands in said state purchased of the Miami Indians by treaty, approved in—, 1837, except such quarter sections as were occupied and improved at the time of the date of making said treaty, by bona fide citizens of said state, with the previous consent of said Indians; and such settlers shall, of right, be entitled to enter, within one year from and after the passage of this bill, the quarter section each may have so settled and improved."

On offering this, I adverted to the uncalled for, and, as I thought, invidious eulogy of my colleague upon settlers now claiming pre-emption rights, as calculated to excite a belief that their character had been assailed, and thus revive and rivet a falsehood recently promulgated to injure or defame an exalted statesman belonging to the other house; but, unless the amendment I then offered, and another to secure the reception of all bank notes of five dollars and upwards, issued by specie-paying banks of the states and territories wherein the lands lie, and redeemable on demand, be adopted, I did not say (as the report makes me) that I would vote for the bill; and I will now take occasion to say, that my convictions of the propriety and policy and justice of both contemplated amendments remain the same, and, unless they be adopted, I shall most certainly not vote for a measure that would otherwise injure a large majority of my respected constituents.

Please give this a place in the Intelligencer, and oblige your friend and servant,

JNO. EWING.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton.

NOTE BY THE REPORTER.

[The explanation of mistake of the sense of "an amendment in writing" is, that the amendment in writing could not be found by our reporter; and the statement of its substance was taken from another paper, the reporter for which seems to have misunderstood its import.]

THE UNITED STATES AND GEORGIA.

The following message was received from the president of the United States; and, when read was laid on the table:

To the house of representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the 4th inst. calling for any communication received from the governors of the states of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, or Alabama, in reference to the proposed modification of the Cherokee treaty of 1825, I herewith enclose a report of the secretary of war, which is accompanied by a copy of a letter addressed to him by the governor of Georgia, and of his reply thereto. As stated by the secretary, no communication on the subject has been received from either of the other executives mentioned.

M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, June 6, 1838.

War Department, June 6, 1838.

Sir: In compliance with the resolution of the house of representatives of the 4th inst. referred by you to this department, calling for any communication which may have been received "from the governors of the states of Georgia, North Carolina, Tennessee, or Alabama, on the proposition of John Ross and his associates, for extending the time of removing the Cherokee Indians from those states," I have the honor to lay before you, for transmission to that body, a copy of a letter from the governor of Georgia, together with a copy of the reply of the department thereto. Nothing has been received from either of the other executives mentioned.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

To the President of the United States.

Executive Department, (Georgia.)

Milledgeville, May 28, 1838.

Sir: I have had the honor of receiving from you the proposals of the government to John Ross, and instructions to general Scott.

The surprise and regret excited in myself at these proceedings of the government, I am sure will be felt by every citizen of the state.

I can give to them no sanction whatever.

The proposals to Ross could not be carried into execution but in violation of the rights of the state. The very making of them must prove exceedingly injurious to the interests of its people.

The lands which are in the occupancy of the Indians in Georgia are the private property of its citizens; and the owners are now entitled, by the laws, to possession. For the purpose of preventing all unnecessary suffering and hardships on the part of the Cherokees, these proprietors have been earnestly entreated not to enforce their rights at once, but to wait until the Indians should be removed by the army. They have been assured that this would be done by the president as soon as possible, and in perfect good faith. Sincere regret is felt that the success of these efforts in the cause of humanity have been defeated by the government.

As soon as the proposals to Ross and the instructions to gen. Scott are known to the proprietors, they will no longer be restrained from taking possession of their property. It becomes necessary, therefore, that I should know whether the president intends, by the instructions to gen. Scott, to require that the Indians shall be maintained in their occupancy by an armed force, in opposition to the rights of the owners of the soil. If such is the intention of the president, a direct collision between the authorities of the state and the general government must ensue. My duty will require that I shall prevent any interference whatever by the troops with the rights of the state and its citizens. I shall not fail to perform it. To avoid misunderstanding, permit me to request that you will communicate to me, and as early as you conveniently can, the president's views upon this subject.

I have no doubt but the Indians can be removed from the state in the execution of the treaty, and by the troops now organized and stationed in the country with that avowed purpose, with more ease and expedition, and a readier acquiescence on the part of the Indians, than by any means in the power of this state.

If, however, the government consents that Ross and his friends shall remain two years longer, the state will be obliged to get rid of the evils which must necessarily arise from such policy, by exercising its own rights of jurisdiction, and remove them by the most efficient means which it can command.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.

GEO. R. GILMER.

To the hon. Joel R. Poinsett.

War Department, June 8, 1838.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's reply to my communication, conveying the proposals made by the executive to the Cherokee delegation, and the instructions to general Scott; and from the tenor of your remarks, I cannot but suppose that your excellency must have misapprehended the true meaning and intent of the government.

The question of prolonging the time of the removal of the Cherokees is expressly referred to the states by this department, and such extension was not intended to embrace a longer period than that which might be required by a due regard to the common dictates of humanity, it being expressly stated that the Cherokees were to be removed as speedily as was consistent with their health and comfort. General Scott is moreover instructed to continue the prosecution of the measures he has adopted to remove the Indians; and, whether their removal is to be effected by compulsion, or by voluntary emigration under their own agents, so to conduct his operations as to place the proprietors of the lands there in possession of their property with as little delay as possible. These instructions certainly do not warrant the supposition that the government consents that Ross and his friends shall remain two years longer; on the contrary, the orders of the government are most positive that the Indians are to be removed from Georgia first, and from the other states as speedily as practicable; and your excellency may be assured, from the character of the officer intrusted with their execution, that these orders will be carried into effect without any unnecessary delay. The department cannot, therefore, perceive any cause for the apprehension your excellency seems to entertain of a collision between the authorities of the state and the general government.

I fully concur with your excellency in opinion that "the Indians can be removed from the state in the execution of the treaty, and by the troops now organized and stationed in the country with that avowed purpose, with more ease and expedition, and a readier acquiescence on the part of the Indians, than by any means in the power of this state," (meaning Georgia;) and I beg leave to reiterate to your excellency the assurance that the troops will be employed, not in opposing, but in vindicating the rights of the states interested in the fulfilment of the treaty, and in establishing, without unnecessary delay, their citizens in the possession of their property in the Cherokee country. All parties must desire that this may be effected rather by the voluntary emigration of the Indians than by the application of force, a resort to which the government desires most earnestly to avoid if possible.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
J. R. POINSETT.

His excellency Geo. R. Gilmer,
Governor of Georgia, Milledgeville, Ga.

From the Globe.

In the senate, on Thursday, the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities was taken up, and Mr. Preston, [see page 243 for Mr. Preston's explanatory letter] without knowing any thing of the subject on which he inveighed, went to work after the fashion of the letter writing tribe, to manufacture something to answer party purposes. Gov. Lumpkin, of Georgia, made a short shift for Mr. Preston, by presenting a clear narrative of recorded facts before the senate. Mr. Preston insisted that the course of the administration, in proposing to conciliate the malcontent Cherokees, by holding out inducements to voluntary emigration, was altogether wrong, and had given the states interested just cause of offence. The governor of Georgia was alluded to, as well as general Scott, as being badly treated by the course of the department, which, it was pretended, disappointed all their expectations. Upon this, governor Lumpkin rose and read the extract of a letter from governor Gilmer, suggesting precisely the line of conduct adopted by the department. It is as follows:

Extract from a letter from governor Gilmer, dated Milledgeville, March 5, 1838.

"The best informed persons residing among the Cherokees, express the opinion that Ross can, if he will, remove his people at once. To avoid the great expense of the government, and preserve the lives and property of our citizens and the Indians, which may be sacrificed, if the treaty is executed by force, the government can well afford to pay a very liberal price for the voluntary and immediate removal of the Indians. To enable Ross and the chiefs to effect this object, I believe it to be necessary for them first to return home, see their people, and let them be satisfied that their efforts to change the treaty have been honest, though unavailing. The Cherokees are so suspicious of their chiefs, that even Ross, entirely as he has their confidence, might lose all power to serve them, if he attempted to make a contract with the government for their emigration before they were consulted, and their approval of the measure obtained. If the government should ascertain, upon Ross' return home, that he had the power, and was willing to undertake the removal of his people, the terms of the contract could be agreed upon without difficulty or delay.

"If the pertinacity of Ross should create any difficulty, it might be obviated by making no reference in his contract to the treaty."

How far Mr. Preston's assertion that the secretary arrested the operations of general Scott, and prevented that officer from doing his duty in removing the Indians, will be seen from the following letter, just received through the governor of Georgia, on that subject:

Milledgeville, June 2, 1838.

Sir: Having just arrived from the scene of operations in the Cherokee country, I avail myself of the honor of communicating to your excellency the movements of my chief, general Scott, within the limits of Georgia. Upon the 24th ult. he placed the Georgia volunteers under the command of general Floyd, in position, and on the 25th commenced operations. General Floyd, in person, commanded the first detachment that operated. The promptness and ability of his movement gave to the commanding general the highest satisfaction, while it presented to the balance of the command a salutary example.

The number of prisoners on Tuesday last was about 8,000; and by this I do not think there is a wandering Indian in the Cherokee country, within the limits of Georgia. The captures were made with the utmost kindness and humanity, and free from every stain of violence. The deportment of our Georgia citizens resident in the Cherokee countries, has been marked by a forbearance and kindness towards the Indians, that must win for them the admiration of every philanthropist. Permit me to conclude with the congratulation of our rights being so promptly and peacefully secured.

With the highest regard,

A. H. KENAN,

Volunteer aid-de-camp to General Scott.

His excellency G. R. Gilmer.

This letter, too, we hope will satisfy governor Gilmer that the ground is untenable taken in the following letter, written by way, we suppose, of acknowledging his obligations to the secretary at war for accomplishing the wishes expressed, not only by himself, but by men of distinction in all parts of Georgia, as gov. Lumpkin informed the senate. We annex this kind request of gov. Gilmer for the promptitude with which the secretary entered into the views of engaging Ross and others actively in the business of emigration. It will be seen that his excellency is now disposed to treat the military force, busily engaged in urging and aiding the emigration, as a hostile array against Georgia to defend the Indians; and, in that view, is prepared to levy war on the United States. But we give the letter and reply, that the country may judge governor Gilmer on his own showing. The bill was passed to a third reading by a vote of yeas 40, noes 0, and would have finally passed, but that Mr. Benton intimated a wish to speak on it.

We find the following correspondence in the "Globe" of Friday night the 9th inst.

Executive Department,

Milledgeville, May 30, 1838.

Sir: I enclose to you my answer to the letter of the secretary of war, upon the subject of his proposals to John Ross, and late instructions to general Scott.

All here concur in the opinion that these proceedings of the government are in violation of the rights of the state, and calculated to produce the most extensive and serious evils in the Cherokee country.

Permit me to request that the delegation in congress from this state will unite in ascertaining from the president whether it is his intention to continue the present delay in removing the Cherokees by the troops under general Scott, for the purpose of effecting that object by contracts to be made with the agents of Ross and his friends, or for any other purpose? And whether it is his intention to maintain the Indians by force upon the soil of Georgia in opposition to the will of the state, and the rights of its citizens, to whom the lands have been granted; and that you communicate to me his determination.

Very respectfully, yours, &c.

GEORGE R. GILMER.

Hon. Seaton Grantland,
House of representatives United States.

Department of War, June 7, 1838.

Gentlemen: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 5th inst. covering a letter from the governor of Georgia, and asking a reply to the inquiries it contains. Although they have been substantially answered in the reply of the department to his excellency's letter of the 23th ultimo, the tenor of these interrogatories manifests such an extraordinary misapprehension of the intentions of the government, that it becomes necessary, again, to explain them.

His excellency desires to be informed if it is the president's "intention to continue the present delay in removing the Cherokees by the troops under general Scott for the purpose of effecting that object by contract with the agents of Ross and his friends, or any other purpose?" The department does not understand what is meant by the present delay. When general Scott left Washington, he carried with him instructions to proceed without delay in the removal of the Cherokees, and his despatches, since received, show that he took the proper measures to obey his instructions with his characteristic promptness and energy. When the conciliatory proposals of the executive to the Cherokee delegation were submitted to congress, the general was again instructed to continue the prosecution of the measures he had adopted for the removal of the Indians, and whether it was to be conducted by the troops under his command or by the Cherokees themselves, whether it was to be compulsory or voluntary, to permit no unnecessary delay in its execution.

His excellency desires still further to know, "whether it is his [the president's] intention to maintain the Indians by force upon the soil of Georgia, in opposition to the will of the state and the rights of its inhabitants, to whom the lands have been granted?"

In reply to the proposition of the Cherokee delegation for an extension of time, they were told in express terms, that where the rights and interests of sovereign states were concerned, the president could not enter into any engagement with the Cherokees, and that no delay could be granted without the assent of the states interested in the execution of the treaty. In asking that assent the states are merely requested not to press their claims in a manner to occasion unnecessary discomfort and inconvenience to the Indians; and general Scott is at the same time instructed to commence his operations in that part of the territory where the lands have been disposed of, meaning Georgia, and to conduct them in such a manner as to place the proprietors in possession of their estates with as little delay as possible. The department is, therefore, utterly at a loss to understand how the president's views should have been so misapprehended as to give rise to these questions, and now begs leave through you, explicitly to deny that such are or ever have been the intentions of the government.

Very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

ARMY—OFFICIAL—ORDERS No. 25.

Head-quarters, Eastern Division,
Cherokee Agency, Ten., May 17, 1838.

Major general Scott, of the United States army, announces to the troops assembled and assembling in this country, that, with them, he has been charged by the president to cause the Cherokee Indians, yet remaining in North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Alabama, to remove to the west, according to the terms of the treaty of 1835. His staff will be as follows:

Lieutenant colonel W. J. Worth, acting adjutant general, chief of the staff.

Major M. M. Payne, acting inspector general.
Lieutenants R. Anderson, and E. D. Keys, regular aids-de-camps.

Colonel A. H. Kenan, and lieutenant H. B. Shaw, volunteer aids-de-camp.

Any order given orally, or in writing, by either of these officers, in the name of the major general, will be respected and obeyed as if given by himself.

The chiefs of ordnance, of the quartermaster's department, and of the commissariat, as also the medical director of this army, will, as soon as they can be ascertained, be announced in orders.

To carry out the general object with the greatest promptitude and certainty, and with the least possible distress to the Indians, the country they are to evacuate is divided into three principal military districts, under as many officers of high rank, to command the troops serving therein, subject to the instructions of the major general.

Eastern district, to be commanded by brigadier general Eustis, of the United States army, or the highest officer in rank serving therein: North Carolina, the part of Tennessee lying north of Gilmer county, Georgia, and the counties of Gilmer, Union, and Lumpkin, in Georgia. Head-quarters, in the first instance, at Fort Butler.

Western district to be commanded by colonel Lindsay, of the United States army, or the highest officer in rank serving therein: Alabama, the residue of Tennessee and Dade county, in Georgia. Head-quarters, in the first instance, say at Ross' landing.

Middle district to be commanded by brigadier general Armistead, of the United States army, or the highest officer in rank serving therein: All that part of the Cherokee country lying within the state of Georgia, and which is not comprised in the two other districts. Head-quarters, in the first instance, say at New Echota.

It is not intended that the foregoing boundaries between the principal commanders shall be strictly observed. Either, when carried near the district of another, will not hesitate to extend his operations, according to the necessities of the case, but with all practicable harmony, into the adjoining district. And, among his principal objects, in case of actual or apprehended hostilities, will be that of affording adequate protection to our white people in and around the Cherokee country.

The senior officer actually present in each district will receive instructions from the major general as to the time of commencing the removal, and every thing that may occur interesting to the service, in the district, will be promptly reported to the same source. The major general will endeavor to visit in a short time all parts of the Cherokee country, occupied by the troops.

The duties devolved on the army, through the orders of the major general, and those of the commanders of districts under him, are of a highly important and critical nature.

The Cherokees, by the advances which they have made in christianity and civilization, are by far the most interesting tribe of Indians in the United States. Of the fifteen thousand of those people who are now to be removed—and the time within which a voluntary emigration was stipulated, will expire on the 23d instant—it is understood that about 4-5th are opposed, or have become averse to a distant emigration; and although none are in actual hostilities with the United States, or threaten a resistance by arms, yet the troops will probably be obliged to cover the whole country they inhabit, in order to make prisoners, and to march or transport the prisoners, by families, either to this place, to Ross' landing, or Gunter's landing, where they are to be delivered over to the superintendent of Cherokee emigration.

Considering the number and temper of the mass to be removed, together with the extent and fastness of the country occupied, it will readily occur that simple indiscretion—acts of harshness and cruelty, on the part of our troops, may lead, step by step, to delays, to impatience, and exasperation, and in the end to a general war and carnage—a result, in the case of those particular Indians, utterly abhorrent to the generous sympathies of the whole American people. Every possible kindness, compatible with the necessity of removal, must, therefore, be shown by the troops, and if, in the ranks, a despicable individual should be found, capable of inflicting a wanton injury or insult on any Cherokee man, woman or child, it is hereby made the special duty of the nearest good officer or man, instantly to interpose, and to seize and consign the guilty wretch to the severest penalty of the laws. The major general is fully persuaded that this injunction will not be neglected by the brave men under his command, who cannot be otherwise than jealous of their own honor and that of their country's.

By early and persevering acts of kindness and humanity, it is impossible to doubt that the Indians may soon be induced to confide in the army, and instead of fleeing to the mountains and forests, flock to us for food and clothing. If, however, through false apprehensions, individuals, or a party, here and there, should seek to hide themselves, they must be pursued and invited to surrender, but not fired upon unless they make a stand to resist. Even in such cases, mild remedies may sometimes better succeed than violence; and it cannot be doubted that if we get possession of the women and children first, or first capture the men, that, in either case, the outstanding members of the same families, will readily come in on the assurance of forgiveness and kind treatment.

Every captured man, as well as all who surrender themselves must be disarmed, with the assurance that their weapons will be carefully preserved, and restored at, or beyond the Mississippi. In either case, the men will be guarded and escorted except it may be, where their women and children are safely secured as hostages; but, in general, families in our possession, will not be separated, unless it be to send them, as runners, to invite others to come in.

It may happen that the Indians may be found too sick, in the opinion of the nearest surgeon, to be removed to one of the depots indicated above. In every such case, one or more of the family, or the friends of the person, will be left in attendance, with ample subsistence and remedies, and the remainder of the family removed by the troops. Infants, superannuated persons, lunatics and women in a helpless condition, will all, in the removal, require peculiar attention, which the brave and humane will seek to adopt to the necessities of the several cases.

All strong men, women, boys and girls, will be made to march under proper escorts. For the feeble, Indian horses and ponies will furnish a ready resource, as well as for bedding and light utensils—all of which as intimated in the treaty, will be necessary to the emigrants both in going to, and after their arrival at their new homes. Such, and all other light articles of property, the Indians will be allowed to collect and to take with them, as also their slaves, who will be treated in like manner with the Indians themselves.

If the horses and ponies be not adequate to the above purposes, wagons must be supplied.

Corn, oats, fodder and other forage, also beef cattle, belonging to the Indians to be removed, will be taken possession of by the proper departments of the staff, as wanted, for the regular consumption of the army, and certificates given to the owners, specifying in every case, the amount of forage and the weight of beef, so taken, in order that the owners may be paid for the same on their arrival at one of the depots mentioned above.

All other moveable or personal property, left or abandoned by the Indians, will be collected by agents appointed for the purpose, by the superintendants of Cherokee emigration, under a system of accountability, for the benefit of the Indian owners, which he will devise. The army will give those agents, in their operations, all reasonable countenance and support.

White men and widows, citizens of the United States, who are, or have been intermarried with Indians, and thence commonly termed Indian countrymen, also such Indians as have been made denizens of particular state by a special legislation together with the families and property of all such persons, will not be molested or removed by the troops until a decision, on the principles involved, can be obtained from the war department.

A like indulgence, but only for a limited time, and until further orders, is extended to the families and property of certain chiefs and head-men of the two great Indian parties, (on the subject of emigration,) now understood to be absent in the direction of Washington on the business of their respective parties.

This order will be carefully read at the head of every company in the army.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

By command:

W. J. Worth, lieut. col. chief of the staff.

REPORT ON MR. WEBSTER'S RESOLUTION.

In senate, Friday, June 8, 1838.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, made the following report:

The committee on finance, to which was referred the resolution of the senate of the 31st ultimo, directing certain inquiries as to various provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," passed on the 23d day of June, 1836, respectfully report:

The resolution instructs the committee "to take into consideration the act of the 23d of June, 1836, entitled 'An act to regulate the deposits of the public money,' and to make inquiry upon these points, viz:

First. "Whether, according to the provisions of that act, it is now competent for the secretary of the treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments."

The committee have examined the act with attention, and find that, all other objections being obviated, it is competent for the secretary of the treasury to employ, as a public depository, any bank which has heretofore been selected for that service, "and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments." The eighth section of the deposit act prohibits the secretary of the treasury from discontinuing any deposit bank, and from withdrawing the public money therefrom, except for certain enumerated causes, one of which is in the following words:

"Or if any of said banks shall, at any time, refuse to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded."

Upon this cause being presented, it is made the express duty of the secretary, by the same section of the act, "to discontinue any such bank as a depository, and withdraw from it the public moneys which it may hold on deposit at the time of such discontinuance;" but when the bank shall have again resumed specie payments, nothing is found in this language to interdict its re-selection as a public depository.

The fourth section of the act sets out the terms and conditions upon which the banks shall agree to receive the public moneys before they shall be employed as depositories. The second of these terms is prescribed in the following words:

"Secondly. To credit as specie all sums deposited therein to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and to pay all checks, warrants, or drafts, drawn on such deposits, in specie, if required by the holder thereof."

The breach of this condition, on the part of the bank, would be a refusal to pay its depositors in specie, and consequently a suspension, to that extent, of specie payments; and the duty of the secretary of the treasury to discontinue it, as a depository, and to withdraw the public money from it, would become imperative, by the language of the eighth section, before referred to, which assigns, as another cause of discontinuance and withdrawal, that, "at any time any one of said banks shall fail or refuse to perform any of said duties, as prescribed by this act, and stipulated to be performed by its contract."

This contingency, therefore, like the former, would take from the bank its character as a depository, for the time being; would forfeit the existing contract, and render its discontinuance, and the withdrawal of the public money from it, an imperative duty; but the committee see nothing, in either of the causes, to prevent a second contract with the same bank, when it should again resume specie payments, again consent "to pay its own notes in specie, if demanded," and again "pay all checks, warrants, or drafts, drawn on the public deposits, in specie, if required by the holder thereof." They find no provision, in any other part of the act, interdicting a second contract with the same bank, when the first shall have been terminated for either of these causes, and they therefore express their opinion that "it is now competent for the secretary of the treasury to employ any bank which has heretofore been selected as a public depository, and which, since the passage of that act, has suspended specie payments;" there being no other obstacle in the way of such second employment, than the act of suspension of specie payments.

The next point to which the resolution directs the inquiry of the committee, is in the following words:

"Second. 'Or which has, since the fourth day of July, 1836, paid out notes, or bills, of a less denomination than five dollars.'"

To cause the inquiry to be clearly understood, it is necessary to connect the preceding language with the words above quoted, and the inquiry will be, whether, according to the provisions of that act, [the deposit law of 1836], it is now competent for the secretary of the treasury to employ any bank which has, since the 4th day of July, 1836, paid out notes, or bills, of a less denomination than five dollars.

In answer to this inquiry, the committee find the two first clauses of the fifth section of the act to be in the following words:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That no bank shall be selected, or continued, as a place of deposit of the public money, which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie; nor shall any bank be selected, or continued, as aforesaid, which shall, after the fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue, or pay out, any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

The last of these clauses meets and answers the inquiry directly, and shows that it is not competent for the secretary of the treasury, under this act, now to employ, as a public depository, any bank which has, since the fourth day of July, 1836, either issued, or paid out, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars; while the first clause interdicts the selection or continuance, at any time, and under any circumstances, of any bank "which shall not redeem its notes and bills, on demand, in specie."

These two points of the inquiry seem to the committee to assume the expediency of a course of legislation which shall revive and introduce again into practice the deposit system established by the act of 1836, as the system upon which the public money is to be kept and disbursed. Under this supposition, the opinion of the committee, as to the first inquiry, does not indicate the necessity of further legislation; while the plain and unquestioned construction of the act, as to the second, compels an answer which, to the minds of those who desire the reintroduction of that system, may seem to point out such a necessity.

Not so with the majority of the committee. While left by the senate to the free exercise of their own opinions, they cannot recommend any legislation, the effect of which will be to reunite the public treasury and the banks, by a return of the public treasure to the uses of banking; to stimulate and compel the banks to discount upon the public money, by exacting from them an interest for its use; to promote an expansion in the paper issues of the banks, exactly proportioned to the fertility of the public revenues, and a correspondent embarrassment of the public treasury. When a sterility of revenue shall call for the public money which has passed into the hands of the customers of the banks. Such, they believe, have been the effects of the system of deposits, the revival of which the resolution seems to contemplate. That system compelled the deposit of all the public money in banks; it placed it in those institutions upon general deposit, and thus made it, in fact and in law, the money of the banks, and not the money of the people; it not only held out an inducement to the banks to use the money for the purposes of discount and banking, but, in this way, gave them the right so to use it, in defiance of the popular will, and of the public authorities; it went further, and compelled them to convert it to some profitable employment, by demanding interest from them while it was in their keeping. Time and experience have shown the consequences of such a policy, and were there no other reason, these consequences would forbid the committee from recommending any legislation calculated, or intended, to revive that system.

The action of the senate, however, appears to them equally to stand in the way of any such recommendation. A special convocation of congress, in September last, was a necessity imposed by the failure of this system of deposits, and the embarrassments to the public treasury thereby occasioned. Recommendations for the keeping and management of the public money, without the aid of the banks, and especially for a permanent separation between the treasury of the people and the business of banking, were then laid before congress by the president. These recommendations were deliberately and definitively acted upon and adopted by the senate, but failed to receive the assent of the other branch of congress. At the commencement of the present session, the same recommendations, substantially, were renewed, and again the senate has, after long deliberation and debate, adopted them, in the shape of a bill, and thus sent them to the house for its concurrence. If that bill shall become a law, the whole deposit system recognised and legalized by the deposit act of 1836, will be superseded. Will the senate, then, by its own action, supersede its own bill? Will it, in the absence of all information as to what may be the fate of that measure in the co-ordinate branch of the legislature, or rather with the knowledge that it has not yet been considered there, send another bill upon the same general subject, based upon adverse principles?

The committee can only repeat, what they have found it to be their duty to say upon a kindred branch of this subject, that whether such duplicate action, by the same legislative body, be consistent with established parliamentary law, with the economy of legislation, or with the uniformity of decisions which should characterize all deliberative bodies, are questions which properly address themselves to the senate and not to them; but upon the merits of the propositions they must be permitted to feel entire confidence that no sufficient reasons for a change of opinion or action can be presented.

The remaining inquiry embraced in the resolution is in the following words:

"Third. And also to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying those provisions of the said act, which prohibit the receipt, in payment of debts and dues to the United States, of the bills of all banks which issue bills of less denomination than five dollars."

This inquiry relates to the last clause of the 5th section of the act, which reads as follows:

"Nor shall the notes or bills of any bank be received in payment of any debt due to the United States, which shall, after the said fourth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, issue any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars."

This provision of the law of 1836, was inserted in furtherance of a policy some years since adopted by congress, as will be seen by the 8th section of the proposed recharter of the Bank of the United States of the year of 1832, which reserved to congress the power, from and after the 3d of March, 1836, to prohibit that institution from issuing or circulating notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. That act did not become a law, but this feature of it met the approbation of the two houses of congress, while the objections of the then president to the bill made no mention of this provision as exceptionable in his mind. On the contrary, his whole policy, and all his recommendations in relation to the currency, after that date, and especially after the time when the power could have been exercised, favored the policy of this limitation. Various legislation of congress in the year 1836, distinctly indicated a determination to adhere to, and carry out the policy, and by limiting the circulation of bank notes of the smaller denominations, to secure a currency of coin only for the minor transactions of business, for the payment of day laborers, for the change required in pecuniary dealings and the like; and in this way, also to give a more broad metallic basis to our whole paper circulation. Many of the states of the union fell into the policy thus adopted and pursued by this government, and conformed their legislation to the object proposed. It seemed to be universally conceded that these two objects could only be secured by the exclusion of small bank notes from ordinary circulation; and all adopted the policy as wise, and worthy of pursuit. The powers of this government could effect little, as the paper circulation to be suppressed was that of the notes of banks existing by, and acting under state authority; but what it could do, was proposed to be done by the provision of the deposit law above quoted. As a more direct, and much more efficient movement, a very general and vigorous effort was made by the states and the people to exclude from circulation bank notes of a less denomination than five dollars; and several states, whose banks had, theretofore, been authorized to issue notes of the denominations of one, two, and three dollars, took from them that authority, while the banks of several other states had either never possessed that authority, or had been deprived of it at a previous period. The progress in this attempted reform of the currency was materially retarded by the fact that all the states did not enter into, and act upon it, so as to restrain the issues of small notes by their banks, and that the banks of the British provinces upon our northwestern boundary continued to issue small notes, which found a more or less extended circulation in the contiguous states of the union. Still the advance towards an entire metallic circulation for all sums below five dollars was as rapid as, in the then situation of the country and the banks, could reasonably have been expected; and additional states were taking measures for the gradual exclusion of the small notes of their banks, when the suspension of specie payments, with very few exceptions, by all the banks of all the states, in May, 1837, arrested the salutary improvement.

The suspension was, to every practical extent perfect. The banks, as a general rule, did not pay specie upon any denomination of their notes, or to any class of their creditors. An unavoidable consequence followed. All the coin in circulation, the most of which had been put in circulation by the policy and measures before adverted to, was either gathered into the banks, not to be again given out for the circulating currency of the country, or was hoarded by private holders, to whose minds the suspension had communicated a feeling allied to panic, inclining them to treasure up all they had which was money, precisely in proportion to the diminution of their confidence in the value of that circulating medium which had, therefore, represented money, but could not do so during the continuance of the entire suspension of specie payments by the banks. Hence, either an absence of any medium for business transactions under five dollars, or the worst of all media which an enlightened public feeling could tolerate, soon became, in many sections of the union, an evil of the first magnitude, and one against which the interference of the state legislatures was commandingly invoked. In obedience to calls of this description from a suffering constituency, the legislatures of several of the states, which had adopted and prosecuted the policy of substituting the circulation of coin for that of small bank notes in the minor pecuniary transactions of society, felt it to be their duty to retrograde in their action, and again to confer upon their banking institutions the power to issue, and the right to circulate, notes of the denominations below five dollars. In some cases this change of policy, in the action of the states, has been made general and unlimited; while in others, as the committee think more wisely and fortunately, it has been made temporary, and adopted with an evident design, not to abandon the policy, but to meet the particular grievance, and, that being obviated, to return to those sound measures which, as permanent regulations of law, cannot fail to have a most salutary influence upon our currency generally, and especially upon the interest of the poorer, and by far the most numerous classes, in its soundness and reality.

Still the committee suppose that nearly all the banks in many entire states have, in obedience to, and in conformity with, this change of policy in the legislative action of the states under whose authority they exist, violated the restriction imposed by the clause of the deposite law of 1836 last, above quoted, and thus put it out of the power of the fiscal officers of this government to receive any of their notes in any payment to the United States while that restriction remains in force, and without modification. Under such circumstances, the committee are not prepared to say that this provision should be so rigidly adhered to as to perpetuate the exclusion of the notes of these banks from the public receipts, while the notes of other banks, no more safe, are received. Such a rule would not aid the policy which the committee earnestly advocate of giving greater stability to our paper circulation, but would merely establish an invidious discrimination between the different local banking institutions, founded, so far as they can discover, upon no defensible principle. Had these violations of the restriction imposed by the deposite law been entirely voluntary on the part of the banks; had no suspension of specie payments, and no consequent derangement of the whole paper currency, intervened; and, even under these pressing inducements, had not the interference of the legislatures of the states authorized the violations, and, in some cases, at least, rendered the issue of the small notes almost, if not altogether, a duty in the estimation of the surrounding community, the committee would be the last persons to suggest even, much less to recommend, the remission of the penalty which this law of congress imposes upon the act.

After what has been said, it will not be expected that the committee will yield to "the expediency of repealing those provisions of the said act which prohibit the receipt in payment of debts and dues to the United States of the bills of all banks which issue bills of less denomination than five dollars." This would be to yield the sound and salutary policy which the provisions were designed to carry out; one of the last things, in the administration of the affairs of this government, which the committee are disposed to surrender. While the benefits of a sound and stable currency are so loudly demanded by all parties and all interests, and while the committee know and feel that a greater infusion of coin into the circulating medium of the country is the safest mode of reaching that great and good result, they cannot become parties, much less agents, in a course of legislation which shall surrender the first step towards a consummation so ardently desired by all. They, therefore, give their opinion against a repeal of this provision.

It remains to consider what modification can properly be adopted to meet the case, and not weaken the great principle contended for. That, in the opinion of the committee, is a proposition of easy solution. The legislation of several of the states, to which reference has been made, furnishes a precedent which congress can safely follow. A postponement, so far, of the operative limitation of the provision, as to relieve the banks from the exclusion caused by former violations; the fixing of another day, beyond which, if they shall again cease to issue notes below the denomination of five dollars, their notes may be received in payment of the public dues, will effectually cure the evil complained of; place the excluded banks, so far as the legislation of congress is concerned, upon the same footing with their neighbor institutions, and preserve the policy of the law, in no other respect impaired than as to the time when that policy shall become practice.

The committee cannot, in justice to their own feelings, fail here to notice that many of the excluded banks have been among the first in the country to resume specie payments; that their issue of notes under the denomination of five dollars was a measure believed, not by those interested in the banks simply, but by the community within which they are located, to be in direct aid of a speedy resumption by the institutions which made the issues; and that the effect of those issues, under the circumstances of the case, and in the then condition of the currency, is still thought to have been salutary upon all interests, public and private. These are circumstances, which, as it seems to the committee, cannot escape the attention of congress in deciding upon the propriety of the suggested modification of this provision of the deposite law of 1836.

Still the question is one connecting itself with the general subject of legislation, covered by the bill upon which, as has been before remarked, the senate has acted, during its present session, and which bill has been, long since, sent to the house of representatives for the concurrence of that body. When that bill shall be acted upon, the committee believe that an amendment, to the effect they have suggested, will be proper and expedient; and as they have abundant evidence that the attention of that body has been repeatedly and expressly called to this particular point, they have no reason to doubt that it will receive the required modification there, in case the judgment of the house, upon the propriety of its adoption, shall agree with that which the committee entertain and express.

They believe it, therefore, inexpedient that any independent proposition to accomplish this object should, at the present time, be originated in, or acted upon by, the senate. Should the bill referred to be rejected by the house, or should it be returned to the senate without the amendment suggested, in either case the modification may be originated, and passed as an independent bill, without material consumption of time, in relation to the business of this body, while its adoption by the other, in the manner here suggested, will save the time and forms of independent legislative action. For these reasons the committee return the resolution to the senate, without any proposition for the present action of the body upon any one of its suggestions.

SPEECH OF JUDGE WHITE

Upon the bill reported by the committee on the judiciary, to prevent the issuing and circulation of the bills, notes, and securities, of corporations created by congress which have expired, &c. Delivered in the senate of the United States, April 20, 1838.

MR. PRESIDENT: I do not wish that the reasons for the vote which I intend to give on this bill should be misunderstood, therefore, I now address you.

The evil to be remedied by its passage is the re-issuing the notes of the late bank of the United States, chartered by congress in 1816. The penalty to be inflicted is that of fine and imprisonment. I deny that congress has the power to pass such a bill.

Let us examine, for a moment, the principles contended for by its friends. 1st. my honorable colleague has deduced the power from the 2d section of the 2d article of the constitution, which says, that the courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction in all cases arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, &c.

This clause was never intended to designate the cases in which congress should legislate, but the cases which the judiciary might decide.

All cases in which we legislate, whether we have the constitutional power or not, the judiciary may have cognizance of. If, because the judiciary have this jurisdiction in all cases, congress may also legislate in all cases, there is an end of all limitation to the powers of the federal government.

This is a more extravagant claim of power than I have ever known to be set up by any class of politicians.

2d. His next recourse is to that clause in the constitution which gives to congress the power "to coin money and to regulate the value of it," &c.

From this clause he has argued that congress has the whole power over the coin, and, if these notes are permitted to circulate, they will put out of circulation an equal amount of coin, therefore congress has the power to legislate them out of circulation. I deny the soundness of this argument.

It is true congress has the sole power over the coin, but it is not true that they have, on that account, absolute power over all credits which the states or the people may choose to circulate as substitutes for coin. They cannot pass any law which will make it unlawful for one man to circulate the promissory negotiable note of another, as a substitute for coin. Nor can they prohibit the circulation of notes issued by banks chartered by any of the states.

The circulation of checks or notes on state banks displaces specie to the same amount, and if this argument of my colleague were sound, this whole circulation could, at any time, be prohibited by congress.

This claim of power is, in itself, so extravagant, that few have heretofore ventured to assert it. In my opinion, it comes with a bad grace from those claiming to be states right men, or republicans of the Jeffersonian school.

3d. His last resource, to establish this power, is a recurrence to that clause in the constitution which gives congress the power to pass all laws, necessary and proper, to carry into effect any of the powers before vested in them.

This argument of my colleague carries us back, and places us upon the broad old federal doctrine, "that congress may do any thing which they believe is for the general welfare."

The republican doctrine is, that this clause in the constitution, instead of vesting in congress any power on any new subject, was intended as a limitation upon powers already granted. Without this clause, congress would have been compelled, in many cases, to take power by implication, or by construction, otherwise they could not attain many of the objects over which express powers to legislate had been granted to them. To cut off all pretence for assuming powers by implication, this clause was inserted, and express power conferred to pass all laws necessary and proper to give effect to the attainment of those objects, in relation to which express powers had been granted.

I cannot but think, that he who now insists on the reverse, and still calls himself a republican of the Jeffersonian school, mistakes the class of politicians to which he belongs. Certain I am, he and I do not belong to the same class, because I will not take from this clause the power to act on any new or independent subject whatever. I can only take power from it to use the means necessary and appropriate to effectuate some object, in relation to which an express power to legislate is given.

The honorable senator from New Jersey, who addressed us yesterday, has had recourse to judicial determinations, to prove that congress possesses the power to pass this bill.

It appeared to me that those authorities only went to establish, that where congress has the power to create an institution, they have the power to regulate it or to destroy it.

If this doctrine is sound, the argument leaves me exactly where it found me, because I am one of that unfortunate class of politicians who do not believe congress had the power to create this corporation.

The honorable senator from Alabama, farthest from me, Mr. Clay, supposes we have the power to pass this bill, because the notes thus improperly put in circulation, the United States are morally bound to pay.

I deny that the United States ever were, or ever can be, either legally or morally bound to pay a single note issued by that bank.

The bank was called by our name, we were stockholders to the amount of seven millions of dollars, and we were no farther bound to the payment of the debts of that bank than any individual owning the same amount of stock, and the very moment we sold the stock we were not interested in the bank to the amount of one cent.

The cases put by the senator to illustrate his argument, prove that the name of this bank has misled him.

He says, if a man forges a note or obligation upon the treasurer of the United States, he could be punished for forgery, &c.

Suppose I yield that he could, why would he be thus punishable by an act of congress? It would be because the treasurer is an officer of the United States, and because, if the forged note or obligation were genuine, the United States must pay the money out of the treasury.

The persons this bill intends to punish, are not our officers, our agents, or our trustees; nor are the United States, either legally or morally, bound to pay one dollar to redeem these notes.

The notes, if re-issued, are thus dealt with, by the officers, the agents, or trustees of the bank, in which we have no interest whatever, the United States having sold the whole amount of their stock to the bank chartered by Pennsylvania.

I think if the honorable senator will reconsider the opinions he has advanced, and give them an application to the facts as they really exist, he will be satisfied he is maintaining a doctrine too extravagant to be seriously insisted on by any one.

The argument of the honorable senator from Connecticut, Mr. Niles, is by far more plausible than any thing I have heard.

It is this in substance, that we cannot now inquire whether congress had the power to charter this bank or not. It was chartered, these notes were made in virtue of a power conferred by the charter, and it is our duty to see that society is not defrauded by means of our creation.

If there were no other means of checking the mischief but by our legislation, the necessity of the case would make a man strain hard to find some source from which he could have power to compel those who are trustees to cancel those notes as fast as they are lifted by them.

But there is no sort of necessity for our legislation to check this mischief.

How are the facts?

By the charter of 1816, the bank had twenty years, within which to do business; they expired on the 3d March, 1836. The bank was to have two additional years within which to wind up its concerns; they expired the 3d of March, 1838.

Before the expiration of the twenty years the state of Pennsylvania gave to the stockholders, with the exception of the United States, a new charter, and the old stockholders transferred to this new bank all their funds in trust to wind up their concerns; in other words, in trust to collect all debts due to the old bank, and to pay all the debts it owed.

Now I am very clear in the opinion that whenever the trustee, with the funds of the old bank, lifted any of its notes, it was a duty to cancel them, and if, instead of doing so, the trustee re-issued them, it was a breach of trust, and upon an application to a court of chancery, by any one having an interest, I have no doubt a decree would be made to restrain the re-issue, and to compel the trustee to cancel the notes as fast as lifted with the trust funds.

Where then is the necessity for congress to exert the power to check a mischief for which there is a clear, unembarrassed, and adequate remedy? There can be none as I think. There certainly is none to protect any interest of the United States. They never had any interest in this new bank, and they have none in the old, because under an act of congress our seven millions of stock were sold to the new bank, receipted for, and as fast as the instalments have fallen due, according to the contract, they have been punctually paid.

There, therefore, as it seems to me, can be no necessity or propriety in deriving the power claimed from the necessity of the case, and there is the more danger in deriving any power from such a source, because every honest mind is easily misled by it, as the exercise of the power is to attain an object honest and praiseworthy.

But, Mr. President, are not all those who assume this ground, and think we have no power to charter a bank, assuming a most dangerous and deceptive ground?

I cannot but think so, and with great deference I say, it has appeared to me, we are likely to commit error by not separating in our minds things which ought to be kept distinct.

The new bank and the old bear the same name. The stockholders, with the exception of the United States, are the same in both banks. The principal officers in the old are the prominent officers in the new. Hence I have thought we are inclined to view the officers in this state bank as our officers, exercising an authority derived from the United States, when in truth and in fact they derive their power and authority under a state law, and are neither our officers, our trustees, nor our agents. Their whole power and authority over the affairs of the old bank are derived from the contract between the old and new banks, by which the latter became the trustee of the former.

Is it possible that congress can derive any power to legislate on this point on the ground of this contract?

Suppose Pennsylvania had never granted this new charter, and the stockholders of the old bank had made just such a contract with the bank of Virginia in virtue of which this latter bank became the trustee, and there was an allegation that this trustee was re-issuing some of the notes instead of cancelling them. Is any gentleman prepared to maintain that congress could pass a law to send the trustee to jail, or to have him mulcted in a fine?

Upon principle there is no distinction between the cases.

This claim of power rests upon the ground that as we inferred the power to create the bank, when in truth we had no such power, we may assume any other power we choose to check our own mischief.

I deny this doctrine entirely, and insist that by our own legislation we can never enlarge our own powers.

Here we have created a bank. Will any gentleman affirm that an express power to charter a bank is given in the constitution? No gentleman can so allege. Even those who claim such a power for congress have never pretended there is any express grant of power. All agree it is a power that must be inferred for the sake of carrying out some other express grant of power.

Some have said we have express power to lay and collect taxes, and a bank is necessary as a fiscal agent.

Others that we have a power to coin money, and therefore congress has power over the whole currency, and to keep that sound, a bank is essential.

While those who deny any such power have denominated it "a vagrant, crawling over the constitution in search of a soft place on which to make a comfortable settlement."

If we pass this bill, in my judgment, we first assume, by implication, that congress had the power to charter the bank, and then we infer that congress can impose whatever pains and penalties it pleases, even unto death, to compel the cancelling of the notes.

These powers, I think, we do not possess, and, therefore, I will not exercise them. I will adhere to what I think the old republican doctrine:

1st. Shew an express grant of power to do the principal matter, and then

2d. That the means you wish to employ are the necessary and proper means to be used, and I am ready to act; if I doubt, reasonably, I ought not to act.

Is there any gentleman who hears me can say there is no reasonable doubt in this case?

After all, if we pass this bill, how is any one to find out what notes were re-issued? There will be no mark put upon them.

We can only believe some have been re-issued, because we see, at an after day, more are in circulation than there were on a former one: but what identical notes they were, society can have no means of knowing.

I now have one or two in my pocket, but I have no knowledge when or how they were put in circulation, nor had I any means of ascertaining. All I know is that they came to my hands fairly.

Other gentlemen, who condemn my rule of construing the constitution, may find a satisfactory source from which to derive their power to pass this bill; if so, let them pass it. All I wish, is, that the principles, on which I act, may be understood.

Mr. President: I might here close my remarks, because I have said all that I intend to say immediately applicable to the bill before us, but my honorable colleague, in opening this discussion, allowed himself such a latitude, that I feel it my duty, to those absent as well as to those present, to touch upon some other topics, which, at some time, it will be my duty to notice, and perhaps there may never be a more fit occasion than the present.

Let no one suppose I am about to make any observations upon the letter of Mr. Biddle to Mr. Adams, which has been the subject of so many remarks from my colleague.

Whether the views presented in that letter be sound or unsound; whether Mr. Biddle or my colleague is the best skilled in finance, or in the doctrine of currency; whether his letter be an attack on the administration or not; in short, whether his letter was prudent or imprudent, are matters with which I do not intend to intermeddle at this time.

Before I am done, I expect to shew, that what has been said by my colleague is the first open rupture, among those, who have once been on terms of intimacy, and all know how delicate an affair it is to interfere in such a case.

When the honorable senator from Missouri, Mr. Benton, addressed us the other day on the sub-treasury bill, he read us a letter which he had received from the late president of the United States for the sake of refuting the charge made against him, that he had once been friendly to the bank, and only wished to destroy it, because the directors of it would not use its influence to accomplish his political purposes. He at the same time told us he intended to incorporate it in his speech by publishing a copy of it. He has done so, and when I read his speech a few days since, and this letter, I was induced to believe that the writer had fallen into some errors which it was a duty to some of my constituents should be corrected.

I wish, before I proceed to what I have to say on this subject, to state that I am not one of those who ever stated that the author of this letter has ever been friendly to the bank and became dissatisfied with it because it would not loan its influence to him. Nor do I now intend to make any accusation. My purpose is a very different one.

The letter is dated "29th November, 1837," and its author in the second paragraph says, "When the 'aristocratic few,' at Nashville first made a movement to obtain a branch there, they were forestalled 'by a law of the legislature, imposing a heavy fine upon any bank that should attempt to do business within the limits of the state, without being first chartered by the legislature thereof. This provision had my cordial approbation, and prevented while it continued in force a location of the branch of the bank at Nashville, but it was afterwards repealed, &c.'"

This statement induced me to look into the documents appended to the committee's report at the session of 1834 and 1835 for two purposes.

1st. To see when the citizens of Nashville first applied for the establishment of a branch at that place, and

2d. To see who were the applicants, denominated the "aristocratic few."

I find by the senate doc. vol. 2, page 226, the first application is dated at Nashville, west Tennessee, July 18th, 1817, and is signed by upwards of sixty persons.

On the 3d day of October, in the same year, this application is pressed in a letter of William Carroll, afterwards governor, addressed to the president of the bank.

The act passed by the legislature of the state, taxing a branch, if brought there, was not passed till the 22d day of November, 1817.—Vide same volume, page 239.

If the writer of this letter, therefore intended to be understood as saying, that when the first application for a branch was made, there was a law of the state which forestalled them, the statement is erroneous; there was no such law for upwards of four months afterwards. In putting an estimate upon the character of any members of a community, I think it ought to make a great difference, whether their application was made for the doing that which is in violation of law, or of that which the law did not prohibit.

When a man has such a weight of character as the writer of this letter, what he says of others, especially his acquaintances and neighbours, has an influence throughout the whole country, and I do not think be ought to indulge in statements that may affect their reputation without the strictest regard to accuracy. Again. These applicants are called "the aristocratic few."

Mr. President, you have heard the speech of my colleague, in the course of which he has given an account of his political creed. Whose name do you think is to be found on this aristocratic list.

Strange as you, or the senate may think of it, it is nevertheless true, that his name is the very first on the list, and is succeeded by those of Robert Weakly, Thomas Claiborne, John C. McLemore, Alfred Balch and William Carroll, with many others; some of whom are men of the first respectability and standing.

Now, sir, I should certainly have thought those, whose names I have mentioned would have been the last men he would have called by such a name. If the writer of that letter has any friends left him upon earth, I should think on the 29th November last he would have considered those gentlemen as falling within that class. Politically they seem to have made it a point to think with him and, for the last few years in all things, to act according to his will.

They may, in fact, be said to live and move and have in him their political being. Although I do not profess to have at this time any particular regard for any one of those whose names I have mentioned, yet I must say I do not think it correct to denominate any one of them "an aristocrat;" one who would be willing to take all power from the many, and give it to the few, on the ground that they were better born, or more wealthy than their neighbours.

They and I differ about many things, but I should not like soberly to denominate them federalists even; and if compelled to give any opinion, I could only, in truth, say, that I did not know they had any particular politics.

Others whose names I have not mentioned, will be found on that list, who are men of the first respectability, and who would struggle as hard for an equality of rights as any men in any community, and are as much entitled to the reputation of republicans as any of my constituents.

The distinguished author of the letter, in a subsequent part of it, proceeds to speak of the repeal of the act of 1817, and of the visit of general Cadwallader after such repeal, with a view to the establishment of a branch at Nashville, and says: "Some short period after the visit of general Cadwallader, when the branch was established, a recommendation for the appointment of two gentlemen to fill the places of its president and cashier was shewn to me, with request that I should state my knowledge of the character of these two gentlemen. The bank being established and the people liable to be cursed with all its attendant evils I expressed my confidence in the two gentlemen referred to, believing them to be honest, and that as far as they had control over the institution it would not be wielded for corrupt political purposes. This recommendation I have been informed has been used to prove my approbation of this bank, &c."

The whole point in this matter rests upon the time at which the recommendation was made. The author says, it was after the repeal of the act of 1817, after Mr. Cadwallader's visit, and after the establishment of the branch!

This statement is founded in error. The act was repealed Nov. 25th, 1826. General Cadwallader's visit was after that, and the establishment of the branch still later.

This recommendation on the very face of it, must satisfy every person that it was given before the repeal of the law, not afterwards. It sets out with saying it is given in anticipation of the establishment of a branch.

It recommends Robert Searey, as president, who, I think, was dead before the repeal of the law; it is signed officially as "major general southern division." It is his recommendation, in company with several devoted friends of the bank, each with all the addition to his name which truth would warrant.

In 1826 the author of this letter was not major general. He had ceased to be so long before. Had been governor of Florida, senator in congress, and candidate for president. The recommendation, although not dated, was undoubtedly about the year 1818 or 1819 as I should think, and at the very time the struggle was going on between the friends of the bank and the advocates of the state law.

[Here Mr. White read the following document and proceeded.]

"To the President of the U. S. Bank, Philadelphia.

The undersigned, in anticipation of the location at this place of a branch of the United States Bank, take this method of recommending to your consideration persons qualified for the direction of the same, viz: president and cashier. From a long and intimate knowledge of the public and private character of major Robert Searey, the present acting paymaster for west Tennessee we feel no hesitation in naming him as a person who would give general satisfaction as president of so important an institution; and from the numerous services rendered by this gentleman both in a civil and military capacity, we think him entitled to a large portion of public patronage, in addition to what the undersigned, can testify, his services and capacity are well known, and no doubt duly appreciated by the heads of department at Washington city."

"For cashier, we beg leave to name John Somerville, who is at this time cashier of the state bank at Nashville. This gentleman is known to some of your honorable body as a person qualified for the duties of this appointment, his integrity has been long tried and approved, and we feel no hesitation in recommending him to you as one who, in receiving the appointment of cashier, would unite the approbation of his fellow citizens."

JOHN MCNEIRY, federal judge.

ANDREW JACKSON, maj gen'l southern division.

ROBERT BUTLER, adj't. gen'l. do

R. WEAKLY,

citizen and former member of congress.

J. W. OVERTON, at'g. and former supervisor and sup. judge.

JOHN COFFEE, brigadier gen'l. late war.

JAMES JACKSON, merchant and president branch bank at Nashville.

J. WHARTON, formerly senator in congress.

JOHN P. ERWIN, merchant."

Whether he was at that time the friend or opponent of the bank I do not know, but one thing seems pretty evident that so far as this recommendation would go, it is well calculated to throw his weight against those then struggling to maintain the law of the state against the influence of the bank and its friends.

Mr. President, I will soon prove to the satisfaction of the senate, that the struggle was no trifling affair.

The act prohibiting the branch, as we have seen, passed on the 22d Nov. 1817; the news soon spread; a town meeting was called in Nashville on the 31st January following; the proceedings are not lengthy; I will read them to shew what was done and by whom.

"At a public meeting of the citizens of Davidson county, and the adjoining counties, at the court house in the town of Nashville, on Saturday, the 31st day of January, instant, pursuant to notice given in the Clarion,

"The honorable Jesse Wharton was appointed chairman, and O. B. Hayes secretary.

"Mr. Grundy rose and stated the object of the meeting, and presented the following resolutions, which, after some discussion, were unanimously adopted, with the exception of one or two votes on the first and last resolutions.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the late law passed by the legislature of this state, in taxing banks to be established in this state by an authority other than the laws of this state, while the banks established by the authority of the state are not taxed, is impolitic and unconstitutional.

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the establishment of a branch of the United States Bank at this place, would be beneficial to the institution, grateful to the people, useful in its operation, and greatly conducive to the prosperity and best interests of Tennessee.

"Resolved, That a committee of seven persons be appointed by the chairman, respectfully to address the president and directors of the Bank of the United States, on this interesting and important subject, and request the immediate establishment of a branch of that institution at this place.

"Whereupon, the chairman appointed F. Grundy, O. B. Hayes, John P. Erwin, George W. Gibbs, J. Whiteside, A. Balch, and A. Hynes, a committee for the above purpose.

Test: O. B. HAYES, Secretary."

[Here Mr. White having read the proceedings and resolutions proceeded to say.]

Thus the senate will see my colleague again foremost; proposer of the resolutions, and first among the debaters.

The proceedings I should think are not very marked in favor of state rights, still they are decorous, and contain such an expression of opinion as freemen had a right to make.

In pursuance of these resolutions a committee was appointed to forward the proceedings to the president and directors in Philadelphia accompanied by an address.

At the head of that committee we again find my honorable colleague, and let us see what language he thought fit to employ there against those opposed to this bank.

[Here Mr. White read the address and proceeded.]

Town meeting and letter of committee of Nashville. "Nashville, January 31, 1818.

"Gentlemen: Enclosed we transmit you a copy of the resolutions this day adopted by the citizens of this vicinity, in relation to the establishment of a branch of the national bank at this place.

"From the spirit of these resolutions, you will perceive the correct view which the people of this country have taken of the act of the late legislature of this state, intended virtually to prevent the operation of this bank in Tennessee; and permit us to assure you, that this is the general sentiment of the citizens of this state, so far as we have been able to ascertain the same.

"In making the statement to you, we are influenced by what we believe a duty we owe to the character of Tennessee. For she has not been less uniform in her political principles, and inviolable attachment to the general government, than distinguished for her alacrity and prowess, in defending the honor of the union. And lest persons at a distance should suppose from her legislature having inconsiderately raised the arm of hostility against a great fiscal establishment of the general government, that her character was not to be confided in, we seize with pleasure every opportunity to show to the world that such conclusion is erroneous.

"We beg leave to assure you that no point could be selected, in our opinion, where a larger profit could be divided from a branch, with the capital of about a million of dollars; and that no section of the union so much requires a circulating medium, in which society has confidence. But we forbear entering into a detail of the various facts and causes which lead to such an opinion, because we know that the course of trade, the wealth, and the great natural resources of Tennessee, are well known to many gentlemen of Philadelphia.

"We cannot close this address without making a tender of acknowledgments for ourselves, and in behalf of the citizens by whom we were selected to address you upon this subject, for the great liberality you have manifested in considering our application heretofore, after the legislature had passed this extraordinary act; and we hope the object will be attained so soon as is consistent with the interest of the institution.

"We wish you to receive as an apology for the trouble we give you, the lively interest felt by the citizens of this quarter of the country upon this subject.

"Accept, gentlemen, the assurances of our high respect,

FELIX GRUNDY,

O. B. HAYES,

ANDREW HYNES,

JOHN P. ERWIN,

G. W. GIBBS,

ALFRED BALCH,

I. WHITESIDE.

"To the president and directors of the United States bank."

Here an assurance is given to strangers deeply interested in this matter that the statements expressed by the meeting were the sentiments entertained by a majority of the people of Tennessee.

Now I should have disliked to have made such a statement. So far from being true, public sentiment then was, and continued for eight years most decidedly the other way, and never could be changed until the directors of the Nashville bank let it go down in 1826, when the legislature was in session; and under the influence of the embarrassment that must follow, the legislature, very reluctantly repealed the act of 1817.

Of all this Mr. President, I should not have felt that there was much cause to complain, but you must have noticed in the address as I read it, the vindication of my colleague and his committee of the people of Tennessee, the effort to keep their fame from being tarnished by the foul act of the legislature.

As she had been faithful to the union in war, my honorable colleague undertakes to preserve her character from suspicion of treason in time of peace.

Now what offence had the legislature committed? They had imposed a heavy tax if a branch was sent there. This law had passed unanimously or nearly so, and with the exception of one man, that assembly was composed of men as well informed as are commonly to be met with, and although they may have mistaken their powers, or the interests of their constituents; yet I am sure their motives were good. For this offence they were stigmatized to strangers as persons unfriendly to the union, and as persons whose conduct was calculated to destroy the character of their state.

Mr. President, who would have thought that the author of that address was the same person, who so furiously and fearlessly, the other day, declared war against Mr. Biddle and his bank? Yes, sir, "war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt."

It is nevertheless true it is my honorable colleague, who figures in, both the address and the speech.

He has now as he states taken the field for the administration against the bank; and although he will not long have the power of speaking in this chamber, yet he will be busy at home, in arguing and supplicating the people against this bank. Now I do hope, after all this parade, that my honorable colleague and his associates at home, may not turn out to be a corps of Swiss troops, and desert unless they get prompt pay and double rations. I beseech him and them for the credit of our common state to act the part of disinterested patriots for once.

Still I am not without my doubts, at all events as to some of them. I see in a document laid on my table, a few hours since, the copy of a letter from one of the corps, giving notice to the administration that he will be here for his pay, in the spring, by the coming of grass.

I must detain the senate while I read one more document from this same book. It is a letter dated 14th February, 1818, and found in the same volume of documents at p. 231.

"Nashville, February 14, 1818.

"Dear sir: From a knowledge that some acquaintance must have been formed between you and myself at Washington, many of my neighbors have frequently solicited me to forward to you a list of the names of fit persons, to whom to confide the management of a branch bank of the United States at this place. I have heretofore declined it, nor should I at any time have said any thing on the subject, had it not been for the puerile attempt of our last legislature, to prevent an establishment of a branch here altogether. The motives which gave birth to that measure were selfish, the policy contracted, and the views of such men cannot be liberal and impartial. Any number, from seven to thirteen, might be selected from the following, and the choice could not be a bad one.

Jenkin Whitesides, Andrew Hynes, Randall McGavoch, John P. Erwin, Thomas H. Fletcher, James Stewart, Felix Robertson, Robert Weakley, Elihu S. Hall, Alfred Balch, William Carroll, Thomas Hill, George W. Gibbs, Robert C. Foster, Samuel Telford.

"Those printed in italics are merchants; the others, substantial freeholders, and men of intelligence. A board of managers selected from them would, in my opinion, conduct the affairs of the institution with ability and integrity. Although you and the directors have a discretion as to number, between seven and thirteen, I would submit to you the propriety of the largest number. It may have an effect in keeping down that spirit of opposition which has hitherto manifested itself.

"In naming the persons above mentioned, I have endeavored to combine commercial and legal knowledge, nor have I been inattentive to their standing in society here. I will name another subject, respecting which I have not been requested to write; that is, who should be cashier? If any person here is appointed, it should be John Somerville. Should this be the case, some person of experience in your manner of doing business, should be sent on to put him in the way of conducting the business, upon the principles you act on, or he should visit Philadelphia in person to acquire that knowledge. Mr. Somerville has a knowledge of men and things here, which would be very advantageous; and knows the duties of a cashier better than any person in this quarter.

"I have no fears that any attempt will be made to enforce the Tennessee law. Should there be, it will be revisited with effect here; no concern need be felt on that subject. Should there be no impropriety in it, I should like to know when you will put the institution in operation here? and it would seem to me, that some persons should be authorized before hand to provide a house, &c. You will excuse me for the freedom of my suggestions. If unnecessary, they are harmless.

"Your obedient servant,

FELIX GRUNDY."

"Wm. Jones, Esq., president of the United States Bank, Philadelphia.

"P. S. Although this is addressed to you only, I have no objections to its being seen by any of the directors. F. G."

[After having read the letter, except the name of the author Mr. White proceeded.]

Mr. President, this letter was a secret one, addressed to the president in Philadelphia, intended for himself and his directors only. It directly impugns the motives, and speaks contemptuously of the character and standing of the whole general assembly of the state.

It gives a list of names for directors of the branch, and concludes with a threat of revisiting ill upon the heads of those, who may dare to attempt enforcing the state law.

This letter was written in 1818, it remained a secret in the hands, and for the guidance of, a directory of a powerful monied institution from the time of its receipt, till 1835, without any one of those calumniated in it, having any suspicion that among their acquaintances, there could be found a man, capable of thus stubbing their reputation in the dark. It was brought to light by the investigating committee, and from the time I have first seen it, until, now, I have never been able to think favourably of its author, or to have any confidence in him, and now Mr. President, you are ready to ask, who was the author?

I tell you said Mr. White, throwing down the book, from which he had read the letter, it was none other than my honorable colleague.

The man who could thus treat me, might deceive me once, but he never will a second time, unless, perchance, he should hereafter do some act, which comports with the character of an honorable man.

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

June 9. Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose and said that he wished to present two petitions in behalf of the establishment of a new bank of the United States. They professed to be petitions from persons of all political parties that exist in the country; from men of business—men who had felt, in the transaction of their business, the great inconvenience of the want of a uniform currency, particularly as connected with the trade with the south, which had become greatly embarrassed, and especially so between Connecticut and the south. As these petitions were pretty much in the same language with others which Mr. C. had presented, and as favorable action on this subject by congress, as congress now was, was utterly unattainable, Mr. C. thought it useless to say or do more, at this time, than to ask that the petitions be received and laid on the table, as their being in the same language with others rendered it not worth while to take the trouble of printing them. In regard to the political character which they claimed, there were marks upon them by which senators might know whether they came from men of all political parties.

The petitions were accordingly laid on the table.

Mr. Lyon presented a petition asking such a change in the post office law as to allow newspapers to circulate postage free in the respective counties where they are published. Referred.

Messrs. Morris and Pierce, from the committee on pensions, reported a large number of private bills from the other house referred to them, the rejection of a considerable portion of which was recommended.

The resolution of inquiry, offered by Mr. Morris, in relation to ceding to the state of Ohio all the public lands within her boundaries, and to doing likewise with other states when in similar circumstances, was taken up, explained, and advocated by Mr. M., and agreed to.

The bill for the relief of Richard P. Banks was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the joint resolution in relation to certain books, &c. was referred to the committee on the judiciary.

On motion of Mr. White, (of which he had given previous notice, and which was prevented yesterday by the debate on the report of the committee on finance in relation to banks and bank notes,) the senate proceeded to spend the remainder of the day in executive business, with a view to the despatch of all such business having a reference to the appropriation bills; after which the senate adjourned.

June 11. Mr. Tipton, from the committee on roads and canals, reported bills referred to them for the construction of certain roads in Florida, and to confirm a certain act of the legislative council of Florida, without amendment, and recommending their passage.

The resolution offered by Mr. Lyon, calling on the president for further information in regard to the disturbances on the northern frontier, came up in its order.

Mr. Tullmidge remarked that, till more time had been given for the executive authorities of the two countries to settle the frontier difficulties between them, any information on the subject would not probably be acted on by congress, and the call for it would tend to inflame the public mind; it would do no good, and might do much mischief. He therefore moved that the resolution be laid on the table; which was done accordingly.

On motion of Mr. Fulton.

Resolved, That the secretary of war communicate to the senate any information which may have been recently received at the department, indicating a hostile disposition in the Indian tribes bordering on the Arkansas frontier.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the bill to encourage the introduction and promote the cultivation of tropical plants in the United States was considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A great number of private bills from the other house were read twice, and referred.

On motion of Mr. White, the committee on Indian affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Harriet Livermore.

On motion of Mr. White the senate proceeded to spend the remainder of the day in executive session; after which,

The senate adjourned.

June 12. Mr. Grundy rose and said that, before the senate should proceed to its ordinary business, he wished to consume a minute or two of its time on a subject in relation to which this was the first opportunity of speaking. Most of the speech of his colleague, which appeared in the Intelligencer of yesterday, he heard when it was delivered and, so far, had immediately replied to it. But the concluding remarks of that speech he did not hear, and, though informed of their import, he thought best to wait their publication before replying to them. [See page 247 for the speech alluded to.]

Mr. G. said he was not unmindful of what was due to himself and to the station which he occupied, and he would therefore briefly remark, that as to all the personal reference which his colleague had heaped upon him, he would throw them off with disdain and scorn—a feeling which he was sorry to say, was only reciprocated, though with less ill-will on his part towards his colleague. Mr. G. further expressed his satisfaction that his colleague was not the judge to whom his standing, prosperity, and welfare were committed; if it had been so, he would have considered them as lost.

Mr. White expressed his surprise that his colleague should require six weeks or two months to reply to his concluding remarks, and that he did not hear them, when he was both present at the time, and near Mr. W. Mr. W. also adverted to the fact that his colleague had made no attempt to controvert any thing which Mr. W. had said, which he insisted he could not do, as the evidence was altogether too decisive.

Mr. W. also made some further remarks, chiefly personal, and Mr. Grundy was in a course of reply, when the Vice President interfered, evidently in accordance with the general sense of the senate, and the two gentlemen acquiescing the conversation was dropped.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose and said, that he had received and desired to present to the senate another petition from certain persons in Connecticut, praying the establishment of a bank of the United States. It was not very numerously signed, but it was right that it should be heard. As it was pretty much in the language as a petition before presented, Mr. C. would not ask that it should be read or printed, but received, and laid upon the table.

While up, Mr. C. would say something in relation to some petitioners for a bank on a former occasion. He had supposed that a sense of justice would have induced the senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Niles,) after the names of those petitioners were printed, to state, in correction of certain allegations of his own, that those petitioners, as a mass, were highly respectable persons. Mr. C. had supposed that he would be prompt to make the amende honorable for his observations on that occasion. His not having done it, imposed on Mr. C. the duty which he had now undertaken.

The remarks of the senator at that time having been published, Mr. C. had received a letter from Hartford, Connecticut, which speaking of the petition, stated that it was signed by the governor, and various others in high standing in the community, by six present and past presidents of banks, by three presidents of insurance companies, and by other as respectable individuals as could any where be obtained for a petition sent to congress. The names of some of the strongest whigs were not on the petition, not because they were not in favor of it, but because they were not urged to sign it.

Mr. C. also stated that the names of these petitioners had been grossly misprinted by the printer to the senate, a variety of which he read, one of which, that is a fair sample of the whole, was "Harry Cumming" for the name of Henry Corning. This misprinting was calculated to mislead in regard to the true character of the petitioners. Mr. C. thought it due to the petitioners to bear this testimony in their behalf, and he did not believe that a more respectable body of petitioners could present themselves to this or any other body.

Mr. Niles, at some length, denied that he had said that the petitioners were not respectable. He had said that one of their statements was incorrect; but they were doubtless respectable, and if they had made a wrong statement, or pursued wrong measures, they were to blame, and not Mr. N., who declared that he had nothing to retract. They had thought proper to come here to deceive the senate, and to deceive the country, and they must take the consequences.

Mr. Clay expressed his inability to understand the senator, in holding that these petitioners were respectable, and at the same time charging them with the propagation of a deliberate untruth. But Mr. C. was satisfied that the senator himself was mistaken, in denying that that petition came from persons of both political parties. That it did so, Mr. C. had the most abundant evidence. On the petition which Mr. C. presented the other day, the political character of the petitioners was marked, and the first on the list was, or had very recently been, a particular friend of the honorable senator, and fighting for the support of his party.

Mr. Niles insisted that the fact of their having signed these petitions was ample proof that, whatever they were before, they had now changed their politics. He also made some further allegations derogatory to one or more of these alleged Van Buren petitioners.

The petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Webster presented a petition from merchants in the city of New Haven, Connecticut, (including all the importing merchants but one,) praying the repeal of that portion of the deposit act of 1836, which prohibits the receipt by the government of the notes of a denomination less than five dollars.

Also, another paper of the same character, in the form of resolutions, from the board of commissioners of the associated banks and its vicinity, and asking the same relief. On presenting these petitions, Mr. Webster said: the present state of things is truly singular. An effort for a general resumption of specie payments by the banks is making, and of about to be made, all over the country.

Some of the banks have resumed. But, now, sir, what is the attitude in which the government stands?

By the new specie circular it is proclaimed that specie or treasury notes will be required, unless debtors to government can procure notes of a specie-paying bank of the denomination of twenty dollars or upwards; which bank shall not have issued, or paid out, any note under five dollars, since July, 1836. No postmaster may receive any note less than twenty dollars.

This refusing to receive notes under twenty dollars is doubtless founded on the provision in the act of April, 1836, that no disbursing officer shall offer in payment any note less than twenty dollars.

I cannot say I think this part of the circular absolutely necessary, so long as the deposit system exists; but at the same time, the provision of the act of April countenances this regulation in some degree, if not entirely.

But taking this state of law and this circular together can it be said that government is encouraging resumption of specie payments, or facilitating the restoration of things to a state of prosperity? Is there, in the spirit of these regulations, any thing to remind us of the course of government, under similar circumstances, in the days of Mr. Dallas and Mr. Crawford?

In New England, as I believe, all the banks, with one or two exceptions, have issued or paid small bills since July, 1836. If there be more than one or two exceptions, I have not heard of them.

In New York, the legislature felt itself imperatively called upon to alter the law of the state, and authorize, at least for a time, the issue of small bills. The popular branch of the legislature was nearly unanimous for an unqualified repeal. The senate preferred a suspension, and a suspension was the final result.

It is admitted, I believe, on all hands, that this measure was called for by the people. It was not the result of any bank management, or of the operation of any private interests whatever. It was the result of a clear, loud, and irresistible demand of the public will. It cannot be charged to party, to management, or any thing but a universal conviction that the measure would be useful, and was necessary. Its beneficial effects are not doubted, I believe, by any body, in aiding the banks in the great work of resumption. Now, I suppose that all the banks in New York, with, perhaps, two or three exceptions in the city, have availed themselves of this suspension law, and have issued small bills. Their notes, therefore, cannot be received at the custom house, or the post office, or elsewhere, where debts to government are to be paid. I suppose the same state of things exists in New Jersey, and many other states, both Atlantic and western.

I have said on a former occasion, and I still think, that the measures pursued by government have overthrown, at least for the present, its own policy of discontinuing the use of small bills. A state of things has arisen in which the people of states which had begun to act on that policy have compelled their legislatures to give up the attempt for the present. In some instances the laws against small notes have been repealed; in others, modified or suspended. All this, I repeat, has been the work of the people themselves, acting directly on their own legislatures. Under existing circumstances, they find small bills useful, if not indispensable. And as there is no reason to doubt the solvency of the banks which issue such notes more than that of others, the question may be asked, as it is asked, with significance and effect by the committee of the associated banks in Boston, "why not put the notes of all specie-paying banks on the same ground?"

I think, sir, it is the duty of government, at the present important moment, to extend a large and liberal confidence to the banks, and to encourage their efforts, and assist their struggles for resumption by all proper means. To this end, I think the prohibition contained in the fifth section of the deposit law ought to be repealed, or suspended for a considerable time, and until circumstances shall favor a renewed attempt to sustain the policy heretofore pursued. I am not of opinion that it is not enough merely to abolish the incapacity, arising from what has been done, contrary to the provision of the statute. I think it necessary to provide that bank notes of specie-paying banks may hereafter be received, at least for some time, although the banks issuing them continue to issue small bills. Nothing short of this can give effectual relief. The banks cannot now, without great public inconvenience, again recall their small notes. The people will not consent that they should. This is a point, I believe, on which there is little difference of opinion in those states in which small notes are issued.

On the whole, my opinion is, that the best thing to be done, under all circumstances, is to repeal the prohibition, and to wait for a more favorable opportunity to establish the policy which it was intended to sustain. I hope we may see our way on this subject somewhat clearer some time hence than we now see it. If a repeal, however, be objected to, a suspension is indispensably necessary; and this suspension should be for such a length of time as will enable the banks and the public to adjust their concerns to the state of things which will then be before them. But if a suspension only be agreed to, and a day fixed when it shall expire, and especially if that day be a near one, the banks will be compelled immediately to begin to call in their bills, and the relief afforded, if it be any relief at all, will be crippled and ineffectual. Another pressure will commence, and a renewal of past troubles ensue. My opinion is, therefore, that, taking all circumstances into consideration, it is best to repeal the prohibition, and retain, of course, the power of renewing it when a state of things shall hereafter arise to justify such renewal.

For the same reasons, I think the second section of the act of April should also be repealed.

After some further remarks by Messrs. Hubbard, Webster, Buchanan, Preston, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, and Benton, to be given hereafter, the petitions were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Webster then, in pursuance of previous notice, asked leave to introduce the following: A bill making further provisions for the collection of the public revenues.

Be it enacted, &c. That the operation of so much of the act of June 23d, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," as prohibits the receipt of the notes or bills of specie-paying banks, which have issued since the 4th of March, 1836, notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be, and the same is hereby, suspended until further order of congress.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to select and employ as depositories of the public money, according to the provisions of said act, any banking institutions which may be established under the provisions of a law of the state in which it exists.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury hereafter to select and employ as depositories of the public money, according to the provisions of said act, any bank which shall redeem its notes and bills on demand and specie, notwithstanding it may have stopped specie payments since the date of the said act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the operation of the second section of the act of April 14, 1836, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States for the year 1836," be, and the same is hereby, suspended until further order of congress.

Leave was granted, the bill was introduced and read the first time, and, on the suggestion of Mr. Wright that it would be of no use to refer it, a report just having been made on the whole subject from the committee on finance, the bill was laid on the table, with the understanding that it would receive its second reading and come under the consideration of the senate to-morrow.

Messrs. Grundy, Norvell, Wall and Hubbard, reported various bills from committees referred to them.

Several committees were discharged from the consideration of subjects which had been referred to them, and a number of bills, which will be noticed in their further progress, were introduced on leave, read twice and referred. Several bills from the house were also read twice and referred.

Mr. Merrick asked leave to withdraw the papers of the executor of James Cook, of Maryland, as they were required as evidence in a court of chancery.

This being counter to a resolution of the senate, offered by Mr. Hubbard, and recently adopted, a conversation of some length ensued on the question of order, chiefly by the Vice President, Mr. Merrick, Mr. Hubbard, and Mr. Webster, which resulted in leave being granted to withdraw the papers; whereupon,

Mr. Hubbard offered a resolution, which lies over one day, making the resolution formerly offered by him, and prohibiting the withdrawal of original papers on private claims, one of the standing rules of the senate.

The Vice President presented a communication from the secretary of war, with a report from the colonel of ordnance, containing information in pursuance of the act of 1794 in reference to armories.

Also, from the secretary of state, respecting foreign vessels that have arrived in the various collection districts of the United States. Severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to encourage the introduction and cultivation of tropical plants in the United States was taken up, advocated by Messrs. Linn and Sevier, opposed by Messrs. Morris, Clay, of Alabama, Niles, and King, and ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benton, Buchanan, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin, McKean, Merrick, Mouton, Norvell, Preston, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, Webster, Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Clay, of Alabama, Hubbard, King, Morris, Niles, Pierce, Strange, Tipton, White, Williams—11.

The senate, after an executive session, adjourned. June 13. In addition to other business, which will be noticed hereafter, Mr. Webster gave notice that he should to-morrow morning call up Mr. Williams' motion for leave to bring in a bill for a joint British and American commission of exploration and survey, to determine on the north eastern bound-dary of the United States, in accordance with the treaty of 1793, which motion had, on Mr. W.'s desire, been laid on the table. Mr. W. gave this notice merely that senators might have before them the two maps of the country in question, recently printed by order of the senate, without which the details of the subject could not be well understood.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to set apart a belt of land on the western borders of Missouri and Arkansas, as bounty lands to be granted to settlers engaged for a term of years in the defence of the frontier.

The amount of land (estimated by Mr. Davis at more than 3,000,000 acres,) embraced by this bill, was to be granted to settlers who for the term of five years should be organized into companies, and held themselves in readiness to enter at any time into the service of the United States for the defence of the frontier.

The bill was explained and advocated at considerable length and with much earnestness by Messrs. Fulton, Linn, Clay, of Alabama, and Sevier, and opposed by Messrs. Strange, Davis, Morris, Niles, and Lumpkin.

The bill was rejected, on the question of its engrossment, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Benton, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Linn, Mouton, Nicholas, Pierce, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lumpkin, McKean, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Prentiss, Roane, Smith, of Connecticut, Southard, Strange, Tallmadge, Trotter, Wall, White, Williams, Wright, Young—28.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, June 8. In moving his resolution for an inquiry by the judiciary committee into the causes of the failure of the last term of the circuit court for the Louisiana District—

Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, explained the serious causes of the complaint which had existed in Louisiana for years with regard to the operations of the judicial system of the United States in that state. He stated that no business had yet been disposed of in the circuit court for that state; that the last term of the court had not been held in consequence of an arbitrary attempt of the district judge to remove the clerk of the district and circuit courts without cause. He had been informed, from the most respectable sources, that the clerk produced a letter from the district judges, stating that he had performed the duties of his office faithfully, methodically, promptly, and uprightly, and to the entire satisfaction of the bench, the bar, and the public, and that the only reason he had for removing him was, a desire to appoint an intimate friend in his place. On opening the circuit court, judge McKinley, of the supreme court, after the argument of counsel, gave an opinion that the district judge did not possess the power to remove the clerk without cause. Judge Lawrence still maintaining his right so to act, the question, it is understood, will be brought before the supreme court of the United States for final decision. In the mean time, neither the district nor circuit court of said state can be held for the want of a clerk. Consequently, the important business pending in the said courts will be suspended for a further period of, perhaps, twelve or eighteen months, and even for a much longer time, if the case should not be decided at the next term of the supreme court of the United States. Thus the mass of business in both courts is to be postponed, and the interests of the people sacrificed, because the district judge wishes to remove a clerk who is eminently qualified for the situation, and against whom he had no cause of complaint, with the view of bestowing the office on an intimate friend.

Mr. J. concluded by remarking that, if the facts to which he had referred are true, of which he had no doubt, he, as one of the representatives from the state of Louisiana, had no hesitation in saying that, in his opinion, the district judge should be impeached and dismissed from office.

[The resolution for inquiry was agreed to.]

The following were the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the bill providing for the removal of the treasury building:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Atherton, Banks, Beirne, Bicknell, Boon, Cambreleng, W. B. Campbell, John Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Cleveland, Clowney, Col. A. Connor, Craig, Crockett, Cushman, Davies, Deberry, Duncan, Elmore, Farrington, Fairfield, I. Fletcher, Fry, Gallup, J. Garland, W. Graham, Graves, Griffin, Haley, Halsted, Hammond, Harrison, Hawkins, Haynes, Herod, Holsey, Hubley, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, J. W. Jones, Keim, Kilgore, Klingensmith, Legare, Leadbetter, Logan, McKay, Abraham McClellan, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Murray, Noble, Owens, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikin, Phelps, Plumer, J. H. Prentiss, Rariden, Rencher, Shaffer, Aug. H. Shepperd, Shepler, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stone, Stratton, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Towns, Turney, Underwood, Vanderveer, Wagener, Weeks, Sherrod Williams, Jared W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Yell—89.

YAYS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Anderson, Beatty, Biddle, Boni, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, Chambers, Cheatham, Cray, Cushing, Darlington, Davee, Dennis, Dringgoole, Dunn, Edwards, Evans, Everett, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, Goode, Grantland, Grinnell, Hall, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Henry, Hoffman, Howard, J. Jackson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Kemble, Lincoln, Loomis, Marvin, S. Mason, Maxwell, Robert McClintan, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, M. Morris, Naylor, Noyes, Parker, Parmenter, Parris, Patterson, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Pratt, Randolph, Read, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Russell, C. Shepard, Sibley, Slade, Stuart, Tillinghast, Toland, Webster, A. S. White, J. White, E. Whittlesey, T. T. Whittlesey, Lewis Williams, J. L. Williams, Word, Yorke—82.

Saturday, June 9. Mr. Campbell, of Tennessee, gave notice of a motion to reconsider the decision of the house laying on the table the bill for removing the walls of the new treasury building.

Mr. Pope made an effort to have the bill to extend the pension bill of 1832, for surviving revolutionary officers and soldiers, made the special order for Friday next from 11 to 2 o'clock, but the motion failed.

A similar effort was made by Mr. Bond, in respect to the "bill to enlarge the provisions of the act entitled 'An act granting half-pay to widows or orphans where their husbands and fathers have died of the wounds received in the military service of the United States, in certain cases, and for other purposes,'" but with no better success.

A number of reports were made by committees, among them was the senate bill from the committee on the judiciary, without amendment, to amend "An act, more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the U. States, and for other purposes."

Mr. Cambreleng now pressed for the consideration of the motion to reconsider the decision on the treasury building bill, but it was agreed first to take up and dispose of the bills on the speaker's table. They were taken up accordingly. They were private bills, several of which were postponed, and others passed—but before they were all disposed of, the house adjourned.

Monday, June 11. The Chair called the states in order for resolutions, when the following, among others, were presented, agreed to, and otherwise disposed of.

On motion of Mr. Harper,

Resolved, That the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number of offices for the sale of public lands in the state of Ohio.

Mr. Harlan offered the following, which lies over:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform this house whether any portion of the duties which by law devolve on the secretary of the navy has been transferred to and performed by the secretary of war, and the reasons of the non-performance, (if such be the fact,) by the secretary of the navy, of any of the duties appertaining to his said office.

On motion of Mr. Williams,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for refunding to applicants the fees they may have paid for a reissue or modification of their patents, when they shall have failed to obtain the same.

On motion of Mr. Mercer,

Resolved, That the commissioner of the general land office be directed to report to this house what quantity of the land scrip would be required, in his judgment, for satisfying the outstanding military bounty land warrants granted by the commonwealth of Virginia.

On motion of Mr. Howard,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to this house a statement of the amount of money received and expended by the United States in each state in the years 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837, designating the several principal heads of expenditures and receipt, and the amounts of the same respectively.

On motion of Mr. Carter,

Resolved, That the committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring the corporation of Washington to remove from the principal street leading due east from the front of the capitol the market-house now standing therein.

On motion of Mr. Bronson,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether any other or further legislative enactment by congress is necessary for the prevention and punishment of the crime of piracy, or acts in the nature of piracy, committed on the inland lakes or waters; and whether any other penal enactments are necessary for the safety and protection of vessels navigating the northern lakes, and rivers connected therewith.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore,

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing immediate surveys and estimates for suitable fortifications for the protection and defence of the northern frontier.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln,

Resolved, That the secretaries of state, war, navy, and the treasury, respectively, be directed to report to this house what architectural plans and drawings, if any, have been prepared under the order, and for the use, of these departments, respectively, since the 4th day of July, 1836, who have been employed in preparing the same, and what compensation has been made therefor.

On motion of Mr. Cushing,

Resolved, That the committee on manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for adding to the annual statistical statement for the treasury department a list of the books imported and produced in the United States each year.

On motion of Mr. Ewing,

Resolved, That the committee on private land claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for refunding to the purchasers of public lands the amount of purchase money paid into the land offices for the number of acres the commissioner of the general land office shall be satisfied, upon proper proof, the tract or tracts sold by the United States are deficient of the number so bought and paid for.

Mr. Wise submitted the following resolution, which lies over one day:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house all correspondence and information in possession of the executive department in relation to the visit of Lewis Cass, our minister at the court of France, to the Mediterranean, its objects and results, and its expenses to the nation; whether he voyaged in a national vessel, at the public expense, and whether other persons, and, if so, what persons, accompanied him at the public expense; now long, said vessel was detained or employed in said visit, and at what expense; who represented the United States at the court of France during the absence of said Lewis Cass; and whether he has been paid the full outfit and salary of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at said court.

Mr. Everett submitted the following, which lies one day.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be transmitted to this house, at the commencement of the next session of congress, a statement of the military force employed in the Seminole war, from its commencement, showing the number of artillery, dragoons, infantry, and marines, in the regular army or service of the United States; the number of volunteers and militia employed in said war, designating the state or territory to which they belong, and the number of Indians employed in said war, designating the tribes to which they belong, with the term of service of the several corps or detachments employed in said war, with the sum paid to the several corps or detachments for their pay and rations, and a statement of the number of horses lost in said war, with the amount allowed therefor; also, a statement of the number of officers and men who have been killed or have died of sickness during said war; and copies of all accounts (other than those rendered in the foregoing requisitions) allowed at the treasury department on account of expenditures in the Seminole war.

The following resolutions were moved by Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That the power of designating the time, place, and manner, of elections for representatives is expressly given by the federal constitution to the legislatures of the states, respectively, subject to no supervision or control, except by law of congress only; and that, in the exercise of this power, the state legislatures may constitutionally fix the time of election subsequent to the expiration of the congress preceding that for which such election is to be held.

2. Resolved, That neither the federal nor state executive can constitutionally anticipate, supersede, or change, the times of election as fixed by the state legislatures.

3. Resolved, That this house has not the constitutional power, either legislative or judicial by its own action alone, to annul, suspend or impede, the operation of an act of a state legislature fixing the time, place, and manner of election for representatives.

4. Resolved, That no resolution or action of this house can deprive the people of any state of their constitutional right of electing representatives to congress at the time designated for that purpose by the legislature of such state; that the claim of such power, on the part of this house, would be a dangerous encroachment upon the rights of the states, and its exercise a direct and palpable violation of the constitution.

5. Resolved, That the constitutional jurisdiction of this house over the subject of representation is a limited one, embracing the questions of election, qualification, and return, only; and that, in judging of election, this house is bound to judge in accordance with the act of the state legislature regulating the time, place, and manner thereof.

6. Resolved, That, in accordance with the constitutional act of the legislature of the state of Mississippi, prescribing the time, place, and manner of election for representatives to congress, and in compliance with all the provisions of said act, an election was held in November last for two representatives from said state to the 25th Congress, at which election S. S. Prentiss and Thomas J. Word were duly elected, possessed the constitutional qualifications, and were duly and legally returned.

7. Resolved, That the resolution of this house adopted on the 5th day of February last, denying to said Prentiss and Word seats in this house as members thereof, was a dangerous attack upon the elective franchise, in derogation of the rights of the state of Mississippi, in violation of the constitution of the United States, and a mischievous example to future times.

8. Resolved, therefore, That said resolution be, and the same is hereby, rescinded.

The following joint resolution was moved by Mr. Kennedy, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to cause the public moneys to be deposited in such bank or banks, after the fifteenth day of July next, as shall consent and agree to receive the same on the following terms and conditions, to wit:

First. That said bank or banks shall agree to pay over the said public moneys on warrant, from time to time, when and wheresoever the public convenience shall require the same to be paid, in the legal currency of the United States, if demanded, free of all charge or expense to the treasury.

Second. That such bank or banks shall guaranty all bills exchange supplied by it or them to the government in the transfer or payment of any such moneys.

Third. That said bank or banks shall perform the same duties in relation to loans and pensions as have been heretofore performed by the Bank of the United States, or the deposit banks, free of all charge to the government. And,

Finally. That said bank or banks shall deposit with the secretary of the treasury, as security for the punctual payment of the said public moneys, and for the faithful performance of the duties heretofore referred to, stocks of the United States, treasury notes, or stocks of the several states, such as the said secretary shall approve, to the amount of five millions of dollars, estimating the same by the par value thereof.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be empowered to adopt all such measures as he may deem necessary to carry the above resolution into effect; in such manner as shall most securely provide for the deposit and payment of the public moneys in accordance therewith.

Resolved, That it is expedient and proper that so much of the fifth section of the act entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," approved on the twenty-third of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-six, as prohibits the receipt by the government of the notes or bills of banks which issue or pay out notes or bills of a less denomination than five dollars, be forthwith repealed.

Mr. Boom, when the state of Indiana was called for resolutions, moved to suspend the rules, for the purpose of taking up and considering the joint resolution, introduced by himself on a former day, for adjourning the two houses of congress on the 2d July.

Mr. B. demanded the yeas and nays on the question of suspending the rules; which were ordered;

(requiring two-thirds.) And the house refused to take up the joint resolution by the following vote—Yeas 87, nays 69.

The call for resolutions then proceeded.

Mr. Kilgore, when Ohio was called, offered a joint resolution, looking to a repeal of the small note interdiction; and he asked to have the rules suspended for one hour, to consider it. But he withdrew this motion, at the request of Mr. Hamer, until the call for resolutions should be finished.

And the call for resolutions again proceeded.

Mr. Adams, when Massachusetts was called, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 20th instant, at one o'clock, be assigned for the consideration, in committee of the whole on the state of the union, of bills from the senate numbered 147, 175, and 176, reported by the committee on manufactures without amendment; (to authorize the importation of two iron steamboats; to refund to the Georgia railroad and banking company certain duties upon railroad iron; to refund certain duties upon railroad iron.)

But the house refused to suspend the rules, so as to permit the action upon this resolution at this time.

Mr. Carter made another ineffectual effort to induce the house to fix a day for the special consideration of the bill to extend the pension laws to certain classes of cases arising from western wars.

Mr. Manefee, on the call for resolutions from Kentucky, offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to communicate to this house such information as he may possess relating to the alleged attack on the American steamboat Telegraph, in the British waters, and to the alleged destruction of the British steamboat, Sir Robert Peel, in the American waters; what measures, if any, have been adopted in consequence thereof; and, if not incompatible with the public interest, such correspondence, if any, as may have occurred between this government and the British minister, or Canadian authorities, in relation thereto; and, if any, information possessed by him concerning the concentration and warrants of foreign troops on the northern or northeastern frontier of the United States.

Mr. Kilgore (the call for resolutions having been completed) then moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up, for one hour, and considering the resolution this morning introduced by himself. And, on this motion, he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered. And the motion was decided in the negative by the following vote, (two-thirds being required to carry it:) Yeas 98, nays 82.

Mr. Adams asked leave to offer a memorial asking for relief for the laborers on the public buildings, thrown out of employment by the suspension of the erection of the new treasury building. It was offered, and referred to the committee for the District of Columbia.

The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the house in pursuance of a special order made on a former day, took up business relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. Thomas hoped the pending motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill to take down the walls of the treasury building was laid on the table, on a former day, would be settled before the house should go into committee upon the affairs of the District. Mr. Thomas made a motion (requiring two-thirds) to this effect, which prevailed. So the rules were suspended. Mr. Harrison moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. Mr. Milligan demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion of Mr. Harrison was rejected by the following vote: Yeas 88, nays 100. The question then recurred upon reconsideration. Mr. Mercer gave notice of an amendment it was his intention to offer. The Chair decided that the motion proposed to be reconsidered being non-debatable, so was also the pending motion. Mr. Yell demanded the yeas and nays upon reconsideration, which were ordered; and the motion to reconsider was decided in the affirmative by the following vote: Yeas 103, nays 91. And the question upon the pending motion that the bill do lie on the table, was lost. The amendments of the committee of the whole were then taken up and discussed by several members. Before the question could be taken on the motion to amend, Mr. Cushman moved to lay the bill, &c. on the table; and on this question demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion to lay the bill on the table was decided in the negative by the following vote: Yeas 95, nays 98. Mr. Yell's amendment (to the effect that no more money be spent upon the erection of a treasury building until the country is relieved of the debt incurred by an issue of ten millions of treasury notes,) was then rejected without a division. The bill and amendment were then further discussed by other members, and, after a few moments thus spent, Mr. Petrikia moved to lay the bill on the table. Mr. S. Williams demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the motion was decided in the affirmative by the following vote: Yeas 94, nays 91. So the bill was again laid on the table.

The house then, on motion, went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Underwood in the chair,) and took up several District bills for consideration, in pursuance of the special order of the day.

The committee had made but little progress, when, a bill for the erection of a court-house in Alexandria being under consideration, Mr. Petrikia moved to strike out the enacting clause. He did this upon the ground that it was an extravagant and unnecessary appropriation.

Messrs. Bouldin, Dawson and Jenifer, severally made remarks to the point that there was no court-house belonging to the United States in Alexandria; that it was necessary that there should be one.—They were willing to go for whatever sum the committee should decide ought to be appropriated for that purpose, if that named in the bill were thought to be too large.

Mr. Petrikia said he had some facts in his possession on this subject, which influenced him to oppose this bill. A banking-house belonging to the United States had been offered the government for the purposes of the proposed court-house. But this was not to be heard of, because there were certain people who wished that their fine plat of ground should be purchased for this purpose. The way the honest yeomanry of his country erected courthouses was, to tax the oxen and farming implements of the farmer. But here, surrounded by luxury and dissipation of every kind, costly buildings were to be erected to subserve private speculators' ends, &c. He adhered to his motion. A division was then called for on this motion, and resulted as follows: Ayes 9, nays 31. No quorum, (only forty members being present; it was then precisely 3 o'clock.) The chairman vacated the chair, (which the speaker took,) and the former reported this fact to the house.

Mr. Dawson asked if there was no way in which a quorum of members could be secured to attend to the public business?

Mr. Mercer and McKenna each suggested that the only mode in which this could be accomplished was to go on with, and completely to carry into effect, a call of the house. Mr. E. Whittlesey suggested another mode, which was, to pass a rule that no member should be entitled to his per diem for the day on which, on a call of yeas and nays, he should be found to be absent. Mr. Everett moved a call of the house: Ayes 25, nays 28. Lost, 53 members only being present. Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, moved a reconsideration of this vote. Mr. Cushman asked the yeas and nays. Ordered and taken: Yeas 63, nays 29. So (94 members being present) a call of the house was ordered, and proceeded. On the first call of the roll 110 members answered to their names. After the second call (of absentees) there were found to be 180 members present. Mr. Cumbrerlang moved to suspend all further proceedings under the call; which motion prevailing, the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole, (as detailed in our last report,) the business proceeded till 20 minutes past 5 o'clock, when the committee, after three counts, at which, severally, 71, 76, and 95 members only were found to be present, rose, and reported that fact to the house.

The Speaker then took the chair, and, having counted the house, announced that there were 123 members within the bar, and the house went again into committee of the whole, (at half past five o'clock.)

The question as to taking up the Falmouth and Alexandria railroad (senate) bill previously to the other bills on the calendar, which was pending when the committee found itself without a quorum, was then in order, and the division upon this question was as follows, (by tellers,) ayes 70, nays 43. No quorum. The chairman counted the house, and reported 110 only to be present.

The Speaker again took the chair.

Mr. Haynes then moved an adjournment. Lost: Ayes 58, nays 67. And this vote disclosing the presence of a quorum, the Speaker again left the chair, and the chairman resumed it, in committee of the whole. The question upon taking up the railroad bill recurring, the following was the division, (by tellers,) ayes 62, nays 40. No quorum. (It was now 20 minutes before 6 o'clock.) The chairman again counted the committee, and the tellers reported as follows: Ayes 70, nays 32. No quorum. And the fact was again reported to the house—the Speaker returning to the chair. A motion was then made to adjourn. Mr. Adams demanded the yeas and nays. On ordering the yeas and nays (requiring one-fifth) 19 rose in the affirmative, and 88 in the negative. The motion to adjourn was then decided in the negative by the following vote, (by tellers,) ayes 47, nays 55. So the house (at 6 o'clock) refused to adjourn, and there was no quorum present. A call of the house was then demanded. Mr. Mercer asked for the yeas and nays on this motion, as inflicting the only punishment the house could inflict on the absentees—an exposure of those absent. The yeas and nays were ordered, and the motion that there be a call of the house was decided in the negative by the following vote: Yeas 58, nays 65.

The Speaker then deciding that a quorum (123) was present, the house, of course, again went into committee of the whole. And the chairman resumed the chair, and the committee went on with the business referred to it.

At 7 o'clock the committee rose, and reported the following bills without amendment:

1. A bill relating to the orphans' court of Alexandria county.

5. A bill to make temporary provision for the comfort and support of certain lunatics in the District of Columbia.

And the following were reported with certain amendments:

2. A bill for the relief of the widow and heirs-at-law of the late Lewis Grant Davidson, deceased.

3. A bill making appropriations for the support of the penitentiary in the District of Columbia.

4. A bill to provide a free bridge across the eastern branch of the river Potomac, in the city of Washington.

6. A bill for the erection of a court house in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia.

7. A bill (from the senate) to establish a criminal court in the District of Columbia.

8. A bill (from the senate) to incorporate the medical society of the District of Columbia.

9. A bill (from the senate) permitting the extension of the Falmouth and Alexandria railroad through the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bills above marked 1 and 5 were ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and, being so read, were passed.

The house then took up the bill above marked 2, with the amendments reported by the committee. Pending the same, the house, at half past seven o'clock, on motion, adjourned.

Tuesday, June 12. Messrs. Towns, of Georgia, Dennis, of Maryland, Mercer and Banks, of Virginia, obtained leave to present petitions; which were respectively referred.

On motion of Mr. Grennell,

Resolved, That from and after this day the house will have a daily recess from 2 o'clock till half past 3 o'clock P. M.

She Speaker laid before the house a communication from the secretary of the navy, in compliance with a resolution of the house of the 28th ult. requesting the secretary of the navy to communicate to the house copies of all letters, communications, documents, and correspondence which have passed between him and the navy commissioners, naval constructors, and all other officers and persons relative to the building and equipment of the steam-frigate Fulton; also,

A communication in answer to a resolution of the house of the 28th ult. requiring the secretary of the navy to report the contemplated alterations in the steam-battery Fulton.

Several reports were received and a number of resolutions of a local or private nature were offered. Mr. Yell, from the committee on the public lands, obtained leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to communicate to this house, without delay, copies of all communications from general Nathan Arbuckle, during the last twelve months, in relation to the probability of an Indian war upon the western frontier; with such other information as may be in possession of the war department touching that subject.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. Carter made another effort to have Saturday set apart for the consideration of certain bills in reference to the extension of the pension laws to the widows of persons engaged in western wars. He asked the yeas and nays; but the house refused to order them; and the resolution was decided in the negative—Ayes 93, nays 56, (not two-thirds.)

An act to recognize the district court in the state of Mississippi, was read a third time and passed.

M. E. Whittlesey asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That no representative of this house shall be entitled to receive a per diem allowance for any day he shall not answer to his name on the first call of the names of the members, when a call of the house shall be ordered by a majority of the members present unless he shall have been absent on the business of the house, and by its order or permission, or unless he shall have been detained by sickness, within the provision of the second section of the act of January 22, 1818, allowing compensation to members of congress, and to the delegates of territories, or unless he shall be excused by the house for not being present; and it shall be the duty of the clerk to certify to the speaker the names of all such absentees, not within the excepted cases; and the speaker shall not include a per diem allowance for such absent member, not within the exceptions, for the day of such absence, in any draft he may draw to enable such a member to obtain his other pay.

The reception of the resolution being objected to, Mr. W. moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer it; and asked the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

Mr. W. said he did not wish to press the consideration of the resolution this day, but to be allowed to offer it now, that it might lie one day. Mr. Hopkins moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. Whittlesey demanded the yeas and nays on this motion, and they were ordered by the house; whereupon, Mr. Hopkins withdrew his motion.

The question on suspending the rules was then put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 89, nays 98.

So the rules were not suspended, and the resolution could not therefore be offered.

An act granting land in aid of the Rock river and lake Michigan canal was read a third time, and passed.

The house then on motion of Mr. Boon went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Craig in the chair.)

Mr. Shields made an effort to have the committee take up the bill authorizing the state of Tennessee to issue patents and perfect titles to certain vacant and unappropriated lands within her limits, but, after conversation, withdrew the motion.

The committee then took up the pre-emption bill.

Mr. Randolph, who had the floor, addressed the committee at considerable length, in opposition to the bill. He traced the successive steps in establishing the pre-emption system, dwelt on its effects in encouraging frauds, diminishing the avails of the public lands to the treasury, and sinking the value of real estate generally. He insisted that the system was unfair to the old states, and injurious to the national prosperity.

Mr. Harrison, of Missouri, next took the floor, on the opposite side, correcting some points stated by Mr. Randolph, and arguing to show that they must be founded in error. He spoke in warm defence and eulogy of the settlers, and pleaded the cause of the west, as having conferred more benefits on the government than she had ever received from it.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Lincoln, Underwood, Pope, Lyon, and Mason, of Ohio.

Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, moved his substitute (embracing several sections) for the whole bill.

Mr. Underwood moved his amendment to the original bill, (requiring the pre-emptor to make affidavit that he has not obtained a previous pre-emption right.)

[We will publish a more detailed account of this day's proceedings in the next "REGISTER." The house appeared to be disposed to sit out the bill to night, but adjourned at past 5 o'clock.]

Wednesday, June 13. Several petitions were presented, on leave, by different gentlemen, and variously disposed of.

Mr. Calhoun, of Massachusetts, from the committee on private land claims, to which was referred the senate bill No. 89, for giving effect to the eighth article of the treaty of 1819, reported the views of the minority thereon.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported a resolution in favor of the authorities of the city of Savannah, in the state of Georgia; which resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day.

Mr. McKay, from the committee on military affairs, reported without amendment senate bill "to settle the construction of the act regulating the pay of paymasters in the army;" also, "for the relief of the heirs of gen. William Eaton."

Mr. Ingham, from the committee on naval affairs, reported the following resolutions, which were read, and agreed to:

Whereas the committee on naval affairs, to which were referred copies of letters, documents, and communications called for by a resolution of the house of representatives of the 7th of December last, in relation to the delay of the sailing of the exploring expedition, with instructions to investigate the causes of delay, &c. have selected such parts thereof as in their judgment may be material in such investigation: therefore,

Resolved, That the clerk cause the same to be arranged in chronological order, with an index designating the name of the author of each paper, and of the person to whom it is addressed, with its date; and when the same shall be so arranged and prepared, he is required to cause the usual number of copies to be printed.

Resolved further, That the clerk cause the remainder of said copies, the same having been rejected by said committee as unnecessary to be printed, to be in like manner, arranged, indexed, and bound, and preserved among the documents of the house.

Mr. Howard, from the committee on foreign affairs, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That Saturday next, the 16th inst. after the hour of 11 o'clock, be assigned for the consideration of the bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims due to certain American citizens for spoiliations committed on their commerce prior to the 31st of July, 1801."

The resolution was negatived without a division.

Mr. Legare, from the committee on foreign affairs, presented a report upon the subject of certain memorials referred to that committee, from the New York "peace society," and other individuals, with regard to the settlement of international disputes by arbitration. Mr. Howard, under instruction, moved to print ten thousand extra copies. Mr. Petrikin objecting. Mr. Howard moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of making the motion to print. This motion prevailed—Yeas 101, nays not counted. Messrs. Cushing and Dromgoole, of the same committee, bore testimony to the merits and great value of the report, without pledging themselves to sustain its views.

The motion to print prevailed.

Mr. Dromgoole, from the committee on foreign affairs, upon the subject of the annexation of Texas to the United States, reported, that there is now no proposition pending in this house either for the admission of the republic of Texas as a state into the union, or for its territorial annexation to the United States.

The committee do not deem it advisable to recommend any action on the part of the house of representatives calculated to prejudice any such proposition should it hereafter be formally submitted for decision, or to forestal public sentiment in relation thereto. In consideration whereof, the following resolution is reported:

Resolved, That the committee on foreign affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the whole subject, and that all the papers relating thereto, and to them referred, be laid on the table.

Mr. Cushing called for a division of the question, so that it might be first taken upon that part of the report which proposed to discharge the committee on foreign affairs. Mr. C. dissented from the report entirely, and should, before he sat down, move a recommitment, for the purpose of having the subject more deliberately and argumentatively presented to the house. It was due to the country and the subject. The preamble says there is no proposition before the house for the annexation of Texas to the United States. This might be technically, in strict parliamentary language, correct; since there was not any motion or resolution pending in the house for the annexation of Texas. But Mr. C. denied that this was, in substance, correct. Three states of this union, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, have passed resolutions for the admission of Texas into the union; and of two at least of these states, the resolutions have been presented here, and are in the possession of the house. In addition to which, Texas herself had applied to the United States for admission. This proposition was pending now, and in force; and not, as the late report of the secretary of state would seem to intimate, withdrawn from the cognizance of the government. By the very latest intelligence from Texas, the senate of that republic had distinctly refused to withdraw the application. Now, some gentlemen might think that this application was within the cognizance of the executive only, as in the first instance. Mr. C. maintained the contrary most positively. Congress, the house, the people of the United States, were under no obligation to wait in such a matter for the initiative of the president in regard to it. We, the representatives of the people, have the same power and right as the president to act upon it in the initiative. He might not be disposed to do right. It was the duty of the house to see to the interests and the rights of the people upon this vital question. The constitution does not give to the executive any power to admit new states. It is for congress to do it, so far as the power resides any where. Let congress, let the house, speak, and speak out, in the face of the country and world.

Furthermore. Three of the states, Ohio, Michigan, and Massachusetts, have sent here resolutions solemnly remonstrating against the annexation of Texas. It is due to those three states, also, to express our opinions frankly on the subject. It was due to the thousands upon thousands of petitioners, whose petitions on this subject load the table, to express our opinions. They ask it, they demand it, they have a right to it. How long is this house to fold itself in the mantle of its dignity, covering itself up in darkness, refusing to utter its opinions, suppressing opinions and debate, disdaining, as it were, to meet the people fairly in the light of day, manfully and honestly, as becomes their representatives? Mr. C. insisted upon the duty of the committee to make a full, argumentative report. He would not undertake to discuss the merits of the question. He was conscious it would be out of order, and he had no disposition, on this or any other question, to debate out of order. But he desired to see a full report, and therefore he submitted the following motion:

That the report be recommitted to the same committee with instructions to make report thereon in full as to the merits of the questions presented by the resolutions of the legislatures of the several states of Tennessee, Alabama, Michigan, Ohio, and Massachusetts, and of the various petitions before the house on the subject of Texas.

Mr. Carter, of Tennessee, said he differed entirely from the gentleman from Massachusetts as to this subject. Although his (Mr. Carter's) own state legislature had memorialized congress on this question, yet his own course thereupon in this house had gone to show that his opinions did not correspond precisely with those of his legislature upon this point. He doubted the expediency of annexing Texas to the union.

The Chair reminded the gentleman from Tennessee that this question was not now before the house.

Mr. Carter said he had only intended to express his own opinion, and to show that he was acting disinterestedly. No question was then before the house for the annexation of Texas, except as incidentally raised by the presentation of memorials, legislative resolutions, &c. Nor could it be fairly a question for the house to consider till a report from a committee had been made thereon.

Mr. C. would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, why not bring forward a counter report on this subject if dissatisfied with the report of the committee? He would warn that gentleman that this was a question that would agitate the country from Maine to Georgia, and that the result of that agitation might not be such as that honorable member might perhaps prefer. Therefore he thought that the committee, in offering the resolutions they had done, had acted a prudent and proper part. Were the gentleman to have brought forward a counter report, the question would then be fairly raised for the house and the country to decide; but at present no such question was before the house.

The subject was a perplexing one. It was already agitating the country, and the more it was discussed the more it would agitate the land. It had been with difficulty that the whole mass of the southern community have been restrained from petitioning congress in favor of the annexation. Mr. C. again repeated what were his individual opinions on this question; and said that, if instructed by his constituents to vote contrary to those opinions, it being a matter of expediency he should do so. In the absence of instructions, he held it to be equally his duty to vote according to the best of his judgment. But he did beg the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) not to embarrass this motion of the committee. Let him bring in, if he thought proper, a counter report.

Mr. Cushing here remarked that, under the circumstances attending the introduction of the report of the majority, it had been impossible for him to prepare a counter report. Mr. Dromgoole said that no proposition for a minority report, or anything of the kind, had ever been made in committee. Mr. Adams asked if the numerous legislative resolutions, and the memorials of thousands and tens of thousands of the citizens of this country, in relation to this subject, had ever received five minutes' consideration in the committee on foreign affairs? Mr. Dromgoole said he had but one answer to make to this question; which was, to deny explicitly any right of that member, or any other member, to catechise the committee, as to its action. Mr. Adams immediately rose, (amidst varied cries of "order!" "go on!" &c.) and said: That is enough; sir! That, sir, is enough for this house, and for the country. The committee refuse to answer. [Much confusion.] Mr. Carter proceeded, and urged the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. Pickens said he concurred in the motion of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Cushing,) to recommit, with instructions to report some proposition for the action of the house. He was for meeting this question boldly, frankly, firmly. He could not agree with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Carter,) as to the effect of agitating this question. He did not dread such agitation. He was for letting it go on. It would not be the first question that had agitated the American people. He desired to meet it at once. He was for letting the country see who was for and who was against his people. The legislature of his own state, as well as that of his friend's state, (Tennessee,) and those of several other states, had sent up hitherto their resolutions upon the question. It was agitated on the other side, all over the non-slaveholding part of the country, and by their representatives upon that floor, for months past. It was time to meet it; it was time to take a decided and bold stand upon it. As a distinguished member (Mr. Adams) of the Massachusetts delegation had said on a former occasion, it was a question of union or disunion. The Speaker reminded the gentleman from South Carolina that he was straying from the question before the house. Mr. Pickens repeated that he desired to meet this great question at once; and that, therefore, he was in favor of Mr. Cushing's motion to recommit, with instructions. He desired that the country should know the true position of the question. One thing was very certain; if this government did not exercise a control over Texas, Great Britain would. The Speaker again called to order. Mr. Pickens concluded by urging the adoption of Mr. Cushing's proposition.

Mr. Cushman said that a proposition to annex an independent republic to this union should properly come from that republic. No such proposition had been made to that house. For the purpose of arresting what he thought was a debate altogether irregular, he would move the previous question. [Laughter.]

Much confusion then ensued; and Mr. Pickens remarked, "that is a test question!" and Mr. Adams asked the mover to withdraw the motion, to allow him to reply to the argument with which the motion had been preface by himself (Mr. Cushman.)

Mr. Mercer asked what would be the main question; to which the Speaker replied, on the adoption of the resolution offered by the committee on foreign affairs, to discharge that committee from the further consideration of the subject.

The vote on seconding the motion for the previous question stood, ayes 74, noes 81; so there was no second; and the question recurred upon the resolution offered by Mr. Cushing, to recommit, with instructions. (See above.)

Mr. Howard then took the floor; but the hon. appropriated to morning business having elapsed, the house, on motion, took up the order of the day, and went into committee of the whole (Mr. Craig in the chair) upon the pre-emption bill.

Mr. Chapman, of Alabama, defended the bill in a short speech, and was followed by Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, who spoke at great length, on the same side; after which, Mr. Robertson took the floor, and spoke till the hour of recess, in opposition to the bill, without concluding.

The committee then rose. The speaker took the chair, and (at 2 o'clock) the house took a recess, according to the new standing order, till half past 3 o'clock.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

At half past three o'clock, the house met, (but without a quorum.) After some difficulty and hesitation on this subject—

Mr. Robertson, of Virginia, resumed the course of his remarks in opposition to the bill, quoting, and extensively commenting upon, a report of Ethan Allen Brown, late commissioner of the general land office, and Mr. Fritz's testimony as to the frauds and abuses under the pre-emption laws.

Mr. Cushing followed, in support of the bill, contending that the principle of pre-emption grants had been practised since the first settlement of the country, and was embodied in the laws of Massachusetts, which he quoted in support of this position. [Mr. Lincoln disputed this.]

Mr. C. continued his remarks, in the course of which he inquired whether the United States government could show any better title to the soil of this country than could these settlers to their little farms?

Mr. Underwood spoke in opposition to the system; stated the evils which had attended its operation in Kentucky, where he had been intimately acquainted with all its effects; expressed his desire to get rid of it as a part of the policy of the general government for the future, and his willingness, on that condition, to grant pre-emptions to all now settled on the public domain; but stated his own plan of entry, at prices to be gradually reduced, abolishing all sales at auction.

Mr. Garland, of Louisiana, replied with earnestness and warmth, defending the pre-emption system against Mr. U.'s objections; and then went into an exposition and defence of the amendment he had moved as a substitute for the existing plan.

At half past 7 o'clock, a motion was made for the rising of the committee, but negatived—Ayes 58, noes 70.

[The hall was now lighted, and the indications were that the bill was to be disposed of this evening.]

Mr. Garland resumed, and having spoken half an hour longer, and concluded his remarks—

Mr. Snyder, of Illinois, obtained the floor, but yielded it that the question might be taken; on the amendment moved by Mr. Underwood, requiring the affidavit of the pre-emptor that he had obtained no previous pre-emption right.

After some explanations by Mr. Lincoln, and a brief speech in favor of the amendment by Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, the question was taken and the vote upon it stood—Ayes 47, noes 69. (No quorum.)

After some confusion and desultory conversation as to the best mode of proceeding,

Mr. Bell suggested that it would be best to take a question pro forma in committee on all the amendments proposed, and let them be renewed in the house.

This was agreed to.

Mr. Underwood's amendment was negatived.

Mr. May moved the following as a new section:

"Sec.—. And be it further enacted, That any person, being the head of a family, who now is settled on, or who shall hereafter settle on, any of the public lands of the United States, and who shall continue to reside on and cultivate the same for the period of twelve months, shall, upon making proof thereof, according to the provisions of this act, be entitled to a right of pre-emption to one quarter section."

This amendment was rejected.

Mr. Lewis moved an amendment the object of which was to meet the case of certain citizens of Alabama who had settled on lands in Alabama, to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, and whose pre-emption rights had been defeated by being included within reservations made by the Indians in the treaty by which the land was afterwards ceded to the United States. Mr. L.'s amendment proposed to allow them to locate their claims on other vacant lands belonging to the United States.

Mr. L. explained the hard case of those for whose benefit the amendment was intended, who had been ousted from their improvements by the arrangements of a treaty.

Mr. Johnson, of La., inquired whether the amendment gave these settlers floating rights to be located on any lands in the state?

Mr. Lewis replied in the affirmative; but, as this was objected to, consented to modify his amendment by striking out the clause granting the "float".

The amendments was objected to by Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Briggs as being the same, in substance, with a bill introduced for the same object, and not yet acted upon.

Mr. Lewis waived this objection.

But the amendment of Mr. Lewis was ruled by the Chair to be out of order, on the ground stated.

Several other amendments were offered, some of which were rejected; but it was agreed that they should all be printed and laid on the tables of members ready for the action of the house to-morrow. It was generally understood that the bill should be finally disposed of the next day, [Thursday;] with which understanding the committee rose at half past 8 o'clock.

The Speaker laid before the house a letter from the commissioner of the general land office, containing information called for by the resolution of the house of the 11th instant, as to what quantity of land scrip would be required in his judgment for satisfying the outstanding military bounty land warrants granted by the commonwealth of Virginia.

Two resolutions of minor importance were offered, after which the house adjourned.

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

In the senate, Mr. Buchanan presented the proceedings of a numerous and respectable meeting of the democratic citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened at the county court-house on Monday evening last, at which a number of resolutions were adopted in favor of the immediate passage of the independent treasury bill now before congress. He moved that these proceedings should be printed, and laid upon the table; which was ordered accordingly, after they had been read.

Mr. B. also presented a memorial from a number of citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, in favor of the passage of the independent treasury bill, and against the establishment of a national bank. Laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Morris presented the proceedings of a convention of the banks in Ohio, in favor of so modifying the deposit act of 1836 as to receive the notes of banks that since that time had issued notes less than five dollars. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. King, the committee on commerce were discharged from the further consideration of the petitions of two individuals relating to improvements in light-houses.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the bill from the house, requiring that the United States district court in Tennessee should be held at Jackson, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and, by consent, read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. Webster, the senate took up Mr. Williams' motion for leave to bring in a bill for instituting a joint commission—British and American—of exploration and survey, to determine the northeastern boundary of the United States on the basis of the treaty of 1783.

Mr. Webster spoke at large on the subject, chiefly with a view to show that the line designated by the treaty of 1783 was well defined, and easily and readily to be found.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, with the assent of the mover, the motion for leave was again laid on the table, with a view to call it up to-morrow or next day.

On motion of Mr. Preston, the senate took up the joint resolution offered by him to annex Texas to the United States.

Mr. Southard, remarking on the number of senators absent, and the importance of the measure proposed, moved to lay the resolution on the table. Mr. Preston inquired if this was designed to be final for this session in regard to the resolution. Mr. Southard replied that he could speak only for himself; but, as far as he was concerned, it was designed to be final, as he should not vote for again taking it up at this session, but he temporarily withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. Calhoun, who objected to that part of the preamble which declares that a portion of the United States territory was surrendered by the treaty with Spain; but spoke strongly in favor of the main object of the resolution, and expressed the hope that if the resolution were now laid on the table, it would shortly again be called up.

After a brief conversation by Messrs. Preston, Lumpkin, Calhoun, and Southard, almost wholly relating to the question whether the resolution if now laid on the table, would probably again be called up, Mr. Southard, having in the course of the conversation, a second time made and withdrawn his motion to lay the resolution on the table, declared, in a spirit of courtesy, that he should not again renew it; whereupon, Mr. Norvell renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Ken., Clayton, Davis, Hubbard, King, Knight, Lyon, McKean, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Southard, Wall, Webster, Williams, Wright, Young—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Calhoun, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Preston, Rives, Sevier, Strange, Trotter, White—14.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the senate proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of Pierre Menard and others.

This bill was discussed at much length by Messrs. Linn, Grundy, Niles, Robinson, Wright, and Bayard, and, on motion of Mr. Hubbard, was for the time laid on the table.

The senate then adjourned.

In the house, the bill to authorize the issuing land warrants in certain cases was read the third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

A joint resolution in favor of the authorities of the city of Savannah, Georgia, was read the third time and passed.

The amendment of the senate to the bill making an appropriation for completing the public buildings in Wisconsin, was concurred in by the house. So the bill is passed.

The amendments of the senate to the amendments of the house to the bill "appropriating alternate sections of land to aid in the construction of a canal from Rock river to Milwaukee, in Wisconsin," were concurred in by the house.

Mr. C. H. Williams moved to take up Mr. Boon's resolution to fix a day of adjournment. Objection being made, he moved to suspend the rules, and asked the yeas and nays; which, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 82, nays 55.

There not being two-thirds, the motion was lost. Mr. Potts moved to publish two thousand extra copies of a report of the secretary of the navy on the exploring expedition; but the motion was negatived.

Mr. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, on leave, presented a memorial in favor of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Currier once more made an effort to get a day appointed for the consideration of certain bills to extend the pension laws to Indian wars, but he again failed: Yeas 88, nays 81; (not two-thirds.)

The house then resumed the unfinished business of yesterday morning.

And the question being on the following resolution, reported yesterday by Mr. Dromgoole, from the committee on foreign affairs:

"Resolved, That the committee on foreign affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the whole subject, and that all the papers relating thereto, and to them referred, be laid on the table."

And on the amendment thereto by Mr. Cushing, Mr. Howard rose, but yielded the floor at the request of Mr. W. Thompson, who moved to amend the amendment as follows:

Strike out all after "instructions," and insert: "To report a joint resolution, directing the president to take the proper steps for the annexation of Texas to the United States, as soon as it can be done consistently with the treaty stipulations of this government."

Mr. Howard said that he regretted that the proposition of the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Cushman) for the previous question had not been sustained yesterday by the house. He could not anticipate a single good result from the prolongation of a general debate upon the subject of Texas, but, on the contrary, many evils, even greater than the useless consumption of valuable time. As the vote of the house, however, has been against the previous question, he had risen yesterday to vindicate, as far as he could, the committee on foreign affairs from the implied charge of failure to perform a duty entrusted to them by the house. The amendment now offered by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) gives to the question an entirely new aspect, and he would be compelled to digress from what had been his sole, and still was his main purpose, in order to make some remarks upon the new state of the case. The house was master of its own actions, and could, no doubt, originate a proposal for the annexation of Texas to the United States; but a committee could only act upon the matters referred to them, and he intended to show that no proposition had been heretofore before the house; and, consequently, the committee could have made no other report, with propriety, than the one which they had made. A reference to the journal would show that, at an early period of the session, the house had, by the decisive vote of 127 to 68, five more than the majority of the entire house, determined to lay upon the table all memorials upon the subject of Texas. All committees ought to regulate their action by the expressed will of the house. He thought this position would not be disputed. The subject would, therefore, have slept upon the clerk's table, if a petition, presented afterwards by one of the delegation from Maine (Mr. Noyes,) had not been referred to the committee on foreign affairs, when the attention of the house was not called to it. Jurisdiction having been thus given to the committee by the reference of this straggling petition, there ceased to be any objection to the adoption of a resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) sending to them the entire mass of petitions from individuals, the magnitude of which might be measured by cubic feet, and, also, the resolutions of several legislatures, which had expressed their opinions upon the subject. But he did not consider these papers as raising a question. They were only intended, he thought, to bear upon the question after it was raised in some other way. At the extra session we had printed and circulated a large edition of the correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and gen. Hunt, and, although the proposition for annexation was not entertained by the president, yet there was a reasonable ground for supposing that the subject might be renewed, and all these evidences of public opinion were probably prepared to meet the contingency when it should happen. But it had not happened. The documents before us show that it had not. On the 4th of August, 1837, gen. Hunt addressed a letter to the secretary of state, proposing the annexation of Texas to the United States: and in his reply of the 25th of August, Mr. Forsyth not only declines the proposition, but even declines to reserve it for future consideration. No language could be more explicit than this. It was impossible to mistake it. The minister plenipotentiary of Texas, in his answer of September 12, showed that he did not mistake it, as will be evident from the following paragraph:

"The undersigned most respectfully assures the honorable Mr. Forsyth, and, through him, his excellency the president of the United States, that the prompt and decisive rejection of the proposition for the annexation of Texas to the United States will not be imputed to an unfriendly spirit towards the government and people of Texas."

The prompt and decisive rejection of the proposition. It was, indeed, so. There was no proposition, therefore, pending before the executive branch of the government, and, of course, this house had none before it, derived from the documents communicated by the president. From what quarter, therefore, could any proposition have come, so as to place before the committee a subject upon which they could act? There was none from Texas, and he thought there was none either in the resolutions of legislatures, or petitions of individuals, which had flooded the house in such numbers.

At this point the morning hour expired, and the discussion went over to to-morrow.

The house then proceeded to the unfinished business of yesterday, and resumed the consideration of the pre-emption bill.

After some desultory conversation, the question was put on the first amendment reported from the committee of the whole, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "provisions," and insert: "Certain fractions or regular legal subdivisions of the public lands, which have been reserved from sale in consequence of the filing of a claim to a French or Spanish grant or donation, which was found, or which hereafter may be found, on actual survey or location of such claim or claims, to be without the limits of said claim, or any other reservation, except as is hereinbefore specified."

This amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was then read, as follows: "Or to the lands lately acquired by treaty with the Miami tribe of Indians in the state of Indiana, of which proclamation was made by the president of the United States on the 22d day of December, 1837."

Mr. Lincoln now offered his amendment to this amendment, as follows:

"In line thirty-first, after the word states, add: or to any sections or fractions of sections of land included within the location of any incorporated town, or to the alternate sections to other alternate sections granted to the use of any canal, railroad, or other public improvement on the route of such canal, railroad, or other public improvement, or to any portions of been actually selected as sites for cities or towns, allotted into smaller quantities than eighty acres, and settled upon and occupied for the purposes of trade, and not of agricultural cultivation and improvement."

The amendment was debated at considerable length by Messrs. Lincoln, Harrison, Sherrod Williams, Johnson, of Louisiana, Cray, Boon, Good, and Tillinghast.

When the question being taken upon Mr. Lincoln's amendment, it was carried, and the amendment thus amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was the following:

"Nor shall the benefit of this act extend to any person who has availed himself of a pre-emption right to the entry of any of the public lands, and acquired a title thereto by reason of such entry."

Mr. Ewing moved a proviso to this amendment, but the chair pronounced it out of order at this time. Mr. White, of Indiana, also moved a proviso, which shared the same fate. Mr. Yell, Mr. Lyon, Mr. Johnson, of Louisiana, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Pope, Mr. Marvin, Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, debated the amendment until the expiration of the morning sitting, (at 2 o'clock.)

The house then, according to the order recently established, took a recess to half past 3 o'clock.

In the evening session the bill was finally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by a vote of 132 to 70. Particulars in our next.

CHRONICLE.

New Hampshire. The legislature of this state met at Concord on Wednesday last, and organized by choosing Samuel Jones, president, and Asa Fowler, clerk of the senate, and Ira A. Eastman, speaker, and Jeremiah Elkins, clerk of the house.

On the vote for speaker, honorable Ichabod Bartlett (whig) received 107 votes, and Mr. Eastman 128. Jacob B. Moore, of Concord, was the whig candidate for clerk of the house.

Two Giraffes have arrived at New York in the barque Prudent, from South Africa—another died on the way. They were imported for a Boston company, and cost the proprietors about ten thousand dollars each.

In 118 towns in Connecticut, out of 185 in the state, there are 767 insane and idiotic poor, of whom 59 are in close confinement. It is found that 60 persons become insane in the state on an average, per annum. A committee of the legislature recommend the establishing of a state lunatic asylum, capable of accommodating 120 patients.

The New York Gazette of Saturday states that the Rev. Dr. Eastburn has declined to accept the office of bishop of Maryland, to which station he was recently elected by the episcopal convention of that diocese.

A great load. The Cleveland Herald states that on Saturday, the canal boat Danube, belonging to the Swiftsure line, brought to Cleveland by the canal, a cargo consisting of 1,620 bushels of wheat, 100 barrels flour, and 1,772 lbs. furniture—weighing, in all, 120,572 lbs; being larger by 1,580 lbs. than any cargo previously transported on the canal.

The Newport Mercury of Saturday announces that that number completes eighty years since the said paper was first published by James, elder brother of Dr. Benjamin Franklin.

Expedition. A requisition for arms and ammunition made by general Maunsby at Havre-de-grace on the 8th instant, addressed to the executive at Annapolis, 65 miles off, was answered by the delivery of 200 muskets and a full supply of ball cartridges at Havre-de-grace at noon on the 10th instant. This extraordinary despatch was accomplished by means of the facilities afforded by the Baltimore and Philadelphia rail road. The knowledge of the receipt of the arms had the happy effect of quieting the riotously disposed among the canal laborers, and we are satisfied that we shall not hear of any further disturbances.

[Baltimore American.] Health of Washington City. The president of the board of health reports thirty-three deaths for the month of May. Of these there were of the age of two years and under, 12; between two and ten, 2; between ten and thirty, 5; between thirty and fifty, 7; between fifty and eighty, 7.

Diseases.—Measels, 6; consumption, 4; rheumatism, 1; apoplexy, 3; not reported, 4; bilious pleurisy, 8; still born, 4; inflammation of lungs, 3; decline, 4; scarlet fever, 2.

The anniversary. There is to be a great military encampment in Trenton on the 4th July. The whole militia of New Jersey will most probably be on the spot, together with many uniform companies from New York and Philadelphia. No better spot for a tented field could have been selected than this revolutionary battle ground. Baltimore also will be represented on the occasion. The Maryland Cadets, captain Newman, and the Baltimore City Guards, captain Thompson, two of the best drilled volunteer corps, intend joining in the grand display. They will act as a battalion under the command of captain Newman.

Ornithological Society. At a meeting on Friday, it was announced that the commissioners of woods and forests were about to make ponds in the island in St. James' park, for the use of the aquatic birds there located. It was stated, as a curious fact, that many of the birds in the park fly away, even for months, but invariably return, if not arrested by the murderous aim of the fowler. [London paper]

Book-binding with india rubber, recently discovered by Mr. Hancock, of London, where it is patronized by the Bank of England, insurance companies, and many of the most extensive merchants, has been patented in the United States, by the inventor, and is now introduced in New York by Peter A. Mesier. Sewing is completely superseded: and the book or ledger opens so perfectly as to present a full, flat page, that may be written upon to the very edge. The sheets are originally cemented together with a solution of the rubber. Library books are bound in the same way.

A company formed at Paris for exploring the ruins of Carthage, has already met with great success. A large house has been discovered on the margin of the sea, near Bourj Jedid. Paintings in fresco, similar to those at Pompeii, adorn many of the rooms, and beautiful mosaics, representing men, women, and nymphs, fishes of various kinds, tigers, gazelles, &c. have been found. Fifteen cases with these precious relics have arrived at Toulon, and will be brought to Paris.

MOST MELANCHOLY DISASTERS. We add two more to the long catalogue of terrible disasters by steam, by which nearly two hundred individuals, comprising the worth, intelligence and beauty of our country have met an untimely death. The details, though meager, are most heart-rending, but fall far short of the dreadful events in those scenes of death. Deeply, most deeply, do we sympathize with the friends of the survivors whose hearts have been made desolate, but yet have no hope that this sacrifice of life and the living misery it has entailed, will prevent similar occurrences in future. The public mind has become callous from their frequency; and, as if in mockery of the sufferers, almost at the moment when their shrieks of despair were sounding over the wide waste of waters, some of the representatives of the nation were declaiming against the right of congress to save their lives. And it was only a few days since, that we read in one of the papers, published in the city from which the Pulaski sailed, a frivolous anecdote directly tending to encourage that spirit of competition which, it is said, caused her destruction. Oh! most humane legislators, most charitable editors! You condemn the wretch to the penitentiary who, in a drunken brawl, stabs his comrade, but commend those as experienced and able who for the accursed spirit of gain, deliberately jeopard a hundred lives on which are linked a thousand destinies.

P. S. It is with great joy we state that the following persons have been rescued from the wreck of the Pulaski, in addition to those enumerated in the account published in page 259:

A. Lovejoy, Camden co., Georgia; maj. Heath, Baltimore; maj. Twigg and son, Richmond co., Geo.; Mr. Greenwood, Augusta, Geo.; Mr. O'Grogory, Augusta, Geo.; Mrs. Noah Smith, Augusta, Geo.; Miss Rebecca Lannar, Augusta, Geo.; Chas. Lamar, Savannah; Robert Seabrook, Edisto Island, S. C.; Masters T. & W. Whaley, (2) Edisto Island, S. C.; Mr. R. Hutchinson, Savannah; Mr. A. Hamilton, Augusta, Geo.; capt. Pearson, Baltimore; Mr. Edings, Edisto Island, S. C.; Mr. C. Ward, Savannah; Chicken, 1st engineer; E. Joseph, New York; C. W. Clifton, Canton, Mississippi; D. Walker, and nephew Thomas Downing, Charleston; Warren Freeman, Macon, Geo.; — unknown; John Cape, fireman, Baltimore; — fireman; Patrick and Bill, deck hands; Rhynah, a negro woman; a negro woman belonging to Dr. Stewart.

CONSTITUTIONAL SCRUPLES!!! It being deemed important that the people should have within their reach for information and reference, official accounts of the proceedings of their representatives and the laws passed by them, the committee on the library, as one mode of accomplishing such object, recently reported a resolution authorizing the clerk of the house of representatives to subscribe for certain copies of the "REGISTER" for each member thereof (to be deposited with the clerks of the different counties, or otherwise disposed of so that the public could have access to them)—provided we would agree to publish in it, weekly, the journals of both houses of congress, with the yeas and nays on all questions decided, and at the end of every session all the laws passed or treaties ratified. This proposition, if agreed to, would, as explained by the chairman of the committee on the library, have enabled us to distribute about eight thousand copies of the journals every week, and the same number of copies of the laws at the end of every session, in a suitable form for reference, at a cost of about $5,000 per annum to the nation,—or about one half of the amount of the expense we would have to incur to do the work. And yet it was rejected in consequence of the constitutional scruples of certain members, who could not agree to vote for books! We cried content to this decision, though we thought, and, still think, that the project of the committee on the library was intended to fulfil to the letter, that provision of the constitution which declares that congress shall publish a journal of its proceedings.

Thus content, we had banished the decision of the house from our mind, when not long since our attention was attracted by A CART HEAVILY LADEN WITH HANDSOMELY BOUND BOOKS, standing before the door of one of our respectable boarding houses—and were informed that they belonged to the delegation from one of the small states, and were but a small portion of a mass for which large sums had been recently appropriated by congress!!! Now, without casting the slightest imputation upon congress, we think this case presents a singular commentary upon constitutional scruples! Why, that cart load of books, a gift to six or seven individuals, cost the people nearly as much money as our project to place the journals and laws in the hands of every voter in the country, at the least possible price, would have cost the government for one year—and we verily believe, that the money voted for books within the last few years, would pay the cost of ten thousand copies of the journal and laws, to be published on our plan, for TWENTY-FIVE YEARS!!! And yet in the one case it is constitutional, and in the other it is not!

We make no comments upon this subject, and merely state the facts for the information of those who have expressed their surprise at the result of the decision upon the proposition of the committee on the library. We embrace the occasion, however, to say that we are determined to publish the journals and laws on our own responsibility, as soon as we feel authorized to incur the extra expense. The journals are the only infallible exposition of the conduct of a representative, and ought to be in the hands, or within the reach, of every constituent—especially the yeas and nays, which speak a language that cannot be misunderstood. With the laws and journals added to the documentary articles with which our pages are filled, we hazard nothing in saying, that the "REGISTER" must become the most useful political journal ever published, and that it will confer great and lasting benefits upon posterity.

VIRGINIA. The Virginia commercial convention which convened at Richmond in the early part of last week, adjourned on Saturday last. Among the resolutions adopted was the following:

"Resolved, That a vigorous and persevering effort be made to build up and sustain a large and increasing foreign import trade—that a committee of merchants be appointed, to sit after the adjournment of the convention, to prepare an address to our fellow citizens, unfolding the importance of such a trade, and the ready capacity of Virginia to obtain it—stating the support the trade will derive from an increase of bank facilities, under such restrictions and modifications as the wisdom of the legislature may devise, and from an addition to the banking capital, if the addition authorized by the existing laws shall be found, after a sufficient trial, to be inadequate to sustain and support the various interests of the commonwealth—and stating the aid the trade will derive from a judicious system of internal improvements; and that the legislature be respectfully requested to meet the advances of any neighboring state, who may have enacted laws to transport her products and merchandise into Virginia."

The convention also recommended another state convention to assemble in Norfolk in November next, and the appointment of delegates to the Augusta (Geo.) convention.

DEATH OF TALLEYRAND. This extraordinary man, died on the 17th of May. He had been out in his carriage on the previous Sunday; but a slight sore produced an anthrax, or gangrene, and he was thus carried off in his 84th year. He had for some time written and addressed to the pope a retraction of his conduct at the famous ceremony of the federation, where he forgot his episcopal ordination, and condescended to bless that democratic and somewhat heathen ceremony. He received absolution, extreme unction, and died in the peace of the catholic church; although the archbishop of Paris, to whom the prince had sent a copy of his letter to the pope, kept aloof from his bedside. King Louis Philippe, however, visited the death-bed of the veteran statesman, whose respect for etiquette and courtly ideas was manifest, even in his dying moments. He insisted on presenting to the king all who happened to be with him, and had not undergone that ceremony, and he acknowledged the king's visit, not as the act of warm and private friendship, but as "a great honor done to his house." Madame Adelaide, sister of the king also visited the prince. Messrs. Thiers and Mole also attended his last moments. [Morning Chronicle].

In an article on this subject, the Courier Francais says: "He quitted life with a calmness that could not have been exceeded by the purest conscience. In death he preserved all the stoicism (impassibilite) of his life. He went out of the world like a true courtier, by using flattering words to his king, and like a true diplomatist by negotiating with the pope, with whom, as a consecrated bishop, a married priest, and excommunicated catholic, he had many accounts to settle."

Great preparations were making in Paris for the funeral of prince Talleyrand. Upholsterers were employed during the whole of one day in decorating the church of the Assumption and the Ardent chapel, in which he was to be laid out in state, an hour before the funeral ceremony. The courtyard of his hotel was hung in black, and in the centre stood a rich canopy, under which the body was to be exposed previous to its being conveyed to the church. The corps diplomatique, the authorities, the chamber of peers, were to attend at the funeral, and the four corners of the pall were to be borne by Marshal Soult, Chancellor Pasquier, Count Mole, president of the council, and the Duke of Broglie, as grand dignitaries of the order of the legion of honor. Four of the royal carriages were to follow the procession.

THE GREAT WESTERN arrived at New York from Bristol on Sunday morning last, having sailed from Bristol on the 4th inst. She arrived at Bristol from New York in fourteen days, on which occasion a grand entertainment was given on board of her. The Sirius reached Falmouth from New York in eighteen days, and returned to New York on Monday last in seventeen days from Cork, whither she went from Falmouth. The political advices brought by these ships are not of much interest. The Sirius is to sail to-day from New York for London. The Great Western goes on Monday.

EXPRESS MAIL ROBBED. The Nashville Whig of the 16th states that the express mail was robbed on the night of the 13th on the Louisville road, near Beacon creek. The express horse was stopped in the road by the robber and the rider dismounted and tied to a sappling. The saddle bags were carried about a mile into the barrens, cut open, and the most part of their contents carried off. The mail, it is said, was a large, and no doubt a very valuable one, containing, as it did, the letter packages from New Orleans of the 8th and 9th, Mobile of the 10th and Nashville of the 13th inst. No clue has yet been found to the name of the robber, nor is it certain that there was only one concerned.

From the "Globe" of Saturday night.

A MAIL DESTROYED BY FIRE.

Copy of a letter from the postmaster at Silver Creek, New York.

Post office, Silver Creek, N. Y. June 16, 1833.

SIR: The mail from Toledo, Ohio, for Buffalo, New York, by the steamboat Washington, of the 14th inst. was burnt in said boat off this port this morning about 4 o'clock.

The destruction was so rapid that nothing was saved; the passengers that escaped, did so by swimming about two miles to land.

I have advised the postmasters at Toledo and Buffalo of this event, that they may advise those interested of the loss of these letters.

Respectfully, &c.

W. VAN DUZEN, P. M.

Hon. A. Kendall, postmaster general.

NAVAL. On Wednesday last the nomination of James K. Paulding, to be secretary of the navy, vice M. Dickerson, resigned, was confirmed by the senate.

On the same day, also, was confirmed the nomination of John R. Livingston, to be navy agent for the port of New York, vice J. K. Paulding.

THE MURDER IN ARKANSAS. The Little Rock Gazette of the 23d inst., contains a full and detailed account of the trial of colonel John Wilson, late speaker of the house of representatives, and member from Clarke county, for the murder of major J. J. Anthony, member from the county of Randolph, on the 4th day of December last. There were six witnesses examined on behalf of the state, and two in behalf of the accused.

It appears from the testimony, that this unfortunate occurrence originated in an allusion made by Mr. Anthony, with regard to the Real Estate Bank, of which the speaker was president. The deceased was speaking on a bill relative to granting premiums for killing wolves; the bill required that an affidavit be made before a magistrate previous to the payment of premium.

Mr. Anthony moved to strike out the word magistrate, and insert the "president of the Real Estate Bank." The speaker immediately asked, "do you mean to insult the chair? If you do, you will take it back very quick." Mr. A. disclaimed any insult, but observed that he thought "the certificates should be signed by a man of great dignity." As soon as those words were uttered, the speaker left the chair, and as he descended, drew his bowie knife, having a blade nine inches long. Mr. A. then left his seat, and drew his knife, blade twelve inches long, advanced towards the speaker—flourishing the knife—made two passes, and struck him on the arm. Wilson retreated a few paces, and as he was again in the act of advancing, Anthony threw his knife and afterwards a chair at him. Wilson then rushed towards Anthony, who immediately picked up another chair to defend himself. Wilson caught it, made a thrust with his knife underneath the chair, which entered Anthony's breast, who immediately fell and expired.

The verdict of the jury was, "guilty of excusable homicide." The prisoner was then discharged.

In speaking of major Anthony, the Gazette observes, "he was an officer of the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and was one of the gallant defenders of Fort Sandusky; subsequently served in the Creek war, under general Jackson, where he acquitted himself in such a manner, as to give entire satisfaction to that distinguished military chief."

SMITHSONIAN LEGACY. The Pennsylvania states, on the authority of a letter from London, that "the hon. Richard Rush has obtained an absolute decree for the Smithsonian bequest, and that the money has been paid to him. It amounts to upwards of a hundred thousand pounds sterling. Mr. Rush was to have embarked on his return in the course of the present month, bringing with him the money thus bequeathed for the purpose of education in the United States. It was supposed that the matter would have been the cause of a tedious chancery suit, but it appears from this intelligence that it has been terminated with a very little delay."

ST. AUGUSTINE. We are indebted to captain Southwick, of the schr. Empire, arrived yesterday from St. Augustine, for the Herald of the 2d instant, from which we copy the following:

Extract of a letter to the editor, dated

Garey's Ferry, May 28, 1838.

Two days ago, captain Thigpin, of a company of volunteers, now mustering here, gave notice to col. Twigg that a party of Indians had been at John's Ferry, on New river, about 40 miles north of this place. With his usual activity, our gallant commander, colonel Twigg, ordered captain Bullock, with E company, 2d dragoons—the only one company then at Garey's Ferry—to proceed at once with the sixty men of captain Thigpin's, to Fort Harnee, there to be reinforced by as many men as could be spared, and pursue the Indians until they came up with them.

These Indians are thought to be runaway Creeks, and to have been camping about New river and its vicinity for some time. There number has not been ascertained, but twenty-five fires have been seen.

An express from Micanopy arrived yesterday, states that captain Tompkins, at that post, expected to have a fight with Tigertail on the 30th. Tigertail was near him with plenty of women and men and full of fight. The Tallahassee were with him. The despatch says that two companies of dragoons had been sent out to fight him.

FURTHER ATTEMPTS TO FIRE THE CITY OF CHARLESTON. By the Mercury of the 11th inst., we perceive that further attempts have been made to fire the city.

On Saturday evening, the 9th instant, about 10 o'clock, the kitchen attached to the dwelling of Mr. Davege, in Boundary street, was set fire to, by placing a mass of combustibles under the flooring.

A negro girl living in the yard, first gave the alarm to her mistress, after bed time, but the lady could perceive no traces of fire; the girl, however, soon pointed out the spot, when the floor being cut away, they found two separate places on fire, and the sills just catching. The fire was quietly put out, and the girl, together with other slaves from the adjoining lots, were arrested for examination. No information could be obtained from the girl: she pretended to know nothing of the incendiary.

Another. Yesterday morning about half past five o'clock, Mr. B. Clark, No. 262 King street, had just got home from patrol duty, when on entering the door of his dwelling, found the entry filled with smoke; he gave the alarm, and the neighbors coming in, found the under part of the stairway on fire, kindled by parcels of dry goods, books, &c. in one large mass.

The family, who were asleep on the second floor, knew nothing of their danger until aroused by the noise below. A few minutes longer of delay would have proved fatal, and the unsuspecting inmates been cut off by the destroying element.

COL. CROCKETT. Col. Forbes has recently related to us an interesting anecdote of the celebrated Crockett. At the commencement of the war the latter arrived at Nacogdoches accompanied by several volunteers. Soon after their arrival they proceeded to the office of col. Forbes, (who was then first judge of the municipality,) to take the oath of allegiance. The colonel immediately wrote out the following form:

"I do solemnly swear that I will bear true allegiance to the provisional government of Texas, or any future government that may be hereafter declared, and that I will serve her honestly and faithfully against all her enemies and oppressors whatsoever, and observe and obey the orders of the governor of Texas, the orders and decrees of the present and future authorities, and the orders of the officers appointed over me according to the rules and articles for the government of Texas so help me God."

Upon offering it to Crockett he refused to sign it, saying that he was willing to take an oath to support any future republican government, but could not subscribe his name to this form, as the future government might be despotic; the colonel therefore inserted the word republican between the words future and government, and Crockett readily signed the instrument. The original has lately been deposited in the office of the secretary of war, in which the word republican appears interlined, and beneath it is the autograph of David Crockett.

ALABAMA COTTON FACTORY. The Tuscaloosa Monitor of the 30th ult., gives the following interesting description of this establishment:

As we were travelling some two weeks ago, through rather a sterile and unimproved portion of our state, where the county of Bibb borders on that of Tuscaloosa, we were all at once surprised with an imposing edifice of brick, three stories high, and being, as we afterwards learned, ninety feet by forty-four in extent. The dashing energies of water power saluted our ears, accompanied with the whirling sound of diversified machinery. What have we here? was our inquiry. We left our seats in the stage, and during the few moments which we had to spare, took a view of the works that were going forward. In the second story we found the carding and roving operations going forward; and in the third, a multitude of spindles were employed in the finishing work of making cotton yarn. A few hands, men, women, and children, seemed to be employed, in rather a quiet way, in attending to the machinery, and seeing that it performed its business correctly. In another apartment, the cotton gin is in operation; so that the factory is prepared to take the cotton, either after it has been picked, or in the seed. In the spinning department, there have been in operation, heretofore, 500 spindles; but they have recently obtained an additional supply, and will very soon be working between 700 and 800. There is a water power sufficient, we are assured, to work 10,000. The cotton yarn produced is said to be of an excellent quality. A lady of the neighborhood affirms that she wove 30 yards of it without breaking a thread. The average production per day, with five hundred spindles, has been 430 dozen. About twenty hands are employed—all white—some males, some females—some large, and some small. They are chiefly people of the neighborhood, and are said to be pleased with their employment. A grist mill and saw mill are connected with the works, which are in active and profitable operation. A portion of the machinery is also devoted to wool carding. The place is called Scotts-ville, in honor, we suppose of D. Scott, one of the principal proprietors. The works belong to, and are conducted by the Tuscaloosa Manufacturing Company. We learn, that the prospects of the company as to profit, are exceedingly flattering. Their sales are brisk. They contemplate adding a weaving factory to the other works. Thus has this business been successfully carried forward, while very few persons in the state knew that any thing of the kind was under way. Indeed we doubt whether the information, that such factory exists, may not be news unheard of before, to more than one half of the people of Bibb and Tuscaloosa counties.

NEW HAMPSHIRE: June 8. The committee appointed to receive and cast the returns of votes for governor, reported that the

Whole number was	54,570
Necessary for a choice	27,286
Estimated as scattering	193
James Wilson had	431
James Wilson Jr. had	25,244
Isaac Hill had	28,607

This number exceeds by more than nine thousand that ever before given at an annual election in this state. In 1820, the whole number was about forty-five thousand.

In the house of representatives of New Hampshire, after the report of the committee appointed to notify the governor of his election had been presented, Mr. Eastman of Conway presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of ten be appointed to inquire whether the hon. Isaac Hill, governor elect, holds any office or place under the United States which constitutionally disqualifies him from holding the office of governor, and to report the facts in relation to that subject to this house, and that said committee be empowered to send for persons and papers.

Mr. Quincy said he did not object to going into an inquiry at a proper time, but for the present he wished the resolution to lie on the table. He therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. Bartlett of Portsmouth inquired if the effect of this motion was not to prevent debate.

The chair said a motion to lie on the table could not be debated.

Mr. Bartlett observed that he made the inquiry that the house might be informed of the effect of the motion, to stifle inquiry.

The motion was decided in the affirmative—yeas 126, nays 110. So the resolution was laid on the table.

Navy department, June 13, 1838.

The board of naval surgeons, recently convened in Philadelphia for the examination of candidates for admission into the navy, adjourned on the 11th instant.

The following is the list of the approved candidates, in the order of merit, viz:

- No. 1. Silas Holmes of Rhode Island.
- No. 2. Edwd. H. Van Wyck of New York.
- No. 3. Horace D. Taliaferro of Virginia.
- No. 4. J. Howard Smith of Pennsylvania.
- No. 5. John A. Guion of North Carolina.
- No. 6. James McClelland of Pennsylvania.
- No. 7. Samuel R. Addison of Ohio.
- No. 8. Wm. B. Sinclair of Virginia.
- No. 9. Samuel Jackson of North Carolina.
- No. 10. James Jeffry Brownlee of New York.
- No. 11. Joshua Huntington of Connecticut.
- No. 12. Robt. B. Banister of Virginia.

Mint of the United States,

June 5, 1838.

Sir—I send you to-day the usual report, required by the department of the gold coinage in May, and I now present to you the following statement of the whole amount of coinage done at the mint during the same month.

Denomination.	Value.	No. of pieces.
Half eagles,	195,295 00	39,659
Quarter eagles	21,972 00	8,789
Half dollars,	174,000 00	348,000
Quarter dollars,	49,000 00	196,000
Dimes,	62,500 00	625,000
Half dimes.	26,500 00	530,000
Cents,	8,785 00	878,500

Totals, $538,052,000 2,625,348

This statement shows an amount of work greater than has ever been heretofore done at the mint in the same time, since the labor is proportional, not to the value of the coins, but more nearly to the number of pieces. It will be observed that 2,229,500 coins have been struck, of less denomination than the half dollar. and we are still busily occupied with the fabrication of these small coins, for which the demand seems to be but little diminished.

The mint at New Orleans, after having various unforeseen difficulties to overcome, commenced coining on the 7th of last month; so that all the branch mints are now in full operation.

Very respectfully,

Your faithful servant,
(Signed) R. M. PATTERSON,
Director.

Hon. Levi Woodbury,
Secretary of the treasury.

MOST AWFUL DISASTERS.

Office of the Wilmington (N. C.) Advertiser, }
June 18, 1838. }

Loss of the steam packet Pulaski, with a crew of thirty seven, and one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty passengers.

On Thursday, the 14th instant, the steamer Pulaski, captain Dubois, left Charleston for Baltimore with about 150 passengers, of whom about 50 were ladies.

At about 11 o'clock on the same night, while off the North Carolina coast, say 30 miles from land, weather moderate and night dark, the starboard boiler exploded, and the vessel was lost, with all the passengers and crew except those whose names are enumerated among the saved in the list to be found below.

We have gathered the following facts from the first mate, Mr. Hibberd, who had charge of the boat at the time. Mr. Hibberd states that at about 10 o'clock at night he was called to the command of the boat, and that he was pacing the promenade deck in front of the steerage house; that he found himself, shortly after, upon the main deck, lying between the mast and the side of the boat; that, upon the return of consciousness, he had a confused idea of having heard an explosion, something like that of gunpowder, immediately before he discovered himself in his then situation. He was induced, therefore, to rise and walk aft, where he discovered that the boat midships was blown entirely to pieces; that the head of the starboard boiler was blown out, and the top torn open; that the timbers and plank on the starboard side were forced asunder, and that the boat took in water whenever she rolled in that direction.

He became immediately aware of the horrors of their situation, and the danger of letting the passengers know that the boat was sinking, before lowering the small boats. He proceeded, therefore, to do this. Upon dropping the boat, he was asked his object, and he replied that it was to pass around the steamer to ascertain her condition. Before doing this, however, he took in a couple of men. He ordered the other boats to be lowered, and two were shortly put into the water, but they leaked so much in consequence of their long exposure to the sun, that one of them sunk, after a fruitless attempt to bail her. He had in the interim taken several from the water, until the number made ten. In the other boat afloat there were eleven. While they were making a fruitless attempt to bail the small boat, the Pulaski went down with a dreadful crash, in about 45 minutes after the explosion.

Both boats now insisted upon Mr. Hibberd's directing their course to the shore, but he resisted their remonstrances, replying that he would not abandon the spot until daylight. At about three o'clock in the morning they started, in the midst of the wailings of the hopeless beings who were floating around in every direction, upon pieces of the wreck, to seek land, which was about thirty miles distant. After pulling about thirteen hours, the persons in both boats became tired, and insisted that Mr. Hibberd should land. This he opposed, thinking it safest to proceed along the coast, and to enter some one of its numerous inlets; but he was at length forced to yield to the general desire, and to attempt a landing upon the beach, a little east of Stump Inlet.

He advised Mr. Cooper, of Ga. who had command of the other boat, and a couple of ladies with two children under his charge, to wait until his boat had first landed, as he apprehended much danger in the attempt, and should they succeed, they might assist him and the ladies and children. There were eleven persons in the mate's boat, (having taken two black women from Mr. Cooper's.) Of these, two passengers, one of the crew, and the two negro women were drowned, and six gained the shore. After waiting for a signal, which he received from the mate, Mr. Cooper and his companions landed in about three hours after the first boat, in safety. They then proceeded a short distance across Stump Sound, to Mr. Redd's, of Onslow county, where they remained from Friday evening until Sunday morning, and then started for Wilmington. The mate and two passengers reached here this morning (18th June) about 9 o'clock.

The steamboat North America is just in, by passengers on which we learn the particulars of a most heart-rending calamity—THE DESTRUCTION OF THE NEW AND ELEGANT STEAMBOAT WASHINGTON, by fire, off Silver creek, about 3 o'clock this morning, with the estimated loss of FIFTY LIVES!!

The Washington passed the North American while the latter lay at Erie, in the early part of the night, and was not again seen by those on board the North America until, when within about three miles of this city, a bright glare of light was discovered by the helmsman in the direction of Silver creek, and the North America was instantly put about for the scene of apprehended disaster.

On nearing the spot, about 6 o'clock, the burning hull of the large and noble boat was found drifting over the waters, three or four miles from shore, with not a living human being on board. The lake was literally covered with hats, bonnets, trunks, baggage, and blackend fragments of the wreck.

The intense anxiety of the witnesses of this fearful scene, for the fate of the passengers on the unfortunate Washington, was partially relieved by the discovery of several small boats near the shore, in which the survivors of the disaster had been rescued from destruction.

The alarm had been given at Silver creek, as soon as the flames were perceived from the shore, and all the boats which could be found, were sent to the rescue of the sufferers. There were only three skiffs, besides the yawl of the Washington, which could be thus used.

The North America took on board about forty of those saved, many of whom, including all the ladies, remained on shore. There were six dead bodies picked up on the spot—those of four children and two women. One man died of his injuries soon after reaching the shore, and one child was dead in its mother's arms when she was taken out of the water.

After picking up all the floating baggage which could be seen, the hull—which was still able to float the engine—was towed into Silver creek, where it sank in six or eight feet water. The North America remained at Silver creek, employed in this melancholy business, six or seven hours, and every thing was done by captain Edmonds, and his crew, for the relief of the sufferers. Their prompt and efficient services are entitled to all praise.

The ill-fated Washington was built at Ashtabula last winter, and had made but one trip previous to her destruction. The fire caught near the boilers, and had made such progress when discovered, as to defy all attempts to extinguish it. The helm was instantly put about, and the boat headed for shore, but in a few moments the wheel ropes were burnt off, and she was rendered an unmanageable wreck. Had iron rods been substituted, as melancholy experience has taught on the Mississippi, this appalling loss of life might have been averted!

We hear that the surviving passengers of the Washington unite in stating that no blame was attributable to captain Brown, the commander.

We hope and expect that the reported loss of life, as stated above, may prove exaggerated. We have heard, since commencing this article, the loss variously estimated from twenty to sixty. Many of the survivors were badly burned before they left the boat.

MESSRS. BELL AND TURNEY.

To the editors.

Washington, June 14, 1838.

Gentlemen:—In the Globe of the 12th instant, and which was published yesterday morning, I observed a statement relative to the recent personal rencontre between my colleague and myself, which is expected, no doubt, to be regarded by the public as a true narrative of all the circumstances attending it.* Among other misrepresentations in

* The speech of Mr. Turney, which we publish to-day, will enable the public to decide whether the charges brought by him against Mr. Bell, are well sustained and whether the mode adopted by Mr. Bell to meet them was appropriate. Mr. Turney, it seems, felt himself called upon, as a representative of Tennessee, to defend the fame of a man endeared to the state by a life of patriotic services, who had been traduced by the representative from his own district in the grossest manner. If general Jackson were the corrupt, unprincipled, dishonest man, portrayed in Mr. Bell's philippics, the honors paid him by Tennessee dishonored the state. Mr. Turney doubtless felt that, in vindicating the retired chief magistrate from the foulest aspersions, he performed a duty to his own constituents. There is scarcely a man of them of whatever political principles, who would be content to hear the traduction with which Mr. Bell regaled his Hartford Convention friends during his last fall's tour through the New England states, repeated in the house of representatives, without an answer.

Mr. Turney responded, and, as Mr. Bell's subsequent conduct proved, with full effect. The speech, as printed, is but the plain demonstration made on the floor of the house. It is temperate, cool, precise in argument and expression, and not less decisive as to the offences which it lays at Mr. Bell's door and conclusively proves upon him.

It first arraigns Mr. Bell as charging corrupt expenditure on general Jackson's administration throughout the seven years during which the accuser adhered to that administration. Mr. Turney then shows that Mr. Bell voted for the appropriations which authorized those expenditures, and that the extraordinary additions originated in congress, not with the executive. He then takes Mr. Bell's admission of corrupt motive as good against himself. That the recommendations of president Jackson were pure, and designed for the public good, and were so respected by the American people, does not excuse the man who advocated and pressed them to consummation in that body especially charged with the care of the public purse, and who, according to his own showing, voted the money as a source of corrupt patronage to that administration to which he gave his unwearied support for seven years, while, as he pretends, working the abuses now complained of as fatal to the constitution and best hopes of the country. Mr. Turney then puts it even to those disposed to credit Mr. Bell's evidence, and inquires how he can be looked upon in any other light than as one of a banditti once engaged in plundering the public, now seeking safety and reward by appearing as the betrayer and state's evidence against his companions.

that statement, there is one of so gross a nature, so malignant in its purpose, and so well conceived to injure, that I must insist upon having a correction of it inserted in your journal.

After reciting all the most offensive points of attack in the speech of my colleague, and leaving it to be clearly implied that he had commenced and concluded his speech on the same day, the editor of the Globe proceeds to state that I consulted my pillow, and possibly my friends, as to the response to be given to the charges made against me by my colleague; and also that I had made up my mind, after a night's deliberation, to meet the accusation of my colleague, by getting up a scene of personal violence in the house. Although the truth may never meet the eyes of a tenth part of those who will be misled by the statement in the Globe, still it will be some protection to me, if it shall be made known to the numerous readers of the Intelligencer that my colleague concluded his speech the morning after he commenced it; that the most offensive parts of it were reserved for the conclusion; and that I rose to reply the instant he sat down. I will add, that the idea of personal violence, as the probable consequence of my colleague's speech, or of any notice I might take of it, so far as I have heard, never entered the head of any of my friends, as it certainly was not thought of by me, at any time before the instant of its occurrence.

I remark the suppression of a considerable portion of my colleague's speech as printed in the Globe of the same date, of which I will not complain; but I notice, also, the absence of an adverb in one of the garbled extracts taken from a speech delivered by me at Nashville, in the spring of 1835, which is material to the true sense of the passage quoted. I have no copy of the speech to refer to, and cannot speak with positive confidence, that I am right in this exception; but as my colleague comments with much acrimony upon the sentiment contained in the extract, and as the injustice of his remarks may be made manifest by restoring the true reading of it, if a material word is left out, I hope it will be done in the pamphlet edition of his speech. He will know how to supply the omission, if there be one.

I am, gentlemen,
With great respect,
Your obedient servant,
JOHN BELL.

Messrs. Gales & Seaton.

Mr. Turney next confronts Mr. Bell with his Nashville speech, attempting to conceal his latent hostility to general Jackson—his late New England speech, in which it blazed out—and his testimony before the committee, when called to testify as to the corruptions alleged against general Jackson. In the first he denounces those who dared to suspect his fidelity and sincere attachment to the principles of the late president—boasts of his devotion to the administration and its measures throughout their seven years' development, and treated with scorn all imputations on his sincerity in this respect, as vain attempts to drive him from the cause with which he, in common with general Jackson, was identified throughout the course of an administration which he had sustained at every step in congress. From the New England speech Mr. Turney quoted to show, that a seven years' train of corruption was imputed to the chief whom he pretended so faithfully to serve; and from his deposition on oath before the committee to which he was sworn to tell "the whole truth," reference is made, proving that Mr. Bell swore off the imputations of corruption which he had made before the public against general Jackson in his speeches. In this aspect it would seem that Mr. Turney intended to leave to Mr. Bell nothing but the dilemma of suppressing on oath to the committee, or speaking falsely in addressing his federal friends.

Mr. Turney then comes to the question of the motives of his colleague in the abandonment and abuse of general Jackson, and his conversion to the federal party and all its policy. And here again a naked alternative is presented in the speech. Mr. Turney alludes to the $53,000, recorded in Mr. Tyler's report, as received from the United States bank by a certain one, but a nameless member of congress, residing at Nashville; and to political rewards, which Mr. Bell showed himself nothing loth to receive from the opposition—and intimates that one or both may serve to account for a change by which alone they could be deserved. Mr. Bell consulted his pillow, and possibly some less silent friends, as to the response to be given to charges so gravely, firmly, and demonstratively urged, and in a manner which parliamentary forms

From the "Globe, of the 16th instant.

TO THE PUBLISHERS OF THE GLOBE.

Gentlemen: In Mr. Bell's note, published in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, I find the following paragraph:

"I remark the suppression of a considerable portion of my colleague's speech as printed in the Globe of the same date, of which I will not complain; but I notice, also, the absence of an adverb in one of the garbled extracts taken from a speech delivered by me at Nashville, in the spring of 1835, which is material to the true sense of the passage quoted. I have no copy of the speech to refer to, and cannot speak with positive confidence that I am right in this exception; but as my colleague comments with much acrimony upon the sentiment contained in the extract, and as the injustice of his remarks may be made manifest by restoring the true reading of it, if a material word is left out, I hope it will be done in the pamphlet edition of his speech. He will know how to supply the omission, if there be one."

In my speech, as published in the Globe, there is no suppression of the speech as delivered in the house; nor am I aware of any omission of any material part of the speech as delivered in the house. The published speech is, in all substantial respects, the speech as delivered. Every fact and argument used in the speech, as I delivered it in the house, is contained in the published speech. The precise language used in debate cannot, in any reported speech, be literally the same. If, however, there should be an omission deemed material, it was altogether accidental, and is not withdrawn.

The paragraphs quoted from Mr. Bell's Nashville speech, are the same which I read in the house, and are correctly reported in the published speech, with the accidental omission in the copying of a word or two in one of them, which does not change the meaning of the passage. The passage read in the house from the pamphlet edition of the speech, is as follows:

"A man towards whom I have never yet failed in showing a proper respect, and whose administration I have faithfully supported, and, in every instance, with that degree of zeal which could consistently and reasonably be expected from me."

The passage as published in the quotation in the public speech is as follows:

"A man towards whom I have never yet failed in showing a proper respect, and whose administration I have faithfully supported, and in every in-authorized. He made up his mind, after a night's deliberation, to meet the solemn and well vouched accusations of his antagonist, by producing a scene in the hall of the representatives which would have been disreputable among gentlemen in the bar-room of a tavern. Mr. Bell abused the speaker of the house and a senator from Tennessee, pronounced Mr. Turney "a scavenger," "a tool of tools;" and when Mr. Turney characterized his assertions as he knew they ought to be, resolved to make it an "affair" of fisticuffs! He struck at Mr. Turney, but did not reach him. The personal assault was repelled, and Mr. Bell instantly found himself in the arms of his friends. Certainly no place can be so safe to adjust an affair of honor as the floor of the house; but surely it does not comport with the dignity of a national legislative assembly, to be made the theatre of this mode of adjusting differences. Mr. Bell, as the aggrieved party, seems considerably to have brought himself to the conclusion that he must try the issue of character presented in Mr. Turney's remarks by battle; and although we will not deny his right, or object to the comparatively harmless mode resolved on, yet we must say that it was altogether unbecoming in one aspiring to the speaker's chair, first to attack the speaker who had superseded him, and then insult the house itself, by beginning an affray, which, while the single instance is calculated to lessen its character in the eyes of the world, tends, in its example, to disorganize and destroy the body by breaking down that sacred regard to decorum, which alone prevents personal and party altercations from ending like tavern brawls; or what is called at the cock-pit, a battle royal.

The speaker, who was not in the chair (the house being in committee) when Mr. Bell directed his abuse towards him, acted properly in not noticing him at all. It is his duty to discountenance every thing which tends, in any way, to the sort of arbitrament in which Mr. Bell would resolve the business of congress. To maintain the decorum and dignity of the body, there is nothing left when a member wantonly, and without pretext, insults the house and its presiding officer, but utter contempt for the assailant, or his expulsion.

stance, with that degree of zeal which could reasonably be expected from me."

The other paragraphs quoted in the Globe are literal and correct copies. All the passages were correctly read in the house, and those parts only which were read were published in the Globe. I did not wish to fatigue the house by reading more lengthy extracts, but such parts only as were material, and in point. The parts read and quoted in my printed speech, contain each a distinct point, and are not garbled extracts. To show that they are not, I append hereto more extended extracts from that speech than I thought it necessary to quote in debate, and which I request may be published, to show that no injustice was done Mr. Bell in selecting the extracts which I did quote.

Washington, June 16, 1838.

Extracts from the "Speech of John Bell, delivered at Vaux Hall Garden, Nashville, on the 23d of May, 1835."

"The elections last fall terminated in such a manner as, in the judgment of all men of observation, to defeat, absolutely and without hope, the prospects of any candidate of the opposition for the presidency. That any man, or the friends of any man, since the days of Washington, should expect that he would be permitted to be advanced to the presidential chair, without a rival or competitor, is hardly credible. It was as certain, in the very nature of things, that Mr. Van Buren would have a competitor, in the ranks of the dominant party, the moment the opposition, as a party, were prostrated, as that flowers should put forth upon the return of spring. The notice which had already been taken of judge White, in many districts of the southwest, pointed him out to the public as that competitor."

"It cannot be objected that general Jackson or his administration is, or can be seriously affected by a contest between two of his friends for the succession. General Jackson has been eminently successful and triumphant in all his measures. It is one of the happy consequences of his great success, that the friends of his administration may choose from among the whole number of his friends, whom they prefer to succeed him safely, and without danger to his administration. He yet possesses a vast and undoubted control and influence in the country. It cannot be disputed that there are thousands in the United States, who have such unbounded confidence, not only in his honesty, but in his general sagacity, and his intelligence upon all subjects, as to be ready to yield up their own judgments, in deference to his, upon any political question which may arise. The friends of judge White, therefore, upon grounds of policy, if upon no other, and better ones, will not seek to disturb the tranquillity of gen. Jackson's administration, or to defeat or unsettle any of these great questions on which he has acquired so much of his present power and influence in the country. They would be unadvised to do so. The truth is, it is their interest, and so far as they are acting in view of principle, it is the interest of the country, that they should conciliate general Jackson, and the people of every section who have such unlimited confidence in him, by every means, consistently and honorably, in their power. This is so obviously their policy, that we see some of the partisan presses of his competitor employing their address to drive them to an opposite course—practising every species of provocation and insult, by which they may hope to throw judge White's friends into the opposition ranks. Opposition to the administration of gen. Jackson, is the course which the worst enemies of judge White desire his friends to adopt; they are so anxious on this point that they appear determined to put judge White and his friends in the opposition, whether they will or not. But gentlemen, the friends of judge White will adhere to general Jackson, and his administration, from consistency, and a respect for their own character; and because they will be supporting their own principles upon all questions, properly administrative in their nature, which have arisen or are likely to arise. They know too well how to bestow their ammunition to waste it—by firing into a bomb-proof battery. It cannot be even plausibly objected, that judge White may not be expected to carry out the principles of the present administration, so far as depends upon him. If we run a parallel between him and his competitor upon this point, and calculate the probabilities, we shall find that the chances are in favor of judge White. He has been consistent in the support of his present principles and the principles of the administration; his competitor has not. If it shall be said that the friends and supporters of judge White are not likely to be such as will sustain his principles, I answer that they are more likely to be homogeneous in sentiment than the supporters of Mr. Van Buren, so far as principle is concerned. Should judge White prevail in the contest over his opponent, surely the great democratic states, which it is said will support Mr. Van Buren, will not desert their principles because their favorite leader shall have lost his election. Their cherished democratic principles will undoubtedly continue dear to them under the lead of judge White; unless then the great body of Mr. Van Buren's friends shall desert their principles, the democracy of the country will still be triumphant."

SPEECH OF MR. PRESTON, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

On the treasury note bill. Delivered in the senate of the United States, on the 18th of May, 1838.

The senate having taken up the bill to authorize the issue of the treasury notes, to meet the wants of the government—

Mr. Preston said he was altogether indisposed to mix up a discussion of the sub-treasury project with what he had to say on the bill now before the senate to provide for the issuing of treasury notes. With the hard money part of that project he had no sympathy during its short, but feverish existence; and now, being dead, he would be silent concerning it. "Nil de mortuis bonum." By a very decisive vote, of 81 to 21, we are, said Mr. P. fully relieved from all further discussion of this scheme, however much its mourning friends may be indulged in eulogy and monody. There is now a real and practical question before us, which we are pressed to decide with breathless haste, at once; for if we delay a moment, honorable gentlemen tell us the government is about to be precipitated into a gulf of bankruptcy, from which it can be rescued only by our utmost speed. It is now Friday evening; the general government of the United States cannot pay off its laborers to-morrow evening without this bill. Without this bill the hod-carrier at the public buildings must go without his Sunday dinner. If we do not pass this bill now, this instant, the government is disgraced, the public faith violated; there is no alternative—disgrace, or this bill, this identical bill, just as it stands, without substitute, alteration, or amendment of any kind; and he who will not at once eagerly take it, just as presented, is little less than a traitor. Such is the language of gentlemen. Now, Mr. President, I am not altogether content with this bold urging by the administration of its own negligence and incompetency, as reasons why we should not deliberate; that, because they have not done their duty, we should not do ours; that, because their prodigality has exhausted your treasury, and their negligence has not announced that fact until driven the last moment, we should be deprived of all discretion upon the ways and means, and hastily to register the edicts of the executive. That portion of the senate which, either from habit or from recent illumination, believe in executive infallibility, may well believe that all discussion of executive recommendations is very useless, and, perhaps, very impolite; but it is pushing this complacency and acquiescence very far when a similar self-sacrifice is demanded of those who neither have the habit, nor have seen the apocalypse.

I by no means, sir, desire to stop the supplies of government, believing that it is our duty at all times to make such appropriations as may be necessary and proper to sustain its action. If we should refuse to vote a competent salary for the president or the judges, we would unquestionably violate the constitution by omitting an important duty. But it is a very different question how the money to discharge these salaries should be raised. We must adopt some mode; what it should be is addressed to our discretion. The announcement of these truisms would be ridiculous, but for the virtual denial of them implied in the language of senators who hold that opposition to the issuing of ten millions of treasury bills is the advocacy of government insolvency.

For one, sir, I should hold myself guilty of a gross violation of public duty if I withheld the supplies necessary; and I should hold myself equally guilty of a gross violation of public duty if I voted for this bill; and I never will, under any pressure, however brought upon me, whether, like the present, it be either the result of incapacity or of a purpose to make an emergency, neither in war nor in peace, will I ever vote for the issuing of treasury notes, bills of credit, concealed loans, continental money.

The argument for the bill is the haste necessary. Those who urge the necessity, urge it as an argument. The necessity is perhaps made for the sake of the argument. The breathless haste with which the chairman came running into the hall with the bill, seemed to indicate that he and his friends had been taken altogether by surprise; that bankruptcy had slyly crept up unawares, and was about to pounce upon them by one portentous leap. Why has not this state of things been foreseen and fore-armed against? Why have we not been provided with a system of finance to relieve us from these paltry expedients—this living from hand to mouth? Here, in the sixth month of the session, the president of the United States comes into congress with a beggarly account of empty boxes; supplicating congress to dismiss all other matters, and hasten to the relief of the government. Why have you permitted this pitiable and disgraceful spectacle, now for the first time exhibited, of the president warning congress of the government bankruptcy? There is no excuse for, no palliation of, this unprecedented negligence and incapacity. The chairman of the committee stated to us the other day, when he proposed the sale of the United States Bank bonds, that it was all the senate could do towards replenishing the treasury. If this were true, as it is not, why was not this measure produced early enough to avoid this shameful crisis? Why were not the proceeds of those bonds now in the treasury? Why was not this very bill introduced into this body, as it was at the extra session, when our constitutional inhibition of originating a money bill was not permitted to stand in the way of the gentleman? If this had been done, we should have been allowed breathing time. But this is all the senator could have done. Let me call your attention, sir, to the first sentence of the president's urgent message. He says:

"I submit to the consideration of congress a statement prepared by the secretary of the treasury, by which it appears that the United States with over twenty eight millions in deposits with the states, and over fifteen millions due from individuals and banks, are, from the situation in which those funds are placed, in immediate danger of being rendered unable to discharge, with good faith and promptitude, the various pecuniary obligations of the government."

Now, sir, it is competent to the senate to originate measures to recall these deposits from the states—as much within the powers of this as of the other house. The administration members who have possession of both branches might have introduced a bill in either to demand the whole, or any portion, of these 28 millions; and, in my opinion, their shrinking from this obvious course is a reason why we should look with suspicion upon the proposed measure. Why do not gentlemen call on the states for those deposits which are thus set forth by the president? is a question which suggests very serious reflections. A bill introduced in due season would have replenished the treasury by this time, for the legislatures of many of the states have been in session until recently, and all have been in session since the meeting of congress, and since the present condition of things was foreseen by every body except, perhaps, by the secretary of the treasury.

When, at the extra session, the first bill for the creation of government paper money was before us, I suggested and urged the propriety of drawing upon the deposits in the states. The idea seemed to meet with some favor from the administration side; but it was said we have no time—the case is too urgent; and this is to be a single instance of the issue of treasury notes, not to be followed up. Now there is a second instance; time urges again; bankruptcy has surprised gentlemen twice a year; and twice we are called upon for treasury notes, under the subterfuge of haste. Why is this, Mr. President? Why this puerile pretext, which, if it were aught but a pretext, is such an avowal of incompetency as should be followed up by the resignation of all concerned?

The alternative for those who govern us is of fraud or folly. But I believe, Mr. President, there is not much difficulty in ascertaining the true cause of this reluctance to demand the deposits, and willingness to issue the treasury notes. The issuing of treasury notes is a quiet, unostentatious proceeding, rousing neither individuals nor states. You silently get the desired sweets without exciting the swarm, whereas, if you demand the deposits it is striking the hive, and all the inmates are forthwith about your ears.

If you ventured to call upon the states, they would turn upon you and inquire, for what purpose is all this money wanted? What measure have brought you to this condition? In short, by making this call, you would effect what was a prime object of the deposit law; you would excite the vigilance of the states, and make them, to use the phrase of the times, antagonist to your prodigality; a prodigality which no country could less bear, and no administration ever stood so much in need of. Broken and tumbling to pieces as you are, you stand in need of prodigal appropriations to buy off the vengeance which your prodigality has brought upon you. You seek to purchase silence upon your spendthrift disbursements by more extravagant expenditures. There is not one single act of retrenchment performed or in progress. There is no pretence of economy. The department asks for twenty-two millions; when it is known that when these reformers and retrenchers came into power, twelve millions were enough; and besides this audacious demand—from those who, it was proclaimed for their country's good, would be, with miraculous speed, the most economical of all possible politicians—there are now bills before us proposing appropriations of more than forty millions. No one has proposed to cut off any branch of extravagance, and no party measure has been proposed to organize a system of economy. Are there any propositions of reform? Any committees of retrenchment? You have not given up one of your useless and corrupting projects. Not a harbor; not a lighthouse; not a pension; not even your notoriously useless Cumberland road. In truth, sir, you dare not; this administration cannot give up any one means of influence and corruption. My colleague proved, in a masterly report a few years since, that its foundations were in money and patronage; take those away, and the swift destruction which in spite of power and patronage is coming upon it, will overwhelm it in the twinkling of an eye.

The administration can neither restrain its prodigality nor permit the people to know it. They dare not rouse the antagonist vigilance of the states, and therefore resort to indirect by-ways of raising a revenue. All that is wanted is, the silent hand of the engraver, a little ink and paper. It is a most noiseless operation. "Let the people slumber on in sweet repose. Heaven forbid that we should wake them."

Now, Mr. President, this is exactly what I desire. I wish the people to know and feel what you are doing. I desire to see a main object of the deposit law accomplished. A direct appeal to the states and the people for money would be a real and efficient check, not only upon your extravagance, but upon all your misdeeds, for it will immediately create a spirit of scrupulous investigation into the whole conduct of the government. I believe, sir, that a necessity of raising your revenue at all times by direct taxation would be in itself a more searching and vivifying principle of liberty than all the checks and guards of the constitution, however wisely conceived. To the mystifying influence of indirect taxation you now propose to add the still more remote, silent, and unintelligible process of creating money. You shrink, altogether, within yourself. You plunge into the dark recesses of your safes and dungeons to counterfeit money, because you are afraid to ask the people for it.

One year has already illustrated the fatal tendency and inevitable destiny of this system of making money. The issue at the extra session was said to be temporary, and but for a short season. You now are about to repeat it. You will do it again and again. You will expand and extend your issues. You will push them, as all governments have in all ages, to extreme; to depreciation. You have tasted once of this intoxicating draught, and now return to it with a keen relish; again you will collapse, and again return to it. Even now there are strong symptoms that this luscious and exhilarating beverage is beginning to be considered as a regular ingredient of the government dietetics. It begins to be whispered that a permanent system of government paper may not be that wretched parent of public and private demoralization which all time has proved it to be, and perhaps one inducement for proposing the present measure may be to familiarize the public mind by degrees to what no one would dare openly avow as the ultimate object of the administration, viz. the establishment of a government paper currency. It is necessary to approach this consummation warily. The people have some ugly reminiscences of continental money. They have heard of the French assignats. Many remember the North Carolina proc money. They would be shocked with the "heinous" mien of this "monster" if the veil were suddenly dropped. But if they can be brought to "endure" it, why, in the regular progress of moral degradation, they may at length be brought to "embrace" it. And when the country is debauched into this embrace, when we are brought to agree that this government shall create its own funds, for its own purposes, I would not give you a haubec for you constitution. Its checks, limitations, and restrictions, are a mere mockery. When the government can make money ad libitum, it will spend it ad libitum.

I am very strongly persuaded that you have no power under the constitution to issue treasury notes. My colleague states that he intends to vote for this bill, but would, by no means, under any circumstances, in war or in peace, vote for a loan. This most emphatic declaration of his opinion that the proposed measure is not a loan leaves it upon the footing of paper issued upon the credit of the government; and all parties admit that it is intended for circulation. These two qualities combined make the definition of bills of credit; and such, sir, we have no power to issue under the constitution. And, in the first place, appealing to the highest canon of constitutional construction, I demand that the power be pointed out to me. Where is it? Where is your authority to issue bills of credit? It is expressly prohibited to the states; is it expressly given to this government? Whatever was so substantive as to require express prohibition to the states, was sufficiently substantive to require express grant to the federal government. The silence of the convention in one case is as emphatic as its language in the other. This government, to be sure, has the power of raising money, but it is a definite power, limited to certain objects, and circumscribed also as to the mode of doing it. There are two modes of raising money permitted by the constitution: 1st, by laying and collecting taxes, imposts, &c.; 2d, by borrowing money.

Congress shall have power to lay, &c.; congress shall have power to borrow money. There the powers of congress cease. It is not added that congress shall have power to issue bills of credit. If the power to raise money had been granted in general terms, it might have been urged, with some plausibility, that all modes of doing it were included in the grant. But the modes are themselves the subjects of express grant and enumeration; by a clear rule of construction, an enumeration of some particulars excludes those not enumerated; and the application of this rule is especially strong in the present case, from the fact that at the time of the convention bills of credit were the most frequent and familiar mode of raising money; and their intended exclusion might be strongly inferred from the odium into which they had justly fallen. The modes expressly authorized in the constitution are abundantly ample for all the purposes of revenue. The power of taxation is that of confiscating the property of the country for the purposes of government. The power of borrowing is limited only by the extent of the government credit. Surely this is enough for all honest and legitimate purposes.—There are practical restrictions on both these grants of a very efficient character: upon that of borrowing, the want of credit, if it be wantonly pushed; upon that of taxation, the resistance of the people taxed; but, upon the assumed power of emitting bills of credit there is no restraint resulting from the nature of things. The will or the wantonness of government prescribes their own bounds—bounds that never have, and never will be ascertained, but in the utter exhaustion of a totally depreciated currency. But the argument against the power does not rest exclusively upon the application of these obvious rules of construction; it derives great strength from the proceedings of the convention upon the subject of bills of credit; and places the objection upon grounds which must, at least, be conclusive to all who hold a United States bank to be unconstitutional.

The denial of the constitutionality of that institution rests mainly upon these two grounds: 1st. That no grant of power to create a bank is found in the constitution. And, 2d. That, in convention, the proposition to endow this government with the power to create corporations was negatived. Both objections lie against bills of credit. The proposition granting such a power to congress was expressly made to the convention by the report of a committee; it was fully discussed, and rejected. Luther Martin reports the various views taken. He himself was in favor of the proposition, and considered the proceeding of the convention, in denying this power, as an unwise restriction upon the powers of congress. I refrain, Mr. President, from pushing this argument into any further detail, as the ground has already been fully and ably occupied by a member from South Carolina, in the other house, to whose views I could add nothing. He and my most worthy and most republican friend, the venerable senator from Tennessee, have preceded and given me the sanction of their authority for this position. Although my colleague considers this bill as by no means a borrowing of money, gentlemen who act with him contend that it is, in effect and substance, a mode of making a loan. If that be so, sir, it is not the less unconstitutional; for it has the form and semblance of bills of credit. And although bills of credit may be, in effect and substance, a loan, they are not the less unconstitutional.

al; for the constitution prescribes the form and manner of raising money. It allows you no discretion as to the form and manner. If this be substantially a loan, borrow the money, as the constitution directs you.

But it is objected that borrowing money is a dangerous expedient, inasmuch as it creates a national debt, and therefore that bills of credit are better. So thought not the convention; and, for my part, (though I have no fancy for a national debt,) I would rather encounter it than be wise beyond the constitution. Whether the issuing of bills of credit does not create a debt equally with the borrowing of money, I shall inquire by and by. For the present, I have to say that I greatly prefer the plan of borrowing, not only because it is prescribed in the constitution, (always sufficient for me,) but because it brings you fairly before the people, drags you from your lurking places, overrules your pleas in abatement, and puts you at the bar of your country. Yes, Mr. President, go to the people, the people whose money you have squandered, whose commerce you have broken down, whose riches you have destroyed, go and ask them, in the constitutional modes which they have prescribed, for more money. If you desire to avoid any thing but the appearance of a national debt, advance boldly to the people and ask for money. Send out your tax collectors. Abandon this paltry subterfuge, and come up openly to your object, with all your purposes avowed and acted upon. Send the tax collector with your demands for money—for hard money, Mr. President. I should be glad to see you send your taxgatherers through the country with their leathern bags or green purses demanding to have them filled with hard money. This would bring your theories to the test. This would decide the question as to what medium you should be paid in.—Demand gold of the hard-handed farmer, who has returned from market with the proceeds of his produce, and when he offers you what the policy of his state has placed him under the necessity of taking, tell him that you scorn his dirty trash, that precious metal alone is for you. Hold this language to him and to his family, and then, if you can come back here with your wild schemes, do so, and make the most of them. I should most heartily rejoice to see your system, for a short time, brought practically into operation by a direct tax demanded from the people in gold and silver. It was the great fraud of the tariff system, that its operation upon the tax-paying community was so circuitous and involved as to be difficult of clear, or, at least, of succinct exposition. The process admitted of cavil and mystification. So, too, in the system of measures now recommended, and especially in the bill now before us. You disguise and conceal the ultimate effect, by throwing it upon a future time when it will be mixed up with other matters, in the confusion of which you may find an argument or make a subterfuge. I defy, I dare, the administration to come out frankly with their projects, so as to submit them practically to the people. Demand your deposits from the states, or openly borrow money while you have so much on deposit; or, having dried up the revenue from imports, by destroying commerce, order a direct tax to be paid in specie.

Some senators approve of the proposed issue of treasury notes, because they say they will not agree to create a national debt. I can perceive no difference in effect between the obligation to pay these bills when presented, and any other obligation recognising a debt. A treasury note is issued to discharge a debt now due, by creating another to fall due hereafter. If you borrow money, you acknowledge a debt for money received. When you issue a treasury note you acknowledge a debt for services rendered. I do not think that the honorable chairman of the committee on finance, whose candor and perspicuity are acknowledged on all hands, will contend that this bill does not authorize the creation of a national debt. The senator intimates that he will not contend for it. He admits that it is a national debt. Indeed; the terms of the law of the extra session, which this proposes to revive, are unequivocal. They are:

"That the secretary of the treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be reimbursed and paid the principal and interest of the treasury notes which may be issued by virtue of this act." "For this reimbursement, at the time and times herein specified, the faith of the United States is hereby solemnly pledged."

At the extra session a bill for the issue of ten millions of treasury notes was passed to meet an emergency, as it was said—an unexpected crisis. Here, now, is another emergency—another unexpected crisis. In truth, sir, I believe the treasury habitually exists in a state of emergency—in a critical condition. But admit that we are overtaken by circumstances which wisdom could not foresee or prudence avert—what is our duty? Why, to do what is necessary to pass the crisis, and nothing more, until we can sit down coolly and devise the most appropriate measures. And this is the course indicated by the amendment proposed by the senator from Massachusetts. He proposes to grant two millions of treasury notes, which will relieve the pressing necessities of the government, and allow us time to look about us. Indeed, sir, I believe that a hesitating and stinted allowance, from time to time, just enough to keep us along, might tend to enforce a wise lesson of practical economy. We have long wasted our substance with riotous living, and it may be well for us to be reduced to husks for a season, that we may be brought to acknowledge our sins. Undoubtedly, Mr. President, when we do so, and return to the safe precepts of our fathers, we shall be again in the midst of comfort and abundance. But this consummation will be postponed yet for a year or two; and for that time, perhaps, it will be necessary to provide. I, sir, prefer borrowing to treasury notes. But why resort to either beyond the immediate pressure of the moment, when the president tells us, and we all know, that we have 28 millions of deposits? Call in your debts; check for your deposits. The course is direct, plain, obvious; precisely that which any prudent individual would pursue: being pressed by his wants or his creditors, he would call upon his debtors. This, sir, is your only true policy; but, instead of it, you propose to create a national debt, to encourage stockjobbing and speculation, and to lay the foundation of a future high tariff. I warn my colleagues of the south that this creation of a national debt is playing into the hands of those who have deceived us once upon the tariff, and fastened it on us. I beg them to remember that the administration opposed the compromise, and endeavored, at the last session, to violate it; and boasted that they would have succeeded but for the South Carolina votes. I beg them to remember that a national debt in 1842 will be cause for a new imposition of duties; and that, at this moment, and forward to that period, this blundering and falling party in power could desire nothing more ardently than to have a vital question of this kind open for them to play their desperate party game with.

What were the terms on which we deposited the surplus revenue with the states? Did we say to them it is a gift, or did we not, on the contrary, expressly deny that position? I call to the recollection of the senate the facts in relation to that bill, the manner of the execution of which is the true source of the distress which we all now feel. When the opponents of the bill charged upon us that our real object was to give the money to the states, we repelled the charge with indignation. For myself I thought the charge an imputation on my political honor. I would have voted against the bill had I believed that to be its purpose. In that view its operation was most unequal. It gave to my own state in the proportion of one million of dollars to four millions to New York; yet my state contributes to the revenue in the inverse ratio of what she received. The southern doctrine is, that the states pay into the coffers of the general government in proportion to their exportations, and not their consumption. If that doctrine be true, (and, have seen no reason to disbelieve its truth,) then I should have been most unwilling for South Carolina to receive so small a pittance of what she contributed to the revenue, while New York received four times as much. But I denied it to be a gift, and I stated at that time, in my place, that if the general government should ever be in a condition to need the money, I was ready to pledge my state that it should be paid back to the last dollar. I now call upon the senate to carry out, in good faith, the provisions and principles of the deposit bill, and to demand from all the states their respective quotas of the amount then deposited with them. The deposits were made with the states according to their population.

As the bill originally passed, it would have been the imperative duty of the secretary of the treasury, in the present state of our finances, to have promptly demanded whatever sums are necessary, the precise contingency contemplated in the act having occurred. At the last session, however, it was supposed that the discretion of determining on this contingency could be more safely confided to congress, and, therefore, the act was so amended as to require that the legislature should, at its pleasure, make the demand. If the case provided for has occurred, it is as much our duty to proceed as it would have been that of the secretary; and I now demand of gentlemen, "how dare you, in the face of this act, presume to borrow money? how dare you, with such a resource at your command, resort to any other means whatever?" By passing the bill before you, you ipso facto repeal the deposit law. No gentleman will suppose that that law is at an end, and all hope from that quarter out of the question, for the president himself talks to us about the twenty-eight millions on deposit and due to the government. The question is, whether you will now repeal it, and thus place the southern states in a condition where they may be ground down under a system of excessive taxation.

But it is said the states might find it inconvenient to repay this money, and that the demand may oppress them. If it be so, for one, I had rather that South Carolina should meet the demand now, than meet it in the shape of a tariff four years hence. Her credit is good, her resources abundant, and, if she has not got the money, she can borrow it on as good terms as you can. So can all the other states. Their credit is as good as yours: It will be easy for the states to meet the emergency. It may be said that these quotas from the states will not be enough, even with the two millions of the treasury notes. Add what, by the terms of the act, you are at liberty to draw from them, to the proceeds of the sale of the United States Bank bonds and the accruing revenue, and you will find there is enough, even for your habitual prodigality; but if it be not, then your reduced means will enforce a salutary economy—an economy which, I believe, nothing but the iron hand of necessity can enforce. It is one of the most difficult efforts of private life to break through fixed habits of extravagant living, and reduce one's expenditure within the limits of a reduced income. Nor is this difficulty owing alone to the violence done by such a process to our vanity or pride. It is still more the violence which must be done to the force of habit. It is, in fact, a change in our mode of existence. And if this is so difficult with individuals, it is, on every account, still more difficult with governments. Now, the government of this country, since the coming in of this most economical administration which ever prospered economy, has, in three years, spent upwards of $100,000,000. Under this most virtuous, most patriotic, most pure and self-denying, and most economical of all possible parties, thus much has been expended; and there are now propositions before the two houses of congress for the expenditure of $40,000,000. Sir, this evil has a perpetual growth, and I see the necessity of applying to it an immediate and effective, though perhaps an unwelcome and caustic, remedy. Let the government be taught by necessity to cut down its expenditures. Extravagance is our disease, retrenchment our only remedy.

This bill comes to us under peculiar circumstances. It is perfectly well known that the popular branch of this government would never have passed this bill but under the most pressing apprehension that the fund for internal improvements would be exhausted without it. It is, in fact, a bill to raise funds for internal improvement. A few votes would have turned the scale. Who knows, but, after all, it was passed for the sake of some harbor on Lake Ontario, where a member's constituents had the hope that $10,000 or $20,000 of the public money was to be expended? Who can say but it was the Cumberland road itself that passed the bill? Sir, you know how these things are managed. The constituents of gentlemen are in the habit of instructing them, or at least of electing them under a pledge or understanding that they shall vote for some expenditures in their quarter. Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, had been interested in the Cumberland road, and they had all had their day; now Ohio, Indiana and Illinois come upon the field; they insist upon their share of the road. Its refreshing, its fertilizing influence is to proceed westward. The people will have it. They hold their representatives responsible, especially when on their return home they will have to mount the steps or the stump, and demonstrate to their constituents that they had lost the road because treasury notes were a bad thing, and their representatives could not vote for them. To hold language like this, requires some courage; and while I would speak with due respect of those in both houses, to whom the people have thought fit to confide their most important interests, I cannot but remember that, after all, they are men and of like passions with others. And yet, notwithstanding that, the progress of internal improvement, the progress of the Cumberland road, depended upon this bill; notwithstanding, that it had in its favor all the seductive influence of light-houses and harbors, which without it would perish, that bill was sent to us by a tie vote.

It will not be in order for me, at this time, to offer the amendment I propose, unless that offered by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) or something like it, shall be adopted. If it be true that the whole amount of $10,000,000 is immediately required, then there is no occasion for my amendment. But surely the whole cannot at once be called for. If $2,000,000 are insufficient, $5,000,000 will surely do for the present. I cannot, myself, vote for any which contemplates the issue of treasury notes; but, if the amendment of the honorable gentleman succeed, I shall then offer for the adoption of the senate, the following:

And be it further enacted, That the secretary of the treasury is hereby authorized and required to make the requisitions upon the states according to the provisions of the act of the 23d of June, 1836, for such sums as the expenses of the government may require.

[At a subsequent stage of the debate—

Mr. Calhoun said that his colleague had made an objection against the constitutionality of this bill, which he deemed proper to notice. It was a rule with him, where the constitution is supposed to be involved, to bestow his serious consideration before he acted, and, if he saw reasons to doubt, not to give his assent. He had complied with the rule in this case, and the result was a clear conviction that the bill was constitutional. The right had been exercised from the commencement of the government, without being before questioned; and, according to his conception, came within the powers expressly granted to congress to borrow money, which meant neither more nor less than to raise supplies on the public credit. Interest was not essential to borrowing; and it would be ridiculous to suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to authorize the raising of the supplies with interest, and to prohibit it without it. But we are told that treasury notes are bills of credit, and that the constitution does not authorize congress to issue bills of credit. He did not deem it necessary to go into a formal discussion on either point. He denied that they were bills of credit in any proper sense of those terms. They were intended to raise supplies to meet a temporary deficit in the treasury, and were, in fact, nothing more than means of anticipating the revenue.

But he would not pursue the argument. He would bring it to a short and decisive issue with his colleague. His colleague is the strenuous advocate of the joint resolution of 1816, which authorizes the collection of the public dues in the notes of specie-paying banks, and has no scruples as to the right of collecting in the notes of the banks that do not pay specie. Now, no one will deny, that to authorize the receipt of bank notes in the dues of the government is virtually to endorse on each note that it shall be received in the public dues; or that, if the government had the right to do the one, it had the right to do the other. Nor will it be denied that, if the government has the right to write on the back of a bank note that it will be received in the public dues, it has an equal right to write the same on a blank piece of paper, or, which is the same thing, to make a treasury note. The truth is, that to authorize bank notes to be received in the public dues is neither more nor less than to make them, to that extent, treasury notes, and is, pro tanto, as much the making and issuing such notes as if done on a separate piece of paper. If the one be unconstitutional, the other is clearly so. Now, he would make the bargain with his colleague and other advocates of the connexion with the banks: if they will give up the use of bank paper by the government, he would give up the use of treasury notes; and, if they will deny the constitutionality of receiving bank notes, he would not insist on the constitutionality of treasury notes; and, in so doing, he should make a very good bargain for the country. But he was utterly unwilling to admit a construction which, while it denied to the government the use of its own credit, would give the monopoly of it to the banks.]

Mr. Preston. I beg leave to say a word or two by way of rejoinder to my colleague's reply to the constitutional objections which I urged when I first spoke.

In the first place, he states that the right to issue treasury notes has been exercised from the foundation of the government. So has the right to establish a bank. So has the right to receive bank paper in public dues, the denial of which right, under the constitution is the foundation of my colleague's new theory of finance.

2dly. He says it is expressly granted in the power to borrow money, under which this is included; and yet he says that he never will, in war or in peace, borrow money, or in anywise create a national debt. But the constitution makes a distinction between bills of credit and borrowing money; for the issuing of the former is prohibited to the states, while no one doubts that they may borrow money.

He says it would be ridiculous to suppose that the framers of the constitution intended to authorize the raising of supplies with interest, and not without it; and yet, by Luther Martin's report of the proceedings of the convention, it appears that that body, after much and warm discussion, denied to congress the power to issue bills of credit, and granted the power to borrow money; for a very obvious reason—the borrowing of money does not make money; the issuing of bills of credit is making money, is creating a circulation, which is the avowed object of this bill. My colleague denies that these are bills of credit. Judge Marshall defines a bill of credit to be paper issued on the faith of the government, intended for circulation. No one can dispute the correctness of this definition, or that these treasury notes are expressly within its terms. My colleague states that these notes are but means of anticipating the revenue. This is the sole purpose of all bills of credit, of all loans, of all national debts.

But my colleague states, with an air of triumph, that I am in favor of the resolution of 1816, which authorizes the receipt of bank notes, and which is equal to the endorsement of such notes by the government, and thinks this is inconsistent with my views in regard to treasury notes. If this be so, then my colleague, in objecting to the resolution of 1816, acts inconsistently with his approbation of these treasury notes, which, he says, are the same thing. His proposition against me is, that I should hold these treasury notes to be constitutional, because I hold the receipt of bank bills under the resolution of 1816 to be constitutional. Does he not perceive that the converse is true; that he, condemning the resolution of 1816, should also condemn these treasury notes? Besides, sir, that part of the resolution of 1816 is my colleague's own proper work, upon the constitutionality of which he no doubt bestowed his serious consideration before he acted. If the two things are virtually the same, then I have my colleague's authority, by his present vote, for the constitutionality of the receiving of bank paper. If they be not the same, then his argument has no bearing.

But there is, Mr. President, a most essential difference, both in fact and in theory. By the resolution of 1816 the government does not endorse, actually or virtually, the notes of specie banks. It receives them itself, as long as a note is a check for specie; but it does not guaranty them in the hands of the holders, if the banks fail, which is the only conceivable meaning of endorsement. If there were either an actual or virtual endorsement, the government would at this moment be liable for all the bank paper in the United States.

Again: by receiving bank notes, the government does not create a currency,* but uses one which it finds in existence, and that no longer than it is equivalent to specie; whereas the government paper must be taken, whether equivalent to specie or not.

But, most conclusively, the convention denied to congress the power of issuing bills of credit, while it placed no limit upon its receiving public dues in bank notes: the receipt of which was justified by Mr. Madison in the first congress; has been followed up by the government ever since; was expressly authorized by the amendment made upon my colleague's motion to the resolution of 1816; and never doubted until within these six months. I rejoice, Mr. President, that my colleague has put the question on this short and decisive issue.

* Two very different men, but each having weight with certain classes of politicians, have entertained similar sentiments.

General Hamilton said: "The emitting of paper money by the authority of government is wisely prohibited to the individual states by the national constitution, and the spirit of that prohibition ought not to be disregarded by the government of the United States. Though paper emission, under a general authority, might have some advantages not applicable, and be free from some disadvantages which are applicable to the like emissions by the states separately, yet they are of a nature so liable to abuse, and it may even be affirmed, so certain of being abused, that the wisdom of government will be shown in never trusting itself with the use of so seducing and dangerous an expedient." "The stamping of paper is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, that a government in the practice of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any such emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that recourse, to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity."

General Jackson said: "I hope no treasury notes will be issued. The treasury drafts upon actual deposits are constitutional, and do not partake of paper credits as treasury notes, which are subject to depreciation by the merchants and banks, and shavers and brokers; and will be, if issued, and the government cannot avoid it."

TWENTY-FIFTH CONGRESS.

SECOND SESSION—SENATE.

June 15. Among the petitions presented to day one was by Mr. Tallmadge from Henry Hall Sherwood, relating to discoveries in magnetism made by him, and improvements in the construction and use of the magnetic needle. Read, referred, and ordered to be printed.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Michigan.

This bill was discussed at much length by Messrs. Lyon, Clay, of Ala. Prentiss, Webster, Norvell, Tipton, King, Smith, of Ind., Clay, of Ky., Young, and Sevier.

The chief arguments in favor of the bill were understood to be the security of the documents relating to the surveys, and the facilities which would be afforded to purchasers to determine the boundaries of their lands.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, stated, in the course of the discussion, that there were now sixty-four land offices in the country, twenty-one of which had been created since the commencement of the late administration, and seven offices of surveyor-general, two of which had been created since that time; whereas, Pennsylvania and Virginia, with Kentucky annexed, had each had but a single land office.

Mr. Prentiss, offered an amendment, requiring that the field notes and other papers descriptive of the boundaries of lands surveyed should be deposited with the secretary of state of the respective states in which the lands lie.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, who wished also to offer an amendment, (understood to be a provision for a surveyor-general for Indiana also.) the bill was, for the present, laid on the table—Ayes 17, noes not counted.

On motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate disagreed to the substitute of the house for the senate bill to change the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the ninth circuit. So the bill was sent back to the house as it originally passed the senate.

The senate bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands was received from the other house with amendments, which were subsequently taken up for consideration.

Mr. White offered a substitute for an amendment by the house relating to reservations of Choctaw lands.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, also sent to the table an amendment to the bill, in the form of an additional section, disallowing floating pre-emption claims under the various pre-emption laws.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the bill was then laid on the table, and ordered to be printed with the amendments.

The Vice President presented a communication from the war department, in pursuance of a senate resolution, with a communication from the adjutant general, in relation to the hostile disposition of Indians on the Arkansas frontier, stating, on the authority of a letter from gen. Arbuckle, which letter, from prudential motives, was withheld, that hostile intentions had been manifested in the councils of several Indian tribes, but also expressing the hope that such hostile designs would not be matured. Referred to the committee on military affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The bill to establish an additional land office in Louisiana, and the bill to incorporate the navy yard beneficial society of the city of Washington, were severally considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The senate proceeded to consider the bill from the house, authorizing the Washington monument society to erect a monument to the memory of Washington on the public mall. Mr. Preston objected to the site as too low, and said on that account he should vote against the bill. Mr. Bayard objected to the site, that the monument would greatly injure the beauty of the view west of the capitol. Mr. Allen inquired what was the amount of means which had been collected from all parts of the country. Mr. Roane replied that it had been stated at $30,000. Mr. Allen then, in a speech of considerable length, and great earnestness (in which he was vigorously seconded by his colleague, Mr. Morris.) expressed his decided belief that more than $30,000 had been collected for this object in Ohio alone, as $1,000 were known (by Mr. Morris) to have been collected in one small county; and Mr. A. made a variety of very strong insinuations that there must be fraud somewhere.

Mr. Hubbard expressed surprise at the smallness of the sum, declared it wholly inadequate to the object, and urged that the government should have nothing whatever to do with the subject further than to grant a site for the monument.

On motion of Mr. Morris, the bill was indefinitely postponed, without a division. The senate took up the bill for the relief of general Alexander Macomb. Mr. Hubbard explained and advocated the bill at length. Mr. Buchanan desired to make some remarks on the bill, but, declining to speak on account of the smallness of the number present, The senate adjourned.

June 16. Mr. Buchanan presented three memorials from citizens of Philadelphia city and county, praying the immediate passage of the sub-treasury bill. Laid on the table.

Messrs. Norvell, Clayton, Buchanan, and Pierce, reported without amendment, from committees, various private bills referred to them.

On motion of Mr. Roane, the secretary of the navy was directed to communicate to the senate the proceedings of a court martial at Gosport, on the case of captain William Ramsay, of the navy.

Several bills from the house were read twice, and referred.

The bills to establish an additional land office in Louisiana, and to incorporate the navy yard beneficial society of the city of Washington, were severally read a third time and passed.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to create the office of surveyor-general of the public lands in Michigan.

Mr. Prentiss temporarily withdrew his amendment requiring the field-notes and other documents relating to surveys to be deposited, when the duties of the land office should terminate, with the secretary of state of Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, respectively.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, then offered a substitute for the bill, providing for the removal of the present surveyor general's office for Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan, from Cincinnati to Michigan city, in Indiana. Mr. S.'s substitute also embraced Mr. Prentiss' above amendment as a second section to the bill. Mr. Norvell moved to strike out "Michigan city, in Indiana," from this substitute, and insert Detroit, in Michigan.

This question being divided, the motion to strike out was carried—Ayes 17, noes 10.

Mr. Norvell then withdrew his motion to insert Detroit. Mr. Tipton said his object was to transfer the office of surveyor-general from Cincinnati, a point where it was not convenient to the lands yet to survey, to the vicinity of the place where the public work was to be performed. Two years ago the senate passed a bill to remove the office from Cincinnati to South Bend, a flourishing town within five miles of the line between Indiana and Michigan; that bill did not become a law. The amendment offered by his honorable colleague proposed to remove the office to Michigan city, Indiana. That place was now stricken out of the amendment by a majority of the senate. The member from Michigan (Mr. Norvell) had proposed Detroit, but withdrew it. He (Mr. T.) was not actuated by a wish to injure any individual or state, or to benefit any local interest, but to serve the country. He moved, therefore, to fill the blank with the town of St. Joseph's, Michigan. This was a flourishing town, on Lake Michigan, at the mouth of the St. Joseph's river, about thirty miles north of the line dividing Indiana and Michigan, accessible to steamboats at all seasons of the year, when not obstructed by ice, and about equidistant from the south boundary of Indiana and the north of Michigan, convenient to all concerned.

After some conversation, the question on this motion was put, and it was carried in the affirmative: Yeas 27, noes 4.

Mr. Lyon spoke in favor of creating a new office for Michigan, and of abolishing the old office whenever the occasion for its existence should cease.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, and Mr. Lumpkin, spoke briefly but earnestly against creating a new office for Michigan, as an unnecessary extension of executive patronage, and in favor of the removal proposed by the substitute, as highly liberal to Michigan, on the part of the senators from Indiana.

The question of liberality was briefly contested by Messrs. Norvell and Lyon on the one part, and Messrs. Smith, of Indiana, and Tipton, on the other.

The question was put on the first part of the substitute of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, as amended, simply requiring the removal of the present office from Cincinnati to St. Joseph's, in Michigan, and it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Lumpkin, Morris, Niles, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Indiana, Strange, Swift, Tipton, White—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce,

Robinson, Smith, of Connecticut, Trotter, Wright, Young—19.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, moved to lay the bill on the table, with a view to prepare an amendment for abolishing old land offices when no longer required.

Mr. Tipton moved to lay the bill finally on the table, which motion was carried in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Cutlibert, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Morris, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, White, Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Pierce, Prentiss, Robinson, Trotter, Young—6.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, from the committee on public lands, reported the bill with the amendments referred to them, granting pre-emption to settlers on the public lands, with recommendations that the amendment of Mr. White to the amendment of the house relating to Choctaw reservations be adopted, and that the amendments of the house so amended be then concurred in.

Mr. White's amendment was accordingly agreed to.

At the request of Mr. Young, who expressed a wish slightly to modify one of the amendments of the other house, the bill was temporarily laid on the table; subsequently taken up, the amendments of the other house further modified, and concurred in by the senate, and the bill was sent back to the other house for concurrence.

The senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of major general Alexander Macomb.

The question at issue on this bill was understood to be whether or not a brigadier general, being a major-general by brevet, should, when his command merely exceeded a brigade, without amounting to a full division, receive the pay of his brevet rank.

The bill, at much length, was opposed by Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Prentiss, Nicholas, and White, and advocated by Messrs. Hubbard and Strange.

On the question of its engrossment for a third reading, the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Clayton, Hubbard, Lyon, Norvell, Preston, Strange, Tallmadge,—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Lumpkin, McKean, Mouton, Nicholas, Niles, Prentiss, Bives, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Smith, of Indiana, Swift, Tipton, Trotter, White, Young—23.

So the bill was then rejected, and the senate adjourned.

June 18. Mr. Buchanan presented six memorials from citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying the immediate passage of the sub-treasury bill, and remonstrating against a bank of the United States. Laid on the table.

Also, a remonstrance from citizens of Philadelphia against the passage of an international copyright law. Referred to the committee on patents.

Also, a memorial from citizens of the District of Columbia and others, recommending to congress the making provision to send a diplomatic agent to Hayti. Laid on the table.

Mr. Tallmadge said he rose to ask the unanimous consent of the senate to bring in a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases. I introduced this subject, some time since, said Mr. T. to the attention of the senate, by presenting a petition for that purpose, and referring it to the committee on the Judiciary. I had hoped that that committee, who are so abundantly competent, would have digested a bill for the abolishment of imprisonment for debt in all cases on process issuing out of the courts of the United States. I am aware of the difficulties in framing the details of such a bill; and am also aware that there might be a difference of opinion as to its adoption. I fully appreciate the situation of the committee, and do not intend, in the slightest degree, to complain of their inaction.

For myself, I am free to say, I am in favor of such a bill in its broadest terms. I was a member of the New York legislature when the act of that state passed abolishing imprisonment for debt. There was much difference of opinion then existing on that subject. But, I believe, since the practical operation of the act has been seen and felt, it has become entirely satisfactory to the great body of that community. So it would be in the United States, if congress would adopt the measure. The example of this government, too, would have a tendency to do away that relic of barbarism in those states where it still exists.

At this late period in the session I am unwilling to present a bill so broad in its operation as to call for debate, either upon its general principles, or the detail of its provisions, and thereby defeat its passage at this time. I will, therefore, content myself with a measure which I trust will meet the approbation of all, and which will receive the favorable action of congress before its adjournment. I propose that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any state on process issuing out of a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such state, imprisonment for debt has been abolished. This proposition, I think, cannot be reasonably objected to from any quarter. It will answer the present emergency, and congress can hereafter, with full deliberation, act on the general question of unlimited and unconditional abolishment of imprisonment for debt in all cases within its jurisdiction. I consider it the relic of a barbarous age, unsuited to the times in which we live, and derogatory to the free institutions under which it is tolerated.

I will not detain the senate by any discussion of the general question. I wish merely to call the attention of senators to the precise proposition which I intend to submit at this time.

Much excitement prevails, and justly prevails, in the city of New York, on this subject. Whilst our own citizens are exempt from imprisonment under the process of our own courts, still they, as well as strangers and citizens from our states, are incarcerated under process from the courts of the United States. This is a strange anomaly, and ought not to exist. I am told that the jail in the city of New York is crowded with unfortunate debtors from other states, who have been arrested and committed to prison, for want of bail, under the laws of the United States, and who would have been exempted from imprisonment under the law of the state of New York. These citizens have gone there on business—mercantile business, perhaps; for New York is the great commercial emporium "where merchants most do congregate." Shall it be tolerated that the rights of the citizen shall be thus invaded? The constitution says, "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." It may well be doubted whether, under this clause, the citizens of another state can be imprisoned for debt by process from the courts of the United States, in a state where, by law, imprisonment for debt has been abolished. It is, at least, against the spirit of the constitution. I merely make this suggestion from first impression, without having bestowed a thought upon it to enable me to go into a constitutional argument. I wish to avoid all such discussions at this time. My proposition does not necessarily lead to them. But, I ask, shall it be tolerated that the laws of the general government shall be used as an engine of oppression, and to supersede the benign and philanthropic legislation of the states? The process of your courts is abused. It is used to evade and defeat the spirit of the laws of the states. Until all the states adopt this humane principle, there will be difficulties enough, as between themselves, without superadding the oppression of the general government.

By the law of New York, her citizens are exempt from imprisonment within her own borders. But if one of them can seize another in a state where imprisonment is not abolished, he can imprison him there, although by our own laws he would be exempt at home. This evil can only be corrected by the legislation of the respective states. There are evils, however, which the legislation of congress alone can reach. Notwithstanding the laws of New York exempt her own citizens, yet, if the plaintiff resides in another state, he may imprison the defendant in New York, under process from the courts of the United States. And I am told it is not unusual for a demand to be transferred to a friend in an adjoining state for the mere purpose of enforcing it in that manner. So, too, may citizens of other states, although exempted by our laws, be imprisoned in New York by like process from courts of the United States.

I have merely alluded to these cases by way of illustration, and by way of showing the crying evil under which many of our citizens are now laboring. When I said the jail in New York was crowded with unfortunate debtors, it was no "fancy sketch." The subject has been deemed worthy the presentation of a grand jury of that city. They visited, in a body, the prison, and "were shown a range of twelve cells, of the dimensions of about ten feet by seven each, occupied, as they were informed by the keeper, by twenty-three individuals, or about two to each cell. These cells, originally designed for the occupation of but one person, are obviously not sufficiently well ventilated for the accommodation of two, particularly during the present extreme heat of the weather. In addition to this, from the manner of the building and consequent dampness of the cells, the walls of which are plastered upon stone, they are deemed as yet to be in a very unfit situation to be tenanted by individuals whose lives or health are of the least importance to themselves, to families from whom they may be separated, or to the community at large. It is but an act of justice to say that the arrangement of two persons in a cell was dictated by motives of humanity, as being the best that could be done under existing circumstances, the ground tier of cells, from their excessive dampness, being absolutely untenable. From the nature of the laws of our state upon the subject of imprisonment for debt, the persons thus confined are strangers, and certainly not a class who are to be considered as having, on that account, a diminished claim upon our sympathy. Among their complaints of severe colds and various rheumatic affections resulting from the causes adverted to, some were of a character such as, being thus brought to the notice of the proper authorities, we are persuaded will not fail to receive that immediate and proper attention for which the circumstances call."

There is no doubt that the proper authorities will do all in their power, and all that humanity requires, to alleviate the condition of these unfortunate debtors.

I would remind the senate that, as appears from the presentment of the grand jury, "the persons thus confined are strangers," citizens of other states, and all imprisoned under the benign laws of the United States! Is there a senator here whose blood does not boil with indignation at the very idea that a citizen of his own state should be thus confined, like a felon, far from his home, beyond the reach of friendly sympathy, with perhaps a wife and children dependent on him for support, and anxiously waiting his return? Is there a senator here who will, for one moment, consent that the health, and perhaps the life, of that citizen shall be sacrificed, or even jeopardized, under the operation of the barbarous code which still prevails in this government?

"Shut from the common air, and common use
Of their own limbs, how many drink the cup
Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread
Of misery!"

If such would be the feelings of every senator, let him unite with me to wipe this foul blot from the statute-books of the nation.

Leave was accordingly granted; the bill was introduced, read twice, and referred.

On motion of Messrs. Hubbard and Sevier, committees were discharged from the further consideration of various private claims.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, the senate took up the motion of Mr. Williams for leave to introduce a bill to provide for the survey and determination of the northeastern boundary line of the United States according to the provisions of the treaty of 1783.

Mr. Buchanan at much length proceeded to prove, by documents and arguments, that this boundary was well defined, and easy to be ascertained; but he opposed the bill as likely, under existing circumstances, to lead to unnecessary war, though he declared himself ready to go to war rather than Maine should be dismembered. In conclusion, he gave notice that if it should be returned to the senate by the committee on foreign relations, and should come up for consideration, he would then move for indefinite postponement.

Mr. Davis argued and insisted, in reply to Mr. Buchanan, that an order for a survey was in itself, even under the circumstances, no other than a pacific measure. He also at some length adduced additional facts and arguments to those already adduced, to show that the boundary of the treaty was altogether definite and easily found.

Mr. Williams also addressed the senate on the subject, especially in reply to a remark of Mr. Buchanan, that Maine had acted in somewhat of passion, Mr. W. going into the history of the case to show that Maine had acted at least with great coolness and deliberation.

Mr. W. also argued at length in favor of the bill, and further in reply to Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, having expressed a desire to speak on the subject,

The senate held an executive session, and then adjourned.

June 19. After some remarks of Messrs. Morris and Allen, of Ohio, in relation to an article which appeared in the Intelligencer of this morning on the subject of the Washington Monument, and a complimentary notice from Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, to the decorum and correctness of that print.

The Vice President presented a communication from the navy department, in obedience to a senate resolution of the 16th instant, with a copy of the proceedings of the naval court martial held at Gosport on the case of captain William Ramsay, and with the subsequent correspondence. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Several reports from committees were received; among them the following:

By Mr. Roane, from the committee on the District of Columbia, the bill referred to them in relation to the orphans' court of the county of Alexandria, D. C., with an amendment, which was read and agreed to; and the bill, by consent, was ordered to a third reading.

By Mr. Grundy, from the committee on the judiciary, the bill referred to them to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, with an amendment, the design of which was to make the abolition by this bill of imprisonment for debt correspond with its abolition in the respective states where such imprisonment had in whole or in part been abolished; which amendment was read, and the bill taken up for consideration.

After a few explanatory remarks by Mr. Grundy and by Mr. Tallmadge, urging the importance of speedy action on the bill,

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, who expressed some doubt as to the practicability of carrying all the provisions of this bill, as it now stood, into effect, and with the assent of Mr. Tallmadge, the bill was laid on the table till to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, with the amendment.

The senate resumed the consideration of the senate bill granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, as amended by the other house—the question being on a motion of Mr. Young, the effect of which was to disagree to that portion of the other house which excluded from pre-emption lands laid out into town or village lots.

Mr. Lyon offered an amendment to this motion, the effect of which was to exempt from this exclusion such lands as had been purchased by others from those who purchased them originally from the government. This amendment Mr. L. subsequently withdrew.

The bill and the amendment were discussed, passim, by Messrs. Lyon, Robinson, Clay, of Kentucky, Sevier, Young, Prentiss, Morris, Tipton, Hubbard, Smith, of Conn., King, Clay, of Ala., and Bayard.

Mr. Young's amendment, granting (in effect) pre-emption to lands laid out into town and village lots, was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Buchanan, Calhoun, Grundy, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholas, Roane, Robinson, Wall, White, Young—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Ala., Clay, of Ken., Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Hubbard, Knight, Lyon, Merrick, Morris, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Rivers, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Strange, Tipton, Williams, Wright—26.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, stated that the effect of one of the amendments of the other house, which had not been noticed by senators, was to subject to the provisions of this bill certain lands which had heretofore been always reserved from pre-emption. These were lands which it was supposed might be covered by valid French or Spanish claims, much of which, being near populous settlements, had now become very valuable. Mr. C. especially specified certain lands of this class in the vicinity of St. Louis, which he said would sell at once for $10 per acre. Mr. C. in conclusion, moved to amend this amendment of the other house, so as to exclude all lands of this class from being subject to pre-emption under this bill.

This motion was carried in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Ken., Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, King, Knight, McKean, Merrick, Niles, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Robbins, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tipton, Wall, White, Williams—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Clay, of Ala., Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, Lumpkin, Lyon, Mouton, Nicholas, Norvell, Rivers, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Trotter, Wright, Young—19.

The amendment of the other house, as amended by the senate, were then concurred in, yeas 42 nays Mr. Robinson and Young; and the bill with the amendments, was sent back to the other house for concurrence.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

June 20. After some unimportant business, on motion of Mr. Grundy, the senate took up the bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases. The question being on the amendment from the committee on the judiciary, the design of which was to make the operation of this bill correspond with the operation of the laws of the states, respectively, in which imprisonment for debt is in part or wholly abolished.

After a discussion (a report of which shall have a place hereafter) in which the bill was opposed by Messrs. Preston and Bayard, and advocated by Messrs. Tallmadge and Norvell, the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Prentiss, the bill was further amended, so as to require the same proceedings under the bill as are adopted in the courts of the states respectively.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay, of Alabama, Clay, of Kentucky, Fulton, Grundy, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Lyon, McKean, Merrick, Morris, Monton, Nicholas, Niles, Norvell, Pierce, Prentiss, Robbins, Robinson, Ruggles, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Smith, of Indiana, Spence, Strange, Swift, Tallmadge, Tip-ton, Wall, White, Williams, Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clayton, Preston, Roane—4.

Subsequently the bill was, by consent, read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Grundy, offered a resolution, which lies over one day, fixing the daily assembling of the senate at 11 o'clock A. M. instead of 12, till otherwise ordered by the senate.

On motion of Mr. King, the committee on the post office and post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a new post route through Brownsville and other towns in Alabama.

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Williams' motion for leave to bring in a bill to provide for the survey and determination of the northeastern boundary of the United States according to the treaty of 1733.

The debate on this subject (to be given hereafter) was continued and maintained throughout the day, by Messrs. Clay, of Kentucky, Buchanan, Davis, Wright, Culhoun, and Rives.

Leave was granted, and the bill was introduced and read twice.

Mr. Williams, moved to refer the bill to a special committee.

Mr. Wright moved to refer it to the committee on foreign relations.

Messrs. Davis and Williams advocated its reference to a special committee, on the ground that the chairman and another most prominent member of the committee on foreign relations had already declared themselves hostile to the bill, and that courtesy and equity demanded that it should at least go to an impartial committee.

Messrs. Wright, Rives, Culhoun, and Buchanan advocated its reference to the committee on foreign relations, on the ground that it involved questions of high import in regard to our foreign relations.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, urged that it should take that course which, if possible, should obtain the unanimous approbation of the senate, union of action being more important than any particular manner of action.

The bill was referred to the committee on foreign relations.

The senate adjourned, after an executive session.

June 21. The day was principally occupied in a discussion growing out of the presentation, by Mr. Niles, of resolutions of the legislature of Connecticut, against the sub-treasury-bill, &c. After which,

The senate spent some time in executive session, and then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, June 14, (evening session.) After some remarks from Mr. Word, of Mississippi, in favor of the bill, and against the pending amendment, as reported in the morning's proceedings,

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, moved a call of the house; which motion was negatived.

Mr. Lincoln's pending amendment (providing that the pre-emptionist shall have held no former pre-emption right,) was then acted on, and rejected by the following vote: Yeas 75, nays 93.

Mr. Briggs offered an amendment, which he explained as being intended to limit the action of the law to the honest bona fide actual settler, and to preclude speculators in pre-emption rights. He asked, and obtained the yeas and nays on the amendment.

After some conversation as to the expediency of this amendment,

Mr. Underwood moved to recommit the bill, with instructions, as follows:

"That the said bill be referred to a select committee to be composed of one member from each state, with instructions to report a bill repealing all laws which direct the sale of the public lands or any part thereof, at public auction, and graduating the price of the public lands in such manner as the committee may deem reasonable, fixing different prices for the public land; having respect to the periods of time they may remain unsold after being brought into market, and providing for the distribution of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, or the lands themselves, among the several states according to their federal members, from and after such day as the committee may deem proper, and providing for pre-emptions in favor of all those now bona fide settled upon the public lands, with a view to secure homes for themselves and families, and not to secure the lands for others, and to prevent settlements upon the public land from being made after the passage of this act, until the lands are legally entered and paid for."

Mr. Briggs, at the suggestion of several members, modified his proposition, so as to read as follows:

"That before any person claiming the benefit of this law shall have a patent for the land which he may claim by having complied with its provisions he shall make oath before some person authorized by law to administer the same, which oath, with the certificate of the person administering it, shall be filed with the register of the proper office, when the land is applied for, and by said register sent to the office of the commissioner of public lands, that he entered upon the land which he claims in his own right, and exclusively for his own use and benefit, and that he has not, directly or indirectly, made any agreement or contract in any manner with any person or persons whatever, by which the title which he might acquire from the government of the United States should enure to the use and benefit of any one except himself, or to convey or transfer the said land, or the title which he may acquire to the same, to any other person or persons whatever, at any subsequent time; and if such person, claiming the benefit of this law as aforesaid, shall swear falsely in the premises, he shall be subject to all the pains and penalties for perjury, forfeit the money which he may have paid for the land, and all right and title to the said land, and any grant or conveyance which he may have made in pursuance of such agreement or contract as aforesaid, shall be void, except in the hands of a purchaser in good faith for a valuable consideration without notice; and the certificate which shall be filed with the commissioner as aforesaid shall be taken to be conclusive evidence that the oath was legally administered."

There was some further discussion on these and the other amendments, and upon the bill generally; when

Mr. Menefee, after some remarks in opposition to the bill gave notice of his intention to offer an amendment—(which, however, he had not an opportunity of doing.) Mr. Boon, demanded the previous question. Mr. Randolph called the attention of the house to the fact that Mr. Boon had pledged himself that the previous question should not be demanded till candlelight. It was then half past 6 P. M.

After some appeals from various members, Mr. Boon withdrew the proposition, and it was immediately renewed by Mr. Cushman, who thought the debate had occupied a sufficient time already. On seconding the call for the previous question, the division stood: Ayes 86, noes 98. So the house refused to second the demand for the previous question. The question then recurred upon the proposition to recommit with instructions. (See above.) The yeas and nays being ordered, this motion was decided in the negative, as follows: Yeas 79, nays 123. The question recurred upon Mr. Briggs's proposition, (see above,) upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered. Mr. Casey opposed the amendment on the ground that it would encumber the title in every land sale, and would produce endless litigation.

Mr. Titus had read the following amendment, which he gave notice he should offer in case the pending amendment did not prevail:

"Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That every person claiming a pre-emption right shall make an affidavit that the said claim is on his own account and for his own benefit, and not with any previous agreement or understanding with any other person or persons to transfer the same."

The question was then taken on Mr. Briggs's amendment, and resulted in the adoption of that amendment by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Banks, Bell, Biddle, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Bronson, William B. Calhoun, Chambers, Chaney, Childs, Clowney, Coles, Connor, Corwin, Cushing, Darlington, Dawson, Davee, Davis, Deberry, Dennis, Dunn, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, R. Fletcher, Fillmore, R. Garland, Goode, J. Graham, Graves, Greenell, Griffin, Haley, Hall, Halsted, Harlan, Harper, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, Haynes, Henry, Hoffman, Hopkins, R. M. T.

Hunter, Ingham, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, W. C. Johnson, J. W. Jones, Kennedy, Lincoln, S. Mason, Maury, Maxwell, McKay, McKennan, Menefee, Mercer, Milligan, Mitchell, Montgomery, Naylor, Noyes, Ogle, Palmer, Parris, Patterson, Pick, Pennybacker, Phelps, Phillips, Pope, Potts, Pratt, S. S. Prentiss, Randolph, Reed, R. R. R. Rhett, Richardson, Ridgway, Robertson, Robinson, Rumsey, Russell, Sergeant, Shetter, A. H. Shepperd, Sibley, Slade, Southgate, Stanly Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, Underwood, J. White, Elisha Whittlesley, T. T. Whittlesley, L. Williams, Sherod Williams, Word, Yorke—114.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bicknell, Birdsall, Boon Buchanan, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, J. Campbell, Carter, Casey, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Craig, Crary, Crockett, Cushman, Dromgoole, Duncan, Farrington, Fairfield, Foster, Gallup, W. Graham, Grant, Gray, Hammond, Hamer, Herod, Howard, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, T. B. Jackson, N. Jones, Keim, Klingensmith, Leadbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, J. M. Mason, Martin, May, R. McClellan, McClure, Miller, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, C. Morris, Noble, Owens, Parker, Parmenter, Pearce, Petrikin, Plummer, Potter, John H. Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Rives, Shields, Shepler, Snyder, Spencer, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Wagner, Webster, Weeks, Albert S. White, Jared W. Williams, C. H. Williams, Worthington, Yell—86.

Mr. Bell proposed the following amendment:

"And provided further, That the operation of this act shall be suspended as to the lands, and every part of them, which have been contiguous located to the Choctaw Indians in the state of Mississippi, under the instructions of the secretary of war to col. George W. Martin, locating agent, bearing date 13th of October, 1834, and the instructions of Elbert Herring, commissioner of Indian affairs, to the said agent, bearing date the 11th of March, 1835; and as to the lands, and every part of them, of which any Choctaw head of a family had possession at the date of the treaty concluded at Dancing Rabbit Creek, 27th September, 1830, and who signified his or her intention to remain and become a citizen of the United States, according to the provisions of the 14th article of the said treaty, until the final action of congress in relation to the claims of said Indians, under the 14th article of said treaty."

Some conversation as to the expediency and operation of this amendment took place between Messrs. Bell, Prentiss, of Mississippi, Pennybacker, and Lyon, when Mr. May sent to the chair the following amendment, proposed as an amendment to Mr. Bell's motion:

"And that any person, being the head of a family, who now is settled, or shall hereafter settle, on any of the public lands of the United States, and who shall continue to reside on and cultivate the same for the period of twelve months, shall, upon making proof thereof, according to the provisions of this act, be entitled to a right of pre-emption to one quarter section on the terms, conditions, limitations, and restrictions contained in the foregoing section and provisions of this act."

Mr. May defended and explained his amendment, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which the house refused to order. Mr. Sherrod Williams asked for another count: which was granted, and the yeas and nays were ordered. Mr. Potts moved an adjournment. Negatived. Mr. Petrikin demanded the previous question.

Many gentlemen desired to know what would be the main question, if ordered.

The Chair explained that all the amendments reported by the committee of the whole, excepting one, had been adopted by the house. To that one several amendments had been made, and one of these was yet pending. But, as that amendment of the committee had not been adopted, it, with all the amendments proposed thereto, would be cut off, were the main question ordered.

The call for the previous question was not seconded, 52 only voting for it, and the recusants not counted.

The question recurred upon Mr. May's amendment, and was decided as follows: Yeas 52, nays 130.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, proposed the following amendment to the amendment:

"And be it further enacted, That the public faith shall not, by any thing in this act contained, nor by the passage thereof, be considered as pledged, either directly or by implication, that congress will or ought hereafter to renew the same, or pass or renew any other act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands who may, contrary to law, settle thereon from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. Harrison, of Missouri, moved the previous question. Mr. Sherrod Williams moved to lay the bill on the table. Lost. On seconding the demand for the previous question, the division was as follows: Yeas 61, nays not counted.

So there was no second.

Mr. Mason's amendment was then rejected.

The amendment of the committee of the whole, as amended, was then adopted.

The question recurring on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, Mr. Boon moved the previous question. Seconded, (by tellers,) Ayes 95, noes 43. And the bill was then ordered to a third reading, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Andrews, Atherton, Beatty, Beirne, Bell, Bicknell, Biddle, Birdsell, Borden, Bronson, Buchanan, J. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Carter, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Cheatham, Cleveland, Coles, Craig, Cray, Crockett, Cushing, Cushman, Darlington, Davee, Dromgoole, Duncan, Dunn, Edwards, Farrington, Fairfield, Fillmore, Foster, Fry, Gallup, R. Garland, Goode, Wm. Graham, Grant, Gray, Haley, Hammond, Hauser, Harrison, Haynes, Henry, Herod, Holsey, Holt, Hopkins, Howard, Hubley, W. H. Hunter, Ingham, T. B. Jackson, Jabez Jackson, H. Johnson, J. Johnson, N. Jones, Keim, Kemble, Klingensmith, Leatbetter, Lewis, Logan, Loomis, Lyon, Marvin, Martin, Maury, May, McKay, R. McClellan, A. McClellan, McClure, McKennan, Miller, Moore, Morgan, S. W. Morris, Naylor, Noble, Noyes, Owens, Palmer, Parker, Parmenter, Paynter, Pennybacker, Petrikon, Phelps, Plumer, Pope, Pratt, J. H. Prentiss, S. S. Prentiss, Rariden, Reily, Ridgway, Rives, Rumsey, Sheffer, Shields, Shepler, Sibley, Snyder, Southgate, Spencer, Stone, Taylor, Thomas, Titus, Toucey, Turney, Vail, Wagener, Webster, Weeks, A. S. White, J. White, T. T. Whittlesey, S. Williams, J. W. Williams, J. L. Williams, C. H. Williams, Worl, Worthington—132.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, J. W. Allen, Ayer, Banks, Bond, Briggs, W. B. Calhoun, J. Campbell, Chambers, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Dawson, Davies, Deberry, Dennis, Elmore, Evans, Everett, Ewing, Richard Fletcher, J. Graham, Graves, Grennell, Griffin, Hall, Harlan, Hastings, Hawes, Hawkins, R. M. T. Hunter, J. W. Jones, Kennedy, Lincoln, J. M. Mason, Samson Mason, Maxwell, Mercer, Milligan, Ogle, Parris, Patterson, Pearce, Peck, Phillips, Pickens, Potts, Randolph, Reed, Rencher, Rhett, Richardson, Robinson, Russell, Sergeant, A. H. Shepperd, C. Shepard, Slade, Stanly, Stratton, Taliaferro, Thompson, Tillinghast, Toland, E. Whittlesey, L. Williams, Wise, Yorke—70.

Mr. Harlan moved that the house do adjourn, (it was then half past 8 o'clock.) The division (by tellers) on this motion resulted as follows: Ayes 72, noes 76. So the the house refused to adjourn. The bill was then read a third time.

Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, moved to commit the bill to the committee of the whole, with instructions to strike out the amendment of Mr. Bell, (see above,) and, in lieu thereof, to report the following:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the president of the United States to cause to be reserved from sale or entry, according to the provisions of this or any other law of the United States, any tract or tracts of land reserved to any Choctaw under the provisions of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek of 1830, and also to reserve from sale or entry a sufficient quantity of the unoccupied and unimproved lands acquired by said treaty, to satisfy the claim of such Indians as may have been entitled to reservations under said treaty, and whose lands may have been sold by the United States on account of any default, neglect or omission of duty on the part of any officer of the United States; such reservations from sale to continue until the claims to reservations under said treaty shall be investigated by the board of commissioners appointed for that purpose, and their report finally acted upon by congress.

Upon this motion Mr. Prentiss asked for the yeas and nays. Mr. Duncan moved an adjournment, Lost: Ayes 65, noes 75. Mr. Cushman moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put, viz. shall this bill pass? On this question Mr. Boon demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and then Mr. Patterson moved that the house adjourn (9 o'clock.) Lost. The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, as amended, which resulted as follows: Yeas 107, nays 52. So the bill was sent to the senate for concurrence in the amendments made by the house; and, on motion of Mr. Taylor, the house (at half past 9 o'clock) adjourned.

[During the discussion of the pre-emption bill, on the morning preceding the above afternoon's action—

Mr. Goode moved the following amendment:

"Provided, That the right of pre-emption shall extend, under the provisions of this act, at $2 50 per acre, to all lands within the alternate sections belonging to the United States, on the Miami and Wabash and Erie canals in the state of Ohio, which have been settled on, occupied, and improved, for the purpose of cultivation, prior to the first day of December, 1835, and which are still in the possession and occupation of the original settlers, or his or her heirs-at-law, not amounting to more than one quarter section, and being all in one tract."

In offering the above amendment Mr. G remarked that there were but few cases to which the right of pre-emption could extend, within these alternate sections, as there were but a few settlers on those lands prior to December, 1835. But there were a few cases, of great merit, and which ought to be provided for; perhaps the cases might not exceed ten or twelve.

No question was taken upon this amendment, in consequence of the preference of other questions, in order, and, finally, of the previous question, cutting off all pending and prospective amendments.]

Friday, June 15. Mr. Snyder of Illinois, after the reading of the journal, asked leave of the house to make an explanation in relation to an article that appeared in the Madisonian of yesterday.

Leave being given, Mr. S. rose and said:

Mr. Speaker: I am constrained, by a sense of justice to myself and to the people whom I represent, to notice an editorial article in the Madisonian of yesterday—a paper printed in this city, and edited by Thomas Allen, printer to this house. The article is headed "The Illinois delegation—the sub-treasury." Sir, I will not take up the time of this house by reading it; all of its members have doubtless seen it; and I will not affect to disguise the fact that this article is intended for me. There are but three representatives from the state of Illinois, and I am the only one of that delegation, to my knowledge, who has given any intimation that he would support the sub-treasury bill. I would not now, in this manner, notice this article, were it not that the editor of that paper is an officer of this house. In these days of the licentiousness of the press, every public man receives a full measure of abuse; and I would have taken my share in silence, emanating from almost any other source; but emanating and sanctioned, as it is, by the official character of the editor, I feel bound to take this notice of it, in order that the antidote may go forth with the poison. It is true, the article makes no direct or specific charge of corruption. It is worse; it intimates it. Were it specific, I could the more readily defend my character from the foul charge. The author of the article intimates that I have solicited executive favors and executive smiles, and that promises and favors have been returned. Sir, I am not an applicant for office, neither have I ever received the smiles, promises, or favors of the president. Justice to him and to myself demands of me that here, in my place, I should say that that, as well as the charge of corruption insinuated by the article, is false and malicious.

The manner in which the editor of the Madisonian has violated his pledges made to a portion of the democratic members of this house, before he received their votes for its printer—namely, that he would support the present administration, and the rules and usages of the democratic party—render any other or further notice of him for the present unnecessary.

The report of the committee on foreign relations concerning the Texas question being resumed—

Mr. Adams, by leave, made a motion to recommit the report to the committee on foreign relations, with instructions to report the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the power of annexing the people of any independent foreign state to this union is a power not delegated by the constitution of the United States to their congress, or to any department of their government, but reserved by the people.

"That any attempt by act of congress or by treaty to annex the republic of Texas to this union would be a usurpation of power, unlawful and void, and which it would be the right and the duty of the free people of the union to resist and annul."

Mr. Howard said that he concurred entirely in the report which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Dromgoole) had made on behalf of the committee on foreign affairs, which recommended that all the papers relating to Texas should be laid upon the table; and it might appear inconsistent in him to address the house upon a subject which that report, thus receiving his approbation, considered as not being before the house. But it would be remembered that on yesterday a motion had been made to recommit the report with certain instructions, the adoption of which would of course imply that the committee had erred in their judgment. It was, perhaps, his duty, certainly his right, to endeavor to show that the committee had not erred; and with this view he had, on yesterday, referred to the correspondence between Mr. Forsyth and Gen. Hunt, and deduced from it what he thought a clear inference, that no proposition was now pending before the executive branch of the government for the annexation of Texas to the United States. He had read the letter of the secretary of state, declining even to reserve the proposition for future consideration, and the acknowledgement of Gen. Hunt, that this was a prompt and decisive rejection. The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing,) who dissented from the report of the committee, had said (as he, Mr. H., found it in his printed speech,) that "this proposition was pending now, and in force; and not, as the late report of the secretary of state would seem to intimate, withdrawn from the cognizance of the government." This, then, was the issue which the house had to decide. He could not, for his own part, conceive how a rejected overture could be still pending. Texas was certainly not bound by it. If the president should change his mind, and announce to the minister from Texas that the proposition would be received and discussed, and should find that, in the mean time, Texas had entered into negotiations with England, or any other power, could that government be justly charged with a breach of faith? Certainly not. The answer to such a charge would be, that when the United States promptly and decisively rejected the overture for annexation, Texas was left free to pursue whatever other course she chose; both parties were precisely in the same relative position as they were before the proposition was made. The conduct of Texas herself proved this. A treaty had since been made, (as we are informed in the papers, by the member of this house from Arkansas, upon authority which he considers unquestionable,) between the United States and Texas, for the arrangement of the boundary line between them; and certainly the conclusion of a treaty between two independent governments was at variance with the attitude in which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) desired to place them. There was, therefore, nothing before the house in the shape of a proposition emanating from Texas herself, upon which the house, or any committee, could act.

Neither was there any specific proposition brought up by the memorial or resolutions of any Legislature of a state. Massachusetts, Ohio, Tennessee, Alabama, and Michigan, which he would not analyze minutely, because it would occupy too much time; but he would content himself with saying that they all expressed their views in anticipation of the question when it should regularly come up, rather than their intention to bring it up. If any one should controvert this, he would endeavor to fortify himself by a particular examination of these documents. As to the numerous petitions of individuals remonstrating against the annexation of Texas, he supposed that these persons would be satisfied as long as Texas remained out of the union, and, at all events, until she again expressed a desire to come in. Many of the petitions were signed by women. He always felt regret when petitions thus signed were presented to the house relating to political matters. He thought that these females could have a sufficient field for the exercise of their influence in the discharge of their duties to their fathers, their husbands, or their children, cheering the domestic circle, and shedding over it the mild radiance of the social virtues, instead of rushing into the fierce struggles of political life. He felt sorrow at this departure from their proper sphere, in which there was abundant room for the practice of the most extensive benevolence and philanthropy, because he considered it discreditable, not only to their own particular section of the country, but also to the national character, and thus giving him a right to express this opinion.

But the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Thompson) has offered an amendment, which brings directly before the house the propriety of making an offer from the United States to Texas to receive that country into the union. He would thank the clerk to read it.

[The clerk then read as follows:

"To report a joint resolution directing the president to take the proper steps for the annexation of Texas to the United States as soon as it can be done consistently with the treaty stipulations of this government."

It would be observed that these steps were to be taken by the president, not immediately and the passage of the joint resolution, but at some future time, the same as that indicated by the legislature of Alabama, who express a wish for the annexation "as soon as it can be done without a violation of our honor as a nation, or any principle of international law." The passage of such a resolution would, he thought, postpone the advent of the time which that gentleman wished to hasten. The ground upon which the president had rejected the overture of Texas was, that its annexation would be equivalent to a declaration of war with Mexico. And so it would. Mexico was at war with Texas, and blockading her ports. She had a right to do this, and we could not complain so long as the laws of nations were observed. But suppose that Texas were received into the union, what would be the condition of things? Those would become the ports of the United States, and the territory of Texas become a part of the United States. Mexico would, therefore, be legally invading the territory of the United States, by sea and land, with every description of armed force, which was, ipso facto, war. The contingency contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from S. C. was, the recognition of the independence of Texas by Mexico; because, until that happened, no annexation could be made consistently with our treaty stipulations with Mexico. Now, if Mexico thought that the consequence of her recognition of Texas would be its incorporation into the United States, and thereby gratifying the wisher of Texas, that circumstance alone would of itself induce Mexico to refuse to make such recognition. The contingency, therefore, upon which the action of this government was to take place, would be postponed by the very passage of this joint resolution, producing an effect exactly the reverse of what the gentleman from South Carolina wished. He thought that the recognition of the republic of Texas, a measure which that gentleman had advocated with great ardor and eloquence at the last congress, had thrown an additional difficulty in the way of its final annexation. This opinion was freely expressed at the time, and he had seen no reason to change it. The effect had been this: to vary the question of constitutional power from that which was twice settled, in the purchases of Louisiana and Florida, and introduce a new one; thus depriving the friends of Texas of the benefit of two precedents, exactly in point, and throwing them upon argument alone, instead of argument and precedent united. If Texas had not been recognized as an independent power, and been considered, even nominally, as a part of Mexico, and a treaty had been made between the United States and Mexico, by which the latter had ceded Texas to the former, (the consent of the people of Texas being first obtained,) the case would have been parallel with the treaties with France and Spain, by which we acquired Louisiana and Florida. Instead of this, the question now was whether we could absorb an entire nation by a treaty with that nation. As for himself, Mr. H. said, he could perceive no difference between the cases; but others, among whom was the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams,) argued that great difference existed. Great doubt was expressed by many of our most distinguished statesmen, whether the federal government had the constitutional power to acquire Louisiana under the treaty with France; and some of them had even admitted that it was a case beyond the constitution, whilst they were still anxious that the United States should be round off in that direction. But when the case of Florida occurred, the difficulty was lessened; and the third instance would have been more easily accomplished than the second. Of this advantage the friends of Texas were now deprived, and had to meet a new question, instead of following in a track already trodden. He could not himself feel the force of the difference alleged to exist. The question turned upon the competency of the federal government to receive, under the constitution, a portion of territory not belonging to the old thirteen United States; and he could not perceive that the nature of the government which made the grant, whether republic or monarchy, the position, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic, or the amount of land granted, whether a portion or the whole of the possessions of the granting power, at all affected the question of the power to receive, which could be solved only by a reference to the constitution of the United States. If we had power under that instrument to accept Louisiana and Florida from the emperor of France and king of Spain, we must have power to accept Texas from the people who owned it. The question was solely as to the power of the grantee to the price, and he could not see how the two questions of the person granting and amount granted influenced its decision.

It had been said that the United States were once the possessors of the whole or a part of Texas, under the cession of Louisiana. He believed that this was correct, although he was not prepared to define the limit to which the claim extended. If this was so, we had once before purchased Texas, and sold it to Spain in the Florida treaty. What we had once constitutionally bought and sold, could we not buy again? If the former purchase was invalid, we must in order to be consistent, relinquish Louisiana to France, and Florida to Spain, and restrict ourselves to the boundaries of the thirteen original states; but no one would advocate this. On the contrary, Louisiana would remain represented upon this floor, and he hoped Florida would soon be by her side.

In order to illustrate his opinion that the adoption of the resolution before the house would be an anticipation of the subject, and therefore premature, he would refer briefly to the only three modes in which the president could execute the duty which it was proposed to require of him.

Texas could only be annexed to the United States in one of these ways:

1. By the exercise of the treaty-making power.
2. By an exercise of the legislative power of the federal government.
3. By an amendment of the constitution of the United States.

It could scarcely be deemed proper for the house of representatives to direct the president to make a treaty upon any subject with any power. We might as well request the senate to ratify or not to ratify a treaty, when submitted to that body by the president for their constitutional action, and such a measure, on the part of this house, would strike every mind at once as a departure from every restriction which the constitution has placed upon us. It would destroy that beautiful harmony established by our ancestors, and introduce in its stead a scene of irregular and ruinous exercise, in disorder and confusion of those powers whose separation, and perhaps contradiction, like the centripetal and centrifugal forces of the universe, preserve order and beauty in the system. Should a treaty be made by the president and senate, and this house be appealed to for appropriations, or other laws to carry it out, it must gravely weigh all the responsibilities of its situation before refusing so to do. He admitted that a power of refusal existed; but it was to be exercised only in the last resort: it was the extreme medicine of the constitution. It was only when the safety of the nation was imminently endangered that the maxim would apply, and salus populi become suprema lex. But it was not necessary or proper to anticipate such a state of things. If it should occur, the house could then determine its course, without now, in advance, pledging itself to any course of measures.

But in either of the other two modes of executing the duty, which the instructions required at the hands of the president, whether by an act of congress, or an amendment of the constitution, the house of representatives would be called upon, necessarily, to perform its appropriate functions.—Then, better than now, an expression of their wishes could be made. At present, there were disturbing and powerful causes at work, which he need not mention to the gentleman from South Carolina, the effect of which would be to decide this question upon motives, feelings, and interests, far different from those statesmanlike views which alone should govern the decision of this deeply important matter. The whole nation was in a state of agitation, working like a troubled sea. Whether this commotion would subside or not, and restore to the country that tranquillity which was indispensable for the happy and permanent adjustment of important measures, his power of vision did not enable him to foresee. But he could discern plainly that the welfare of the entire people of the United States, unconnected with sectional feeling, would be the very last amongst the motives which would influence the house, if the vote were now taken upon the Texas question.

Upon the propriety of the annexation he would not enter. He had carefully avoided bringing that subject before the house, as he thought its discussion premature. The few remarks with which he had troubled the house, upon a different point, would not have been made at all if he had not felt bound to sustain the report of the committee. He had been drawn into some observations, collaterally, because two amendments had been offered, changing the question, after he had taken the floor.

Mr. Petriken said that he considered that this question had occupied the time of the house already too long, to the embarrassment of important public business. There had been a speech on each side, and he would now move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. Cushing asked the yeas nays which were ordered. He then asked the mover to withdraw his motion, to enable him to interpose a single word of personal explanation. He would renew the motion in the behalf of the mover.

Mr. Petriken, with this understanding, consented.

Mr. Cushing then begged leave to disavow any intention to cast any thing like censure upon the course of the rest of the committee, in offering his own proposition. This had been imputed to him by the gentleman from Maryland, who was chairman of the committee on foreign affairs. (Mr. Howard,) and he took this opportunity to disavow it. He intended to express dissent, not censure.

As he had promised, he renewed the motion of Mr. Petriken, declaring, however, his intention to vote against it.

Mr. Petriken then said he would withdraw his motion.

The Chair said that it was the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Cushing withdrew it.

Mr. Adams had a word to say. On a former day he had asked a question of the member of the committee on foreign affairs who reported this resolution, as to the length of time and the degree of attention bestowed by that committee upon the subject-matter of the large number of resolutions of state legislatures, and of petitions of the people, referred thereto. This question had been met with a denial of the right of a member of that house to ask it. At the time he (Mr. A.) had said that the country, as well as himself, would draw its own conclusions from this reply. His present purpose was to ask the chairman of that committee if he and the rest of that committee held the doctrine that a member of that house, in the discharge of his public duties, had no right to make inquiries of a committee as to the mode in which they had discharged their duties? Does the chairman take that ground?

Mr. Dromgoole here rose, and wished to ask a question of the Chair. Had a member of this house a right, under the rules, to propound such inquiries to a committee thereof? Mr. Shields here asked if the hour for going to the orders of the day had not arrived? Mr. Adams renewed his inquiries of the chairman and the other members of the committee on foreign affairs. Mr. Howard rose to reply. The Chair announced the orders of the day.

Mr. Howard would prefer to reply at that time. There being no objection, he proceeded to say that, in making the report they had, the committee had acted under a sense of their duty to the house; and it was for the latter, as a body, to decide whether or not they had acted regularly in so doing. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, he would say that he did go the whole length of the ground taken by his colleague of the committee, (Mr. Dromgoole,) who had brought in the report under consideration. He thought it disrespectful to a committee of that house for a member to catechise its members as to the precise time spent in the discharge of its duties, and the mode in which those duties were discharged. He stood by the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Dromgoole) on this point.

Mr. Adams rose amidst much confusion, occasioned by calls for the orders of the day, and other cries, from various parts of the hall, and said that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Howard) had not chosen to meet the issue tendered him. He was interrupted by the Chair, who again announced the orders of the day.

Mr. Hopkins hoped the house would consent to take up the motion made by himself on a former day, to reconsider the vote whereby one branch of the memorial of Francis P. Blair had been referred to a select committee.

Objection was made, and the Chair once more announced the orders of the day.

Mr. R. Garland rose to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the pre-emption bill was yesterday passed with certain amendments. Mr. Yell moved to lay the motion on the table. Mr. R. Garland asked if such a motion was then in order? The Chair responded, certainly not, unless by a suspension of the rules. Mr. Yell moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering the motion of Mr. Garland. Mr. Adams desired to know what were the motives of the gentlemen from Louisiana (Mr. Garland) in making this motion? The Chair said that the inquiry was not then in order. Mr. Adams observed that the reply would influence the vote upon the motion. The motion to suspend the rules was rejected.

In taking up this business, as the regular order of the day, the Speaker hoped he should be excused by the house for suggesting that an adherence to the regular order of business on the calendar resulted uniformly in the greater despatch thereof. Mr. Cumbreleng rose and said that it was now three months since the calendar of private bills was been acted on with regularity. He hoped the course suggested by the speaker would be adopted. Mr. Hurlan protested against the habit of the gentleman from New York, in dictating, day after day, the course of proceeding to the house.

The private calendar was then taken up, and a number of private bills disposed of. But before much progress had been made in the calendar, the usual hour for taking a recess arrived.

EVENING SESSION.

The house met at half past three o'clock, but very few members appeared in their seats.

A call of the house was moved; the house was called, and 121 members answered to their names; when further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. Mercer obtained leave to move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the use of the hall of the house of representatives, between the hours of eight and ten o'clock A. M. on Thursday next, be allowed to doctor Sherwood and doctor Dwight, for the purpose of explaining the discovery which the former conceives that he has made of the laws which regulate the variation of the magnetic needle, and of the means of thence deducing at any time, by a simple and infallible process, the latitude and longitude of any point on the globe.

Mr. Petrik moved to amend the resolution by appropriating half the time to an exhibition of Dr. Reilly's sulphur vapor-bath. [A laugh.]

Mr. Stanly moved a proviso that the mover of the amendment, (Mr. P.) or some other member, should submit to the operation. [Convulsions of laughter.] Mr. Petrik was required to reduce his amendment to writing. The clerk endeavored repeatedly to read it, but failed to get through. [The merriment increased.] Mr. Dromgoole moved to postpone the consideration of the resolution until the house should recover its gravity.

This motion was negatived, as was the amendment without a count.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Two other resolutions to the establishment of post-roads were offered, after which, the house resumed the consideration of private bills, and went into the unfinished business, which was the case of major Thomas Harrison,* (being a bill allowing him arrears of increase of pension from the time the disability incurred, up to the time of the increase of his pension, about two years ago.)

Mr. Sherrod Williams concluded his speech in opposition to the bill. It was debated for a considerable time, Messrs. Taylor, Lincoln, Howard, and Mercer being in favor of its passage, and Messrs. Williams, Allen, of Vermont, Cushman, and Evans against it.

The debate was ended by Mr. Cushing, who demanded the previous question. It was seconded, and carried; and the main question being on ordering the bill to its engrossment for a third reading, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 56, noes 97.

Mr. Howard moved an adjournment; but it was lost: Ayes 49, noes 72.

The next was a bill from the senate for the relief of Ann S. Heileman.

Mr. Underwood opposed, and Mr. Grennell defended the bill, and called for the reading of the report in the case; which was read.

The bill was read a third time, and the question being on its passage, it was opposed by Mr. Cambreleng and Mr. Taylor, and advocated by Mr. Mason, of Virginia, and Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina; when Mr. McKenna demanded the previous question; which was seconded and carried.

The bill was then passed by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 109, nays 33.

The house adjourned.

Saturday, June 16. Mr. Petrik obtained leave to offer a resolution for a post route. Mr. Ingham made an effort to get Thursday next appointed for the consideration of bills reported by the committee on naval affairs; but, before any decision on giving leave Mr. Briggs claimed the floor for his colleague, Mr. Adams, on the unfinished business of yesterday morning.

After some explanations on this subject, Mr. Adams was about to address the house.

*This bill had been reported by the committee of the whole with the enacting clause stricken out. The case of major H. was a most interesting one; during the discussion an appeal from the claimant, stating the grounds upon which he based his claims, was read, on motion of Mr. Aycrigg, of New Jersey. It recapitulated many most interesting incidents in the battle of Chipewa, in which he was engaged, and in which he received several severe wounds, and received the rank of brevet-major in consequence.

Mr. Tillinghast asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), who was entitled to the floor, to give way so far as to enable him to request the reading of the resolutions of the legislature of Rhode Island on the subject of the annexation of Texas, introduced by him (Mr. T.) on the 29th of December last. Mr. Adams said that he proposed himself, in his remarks, to take notice of those resolutions, which would probably answer the purpose of the gentleman from Rhode Island. Mr. Tillinghast then said that, in that case, as they would probably then be read, his purpose would be answered; and he would therefore not insist, at this time, upon his request. His reason for making it was, that he understood those resolutions had not been before the committee for their consideration, and he wished the grounds taken in those resolutions should be recalled to the notice and receive the attention of the house before this debate proceeded. Mr. Adams addressed the house in support of the amendment moved by him to the instructions proposed by Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, to be given to the committee on foreign affairs, on the subject of the resolutions and memorials respecting the annexation of Texas to the union. Mr. A. continued to speak with great earnestness till the expiration of the morning hour; during which several explanations were made by Mr. Howard, Mr. Legare, and Mr. Dromgoole. [A full report of all the speeches will be given hereafter.]

The house was then about to pass to the consideration of private bills; when Mr. Whitlsey moved to reconsider the vote yesterday taken on the bill for the relief of major Harrison, as he wished further time to consider the facts in that case. Mr. Cushman moved to lay this motion on the table; but consented to withdraw that motion, and the motion was postponed till Friday next.

Mr. Shields and Mr. C. H. Williams made an effort to get a day appointed for the consideration of the bill to enable the state of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands within her limits.

The yeas and nays were taken on suspending the rules for this purpose, and stood—Yeas 67, nays 56; (not two-thirds.) So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Cushman then moved that the house go into committee of the whole, on the two following bills: "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

"An act authorizing the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions to improve and render safe the boilers of steam engines against explosions."

Mr. Biddle said that the subject was one of such deep and pressing importance, that he must ask for the yeas and nays on the suspension of the rules. It was a matter that touched human life. Without extravagance it might be asserted that a frightful responsibility hung over every hour of delay. The senate had passed these bills five months ago. Mr. B. was not a member of the committee to which this subject had been referred, but his position compelled him painfully to feel that the chance for securing attention to it was rapidly passing away.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 121, nays 57. So the rules were suspended; and the house went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Mercer in the chair,) and took up the bill "authorizing the appointment of persons to test the usefulness of inventions to improve and render safe the boilers of steam engines against explosions."

The bill was slightly amended, and then laid aside to be reported.

The committee then took up the bill "to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam;" together with an amendment reported by the committee on commerce, going to except from that provision of the bill which requires every steamboat to be furnished with certain long boats and yawls the boats navigating the Mississippi river.

In support of this amendment Mr. Thomas read a memorial signed by a large number of the masters of steamboats on the western waters, stating various reasons why it would be inconvenient, dangerous, and nearly impracticable for the boats on the Mississippi to carry these yawls tripped up on their quarters. The boat could much sooner be run ashore than these yawls could be lowered and filled with passengers, &c.

Mr. Fillmore suggested that the boats on the lakes stood as much in need of these yawls as those which went to sea.

Mr. Biddle briefly advocated the amendments of the committee, suggesting that, as these yawls were sufficient to contain only a part of the large number of passengers who usually crowded the steamboats in the west, in case of danger there would be an instant rush to get into them, the weak and helpless would be rushed aside, the bold and strong would rush headlong to the boats, the authority of the commander in managing them would be disregarded, and the probable consequence would be that the boats would be swamped, and more lives lost than if they had not been provided. The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. Tillinghast moved to amend the bill by adding "or on tide waters." He made some remarks in support of this amendment; stated a case of great danger in which he had been personally present, in which the presence of such yawls or long boats would have been very important, and adverted to the large number of lives which had been lost by the destruction of steamboats, a number greater than often perished in a war. Mr. Fillmore moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Tillinghast, by adding the words "or on the lakes." Mr. Tillinghast accepted this as a modification of his amendment. Mr. Randolph called for the reading of a memorial from the owners of steamboats on the Karitan, stating various objections to some of the details of the bill, and especially to the provision respecting yawls. Mr. Biddle suggested that the bill had been greatly modified in the senate since that memorial was prepared, and many of the matters to which it related were not now in the bill. The bill was, of necessity, a compromise, in which various views from all parts of the union had been regarded, and it had been purposely rendered as general as possible, avoiding minute details. He hoped too many minute amendments would not be made, as this would jeopard the success of the bill in the senate. Mr. Tillinghast modified his amendment so as to except ferry-boats and steamboats of less than sixty tons from the necessity of providing yawls. Mr. Hoffman opposed the amendment. Such a provision was not necessary or desirable on the Hudson. Mr. Legare suggested a constitutional objection to it; the general government having no right to exact the proposed penalty within the states. Mr. Tillinghast said that the constitutional objection, if there was one, applied equally to the clause compelling steam-vessels navigating the ocean to supply themselves with these boats. He did not concur as to the danger of employing them, but thought they would, at any rate, give an additional chance of escape, and wished the experiment to be tried. The question on the amendment was divided. The requirement of boats for vessels navigating the lakes was agreed to. That for vessels on tide waters was rejected.

Mr. Jones, of New York, offered an amendment requiring that the person employed as an inspector of steam-boilers must not be personally interested in their manufacture, and must be put on oath in the discharge of his duty. This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. Fillmore moved an amendment requiring every boat to be furnished with a certain number of life-preservers. The amendment was opposed by Messrs. Biddle, Hamer, and Thomas, and subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. Howard noticed an improvement on board the steam-frigate Fulton, in which there was a double safety-valve, one of them being locked up from all access, and so contrived as of itself to let off the steam, although the captain might be disposed improperly to retain it.

Mr. Evans thought that the bill did not sufficiently provide for competent skill and knowledge on the part of the engineer of the boat, and suggested an amendment appointing a board before whom they must pass an examination. Mr. Corwin remonstrated against a multiplication of amendments. The subject required much practical knowledge, which the house did not possess, and he thought it best to avoid unnecessary detail.

Mr. Sergeant thought the bill went as far as was practicable or prudent to go. The principle of the bill was not to guard against all the dangers of human life, but only against those which were peculiarly incident to the use of steam, and these consisted in explosions and configurations. The use of life-preservers might be desirable, and so might various other means of safety, but they applied as well to all other vessels as to steamboats, and opened a very extensive field for legislation. After some further remarks in objection to the amendment of Mr. Evans, the question was put on that amendment, when it was rejected.

Mr. Aycrigg moved an amendment, not distinctly heard, and which shared the same fate.

Mr. Rundolph moved an amendment requiring a certain number of buckets to be kept constantly filled with water, ready for use; but, before any question was taken, the hour of recess arrived.

EVENING SESSION.

At half past two the speaker took the chair, and the house again resolved itself into committee of the whole (Mr. Davee in the chair,) on the steamboat bill.

Mr. Randolph wished to make the bill as perfect as possible before it should be reported. He moved an amendment, the effect of which was to restrict the obligation to keep a fire engine on board the boats, to boats propelled by high-pressure engines. This was intended to create a local distinction between the boats on the western waters, and those plying between the neighboring cities. He did this in accordance with the statements contained in certain memorials upon the subject which had been sent to the house from New Jersey, &c.

Exceptions to the amendment were taken by Messrs. Fillmore, Marvin, and Robinson, and it was rejected.

Mr. Robertson moved the following amendment: "Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be held to apply to steamboats employed in plying between a port or place in any state to another port or place in the same state, and not engaged in commerce with any foreign nation, or among the several states, or to any person owning or navigating such steamboat, or employed on board the same."

Mr. R. had no great confidence in the power of legislation to reach this case. But he was willing that all that could be, should be done by congress, within the limits of their constitutional authority. He offered this amendment to protect the rights of the states against the interference of the federal government.

Mr. Underwood made some remarks in opposition to this view of the question, and was replied to briefly by Mr. Robertson. The latter denied the right of congress to regulate commerce in the different states of the union.

Mr. Sergeant proposed an amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. Robertson, so as to render the law applicable to such steamboats as are under the jurisdiction of the laws of the United States.

Mr. Pope begged gentlemen to forget for a moment that they were lawyers, and not file special demurrers, and pleas, and bills of exception, but pass this very important and useful bill, pretty much as it was reported. He showed that this process of holding boats to the jurisdiction of the different states in which they navigate was likely to be full of embarrassment and difficulty, especially with regard to boats that ply through the waters of several states. He hoped the bill would be passed in the form in which it had been reported.

Mr. Biddle and Mr. Hamer opposed the amendment to the amendment very briefly. Mr. Toucey urged that there were three kinds of commerce, with regard to which congress had a right to legislate: 1st. Commerce with foreign nations. 2d. Commerce between the states. And, 3d. commerce with the Indian tribes. There then was 4th. commerce within the states, with which congress had no right to interfere by legislation. He would be in favor of an amendment to this effect; and offered such a one.

Mr. Tillinghast said that congress had long exercised a control over coasting navigation. Mr. Robinson stated that all vessels over 20 tons were subject to the control and legislation of congress, and sailed under a license imposed by a law of the United States. Mr. Menefee cited the opinion of the supreme court in the celebrated case of Ogden vs. Gibbons, in support of those general views of the power of congress over navigation, as an incident to commerce. Mr. Noyes suggested that a single line, added to the first section of the bill, so as to restrict the operation of the bill to such vessels as are required to have license under the laws of the United States, would answer all the purposes. And he had read at the clerk's table an amendment, which, when in order, he would move, to that effect.

Mr. Menefee defended and sustained the applicability of the opinion of judge Marshall, (above cited,) to which he had before referred, to the question under consideration. Mr. Sergeant here withdrew his amendment to the amendment of Mr. Robertson, in consequence of the mover's accepting the modification proposed by Mr. Toucey to the same effect. Mr. Thomas would be more willing to support the amendment thus modified, rather than as originally moved. But he thought the whole amendment unnecessary and supererogatory. Mr. Robertson replied to such objections as had been taken to his amendment. The amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. Underwood adverted to the requisition upon the boats which the bill provides to carry a suction-hose and a fire-engine; and he proposed to strike out the ninth section of the bill, which contains that requisition. Mr. Thomas was of opinion that this section ought to be stricken from the bill. Mr. Biddle concurred in this view; and the amendment prevailed without a division. Mr. Randolph moved an amendment, striking out the minimum of the punishment imposed, so as to leave it more discretionary with the court to graduate the punishment to comparative venial offences; and the amendment prevailed.

Some other verbal amendments were offered, adopted or rejected, on motion of different members.

Mr. Childs, of New York, offered an amendment, which was adopted; and Mr. Dunn and Mr. Underwood each offered amendments, which were rejected. Mr. Gray moved an amendment to the eighth section, so as to name the lakes to which that proviso is to apply. The amendment prevailed. Mr. Hamer moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the house; which motion prevailed; and the bill and amendments being reported, Mr. Evans moved that the bill and amendments, offered and to be offered, be printed; which motion prevailed.

The house then ordered to a third reading the bill from the committee of the whole, to appoint a board to test the practicability of inventions to prevent the explosions of steamboat boilers. The bill was read a third time and passed.

The senate bills were then taken from the speaker's table, read twice, and referred.

Several private bills, on their third reading, were then read and passed.

Mr. Mitchell moved that the house do now adjourn; which motion (at a quarter past 6 o'clock) prevailed. So the house adjourned.

Monday, June 18. On motion of Mr. McKay, the motion of Mr. Hopkins to reconsider the vote whereby the latter part of the petition of Francis P. Blair, offered on a former day, was referred to a select committee, was taken up for consideration. No quorum voting on this motion.

Mr. Whittlesey hoped the subject would be postponed until after the call for petitions. Mr. Thomas considered that the day could not be better spent than in considering this question. Mr. McKay stated the prayer of that part of the petition under consideration, from which it would seem that the petitioner had done printing for the post office department to the amount of $1,500, which was paid him. Afterwards, Mr. Kendall, coming into the department, assumed to deduct that sum from the amount then due to the petitioner, upon the ground that it had been illegally paid by his (Mr. K.'s) predecessor in office. The petitioner now prays for the restitution of the sum thus withheld, and that the manner in which he done the public printing may be inquired into.

Mr. Hopkins contended that this part of the petition, which had been ordered to be referred to a select committee, ought to be referred to the post office committee, as well as the former part of it, praying for an investigation into another and entirely different matter.

Mr. Briggs followed in support of the same position. He animadverted upon the habitual negligence of the various committees on accounts as to the expenditures of the different departments, and expressed the opinion, that when such cases were brought to the notice of this house, they ought to be attended to and investigated.

Mr. Cushman moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. Crockett, who had a few words to say, and who promised, at the request of Mr. Cushman, to renew the motion. Mr. C. made some remarks, a report of which will be given hereafter. The previous question was then seconded by tellers, 78 to 57, and the main question was ordered to be put; and on the main question.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, the vote was: Yeas 105, nays 98.

So the house decided to reconsider.

Mr. Hopkins moved to refer so much of the remainder of the memorial, which prefers a claim of $1,500, to the committee on the post office; and that relating to the petitioner's manner of doing the public printing, to the committee on public expenditures.

Mr. Thomas said he was indifferent as to the committee to which these subjects should be referred. He had a few remarks to make with regard to what had fallen from the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Crockett.) He had never read that gentleman's letter, which had given rise to his remarks. His only object had been to have justice done to a citizen who had been, as he thought, injured by the remarks of a member of that house. He thought that the supplies for printing public speeches on one side came in the same way as the other—by voluntary contributions of members of congress; nor was he willing to indulge in vituperation or charges of corruption in this connection. He was of opinion that the investigation asked for ought to be gone into, although he was entirely indifferent as to what committee it should be done by.

Mr. Carter thought that there had now occurred a singular change in the doctrines of the party, now asking for select committees to investigate charges against public officers, who, a few months ago, took the ground that such charges were to be properly made by the standing committees. Had they looked into the way in which the committees on expenditures were constituted, and that they could not, and would not be made to give such a report as was desired? Mr. C. was of opinion that Mr. Thomas had not stated the true mode in which partisan speeches were circulated; and alluded to the uncontradicted allegation, that a tariff for this and similar uses was levied on public officers. If this were so, he thought the salaries of those officers should be, by so much, reduced. He knew the fact that Globes and Extra-Globes had been franked by public officers, and sent gratuitously to non-subscribers; and he stated that a portion of the clerks in departments were employed, a great deal of their time, in directing such documents. Those clerks, he said, were constantly requiring an increase of salaries, which was made necessary by reason of deductions made therefrom for party purposes. He was for the appointment of such a committee as would probe all these things to the bottom, and report thereon. Thus would the guilty be punished, and those unjustly aspersed be relieved from suspicion, and justified.

Mr. Bond, in reply to what had fallen from Mr. Thomas, went into a variety of statements with regard to alleged abuses in the different departments, and recapitulated some of his former statements upon these subjects. Mr. Cushman moved the previous question, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. McKay, (promising to renew it,) who moved to refer to a select committee, modified by accepting the proposition of Mr. Garland, of Virginia, so as to extend the inquiry to the manner in which the public printing had been executed by the present printer to the house.

On motion of Mr. Mercer, the following paragraphs from the manual of Mr. Jefferson were read: "If on motion and question it be decided that the bill shall be committed, it may then be moved to be referred to a committee of the whole house, or to a special committee. If the latter, the speaker proceeds to name the committee. Any member also may name a single person, and the clerk is to write him down as of the committee. But the house have a controlling power over the names and number, if a question be moved against any one, and may, in any case, put in and put out whom they please."

"Those who take exceptions to some particulars in the bill are to be of the committee. But none who speak directly against the body of the bill. For he that would totally destroy, will not amend it. Hakey, 146. Town, col. 208. D'Ewes, 634. col. 2. Scob, 47. or, as it is said, 5 Grey, 145, the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares not for it. 6 Grey, 373. It is therefore a constant rule that no man is to be employed in any matter who has declared himself against it." And when any member who is against the bill hears himself named of its committee, he ought to ask to be excused. Thus, March 7, 1606, Mr. Hadley was on the question being put, excused from being of a committee, declaring himself to be against the matter itself.—Scob, 46."

Mr. Thomas, after a few words of explanation in reply to Mr. Bond, renewed the motion for the previous question. Seconded—95 to 40. And the main question was ordered to be put.

That part of the petition preferring a claim was then referred to the committee on the post office.

The motion to refer that part thereof relating to the mode in which the public printing had been done by the petitioner, to the committee on public expenditures, was rejected: yeas 89, nays 89. The chair voting in the negative.

The motion next in order was that of Mr. McKay, to refer this portion of the petition to a select committee, with the instructions moved by Mr. Garland, of Virginia, to extend the proposed investigation to the manner in which the public printing had been done by the present printer to the house.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, Mr. R. Garland asked for a division of the question; and the question was first taken on the motion to commit to a select committee, and resulted as follows: yeas 101, nays 100.

So the house decided to refer it to a select committee.

The question recurring on the instructions, resulted as follows: yeas 195, nays 1.

So the proposed instructions were agreed to.

Mr. Grant asked leave to offer a resolution setting apart to-morrow for the consideration of the house bills making appropriations for improvements, surveys, &c. of certain harbors. Objections being made, Mr. Grant asked for a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolution, and on this motion he asked for the yeas and nays. Not ordered. The motion to suspend the rules was lost.

Petitions were now presented, and occupied the attention of the house until the hour of recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The house met at half past three o'clock, according to the order, and went into committee of the whole for the consideration of the bill to establish certain post routes and discontinue others.

The sections of the bill were read in order, according to the states in which the routes were located, and various amendments were proposed, of merely local interest, occupying nearly the whole session.

Mr. Hopkins moved an amendment, appropriating two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

Mr. H. alluded to the condition of the post office department, and said that owing to the extension of facilities to the country, and the extraordinary embarrassments of the times, it would be impossible to establish new routes from the present resources of the office; and it might even be necessary to discontinue some of those already established, if aid were not granted from the treasury. He should be opposed to the passage of the bill unless means were afforded to carry it into effect.

Mr. Wise objected to the appropriation, and alluded to the reports of the postmaster general, with an allegation that they were inconsistent and contradictory. The first report, he said, stated the department was in debt near half a million of dollars. The second report stated, that, as if by a magic wand, order had been brought out of confusion, and solvency from bankruptcy. The report at the called session, or at the commencement of this one, stated that the postmaster general could sustain his department upon his own resources, and that he needed no aid from the treasury. If all this was true, how could it be that this appropriation was necessary. He was inclined to believe that the postmaster general was hoarding his resources, to be used for electioneering purposes, and he would not trust this sum of money to him to be used for electioneering purposes; for the application of it to the creation of new post routes was permissive, and not obligatory.

The debate was briefly and incidentally continued till a quarter past eight o'clock, when, without coming to any decision, the committee rose and reported progress; and

The house adjourned.

Tuesday, June 19. In addition to the recovery of Mr. Cranston, whose presence in the house, after a protracted illness, has been heretofore noticed, we are happy to have it in our power to announce that also of Messrs. Coffin and Curtis, both of whom have resumed their seats.

The following gentlemen were announced as composing the select committee on the memorial of Francis P. Blair, viz: Messrs. McKay, Hopkins, Thomas, Hoffman, and Hamer.

The Chair laid before the house an executive communication.

The senate's amendments to several house bills were read and appropriately referred.

Mr. Adams resumed the floor in support of his amendment on the subject of the admission of Texas. He continued to speak until the expiration of the morning hour, when, without having finished his remarks, he yielded the floor.

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the house go into committee of the whole on the state of the union. The motion prevailed, and the house accordingly went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Connor, of North Carolina, in the chair.)

Mr. Cambreleng moved that the committee do now take up the sub-treasury bill. Mr. Sergeant moved to take up the harbor bill. Mr. Cambreleng would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and to the committee, that it must be obvious to all that this was the only debatable bill now remaining; after this should have been debated and disposed of, the house could go on and finish the public business remaining. He was sure all were anxious to go home; and it was best, on all accounts, to have the question on it decided in one way or other.

The committee by tellers, voted to take up the sub-treasury bill: Ayes 182. The bill was read through. Mr. Cambreleng rose, and was about to address the committee when Mr. W. Thompson asked him to yield the floor for a moment, to allow him to offer a substitute for the bill. Mr. Cambreleng assenting,

Mr. Thompson offered the following:

Strike out all after the words "Be it enacted," &c. and insert: "That all dues to the government shall hereafter be collected in gold and silver coin, treasury notes of the United States, and the notes of sound specie-paying banks, under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by act of congress, or by the secretary of the treasury: Provided, That no bank notes shall be received as aforesaid, except such as the bank of deposit shall agree to receive and credit as cash

2. Be it further enacted, That the secretary of treasury be, and he is hereby, required to select, as special depositories of the public funds, and at such places as may be necessary, sound specie-paying banks, preferring, in all cases where such exist, banks owned in whole or in part by the states in which the same are situated.

3. Be it further enacted, That the secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to contract with the banks selected as depositories aforesaid, for the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, on such terms and for such compensation as he may deem right and proper; stipulating in all cases, under such guaranties as he may think necessary, that the public funds deposited with said banks shall be in no case used in their business, nor otherwise used but in payment of drafts from the treasury.

Mr. J. Garland said that before the gentleman from New York proceeded, he would make a motion which should directly test the question on the bill. He meant to meet it front to front, without resorting to any amendment. He moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Mr. Cambreleng then went into an expose in explanation and support of the bill. He was followed by Mr. Pickens on the same side of the question. At the hour of recess Mr. P. gave way for a motion to rise, and the committee rose.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. Pickens concluded his speech upon the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, took the floor, and stated that it was his desire to address the committee on this question, and he moved that the committee rise. His motion prevailed, and the committee rose.

On motion of Mr. White, of Kentucky, the house then went into committee of the whole (Mr. Davee in the chair,) upon the post route bill.

Mr. Hopkins' amendment was pending, the object of which was to appropriate $225,000 in order to establish the proposed new routes. Mr. Underwood went into an argument in order to show that these routes might be established without any additional appropriations. Mr. Reed was willing that every useful and expedient facility should be afforded, not too burdensome upon the treasury. There were some things upon which he wished some information, especially the express mail, which he did not believe to be generally useful, and as involving an expense which might be well dispensed with.

Mr. Montgomery said that it had occurred to the committee to abolish the express mail, although it had not been brought directly before the committee. It had only existed on commercial routes, and had been useful in transporting commercial intelligence; but that mail had been suspended wherever the establishment of rail-road and steamboat navigation had taken place. It had cost more than it had come to, and he (Mr. M.) was of opinion that it might well be altogether abolished.

Mr. Pope was not particular about the passage of the amendment, though he had no objection to it; but he hoped that the bill, at all events, would be passed. Mr. Yell supported the bill. He demonstrated the necessity of the new routes proposed to be established. Mr. Martin, of Alabama, was in favor of the amendment of Mr. Hopkins. He believed that without it the bill would be entirely inoperative.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. Hall, Goode, Mercer, Briggs, Montgomery, Yell, Cathoun, Hoffman, Johnson, of Louisiana, Fletcher, of Vermont, Phillips, and Williams, of North Carolina.

Mr. Yell's motion (offered during this debate) to amend the amendment of Mr. Hopkins to strike out and insert a clause to repeal the act of 1836, establishing the express mail, and to appropriate the proceeds to the new routes, slightly modified, prevailed.

The amendment of Mr. Hopkins prevailed; the committee rose and reported the bill, and the house adjourned.

Wednesday, June 20. Mr. Adams resumed the floor, and continued the course of his remarks in support of his amendment to the resolution of the committee on foreign affairs, in relation to the annexation of Texas to the United States.

[He had not concluded when the hour elapsed for morning business. A full report will be given hereafter.]

The order of the day being announced, the house, on motion, took up the pre-emption bill, as returned from the senate with some amendments, which were concurred in by the house. [The bill now only wants the signature of the president to become a law.]

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house went into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Bronson gave notice of his intention to offer, at the proper time, the following amendment:

"Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the operation of the following parts of acts or provisions of law, now in force, shall be, and the same is hereby, suspended for the space of two years, to wit: So much of the act of June 23, 1836, entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," as provides that the notes or bills of any bank which has, since the fourth of July, 1836, issued any note or bill of a less denomination than five dollars, shall not be received in payment of any debt due to the United States. And so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensioners of the United States, for the year 1836," passed 14th April, 1836, as provides that no bank note of a less denomination than twenty dollars shall be offered in payment in any case whatsoever in which money is to be paid by the United States or the post office department."

The pending question was the motion of Mr. Garland, of Virginia, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. Garland, of Virginia, being entitled to the floor, went, at length, into a general argument against the bill, and in reply to the remarks of Messrs. Cambreleng and Pickens on the other side.

At two o'clock the house took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

The sub-treasury bill again under consideration—Mr. Dromgoole addressed the committee at length in a constitutional argument against the employment of state banks as depositories of the public money, and in favor of the bill as the only remaining resort, unless a national bank, which he held to be still more heterodox.

Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, next obtained the floor, and commenced a speech of great interest and animation, in which he traced the history of the experiments on the currency, and commented with severity on the course of some gentlemen who had changed their political preferences, and were now the advocates of this bill and of the administration generally. He continued to speak until about half-past six o'clock, when he gave way for a motion that the committee rise. It rose accordingly.

Mr. Bronson laid on the table, and had leave for the printing of an amendment to the bill, which he proposed hereafter to move.

The Speaker laid before the house a message from the president of the United States, transmitting papers on the subject of the outrages on our frontier.

The message was referred to the committee on military affairs.

And then the house adjourned.

Thursday, June 21. Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Hamer were, on their own request, excused from serving on the select committee on the memorial of Francis P. Blair.

Ordered, That the Chair appoint other members in their stead.

Mr. Paynter, by leave, presented certain memorials and resolutions of different meetings in Philadelphia, for and against the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Tillinghast obtained an order that the resolutions of the legislature of Rhode Island, which, when presented by him, had through accident not been printed on the journal of the house, should now be inserted with an entry stating the former omission.

Mr. Cushing modified his resolution calling for a report from the committee on foreign relations so as to include the resolutions of the states of Rhode Island and of Vermont among those to be reported upon.

Mr. Adams then resumed the floor in support of his amendment, declaratory, of the doctrine that the government has no power under the constitution to admit into the union the people of any foreign state. He continued to speak till the expiration of the morning hour. A little farther time was then, by consent, allowed him; but before he had concluded, Mr. Hurlin demanded the orders of the day.

Bills from the senate were then read, and referred; and the senate's amendments to certain bills of the house were concurred in.

The house then, on motion of Mr. Cambreleng, went into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Connor, of North Carolina, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Duncan got leave to have certain amendments to the bill proposed by him laid on the table and printed.

Mr. Prentiss, of Mississippi, then resumed the floor, and continued his address to the committee in opposition to the bill, and particularly in reply to Mr. Pickens' appeal to the interest of the south in behalf of the bill. He spoke until the expiration of the morning sitting, when the house, at 2 o'clock, took its daily recess.

EVENING SESSION.

After Mr. Prentiss had concluded his remarks, Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, took the floor, and spoke till six o'clock in favor of the bill, without concluding.

And then the committee, on motion, rose, and the house, on motion, adjourned.

Friday June 22. The journal being read, Mr. Alam resumed and continued his remarks (to be reported hereafter in full) upon the subject of the annexation of Texas to the union, until the lapse of the morning hour, without concluding.

The chair having announced the private orders of the day, Mr. McKean moved to take up for consideration the joint resolution of Mr. Boon, proposing to fix the day of adjournment.

Objection being made, Mr. McKean moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to offer this motion; and on this he demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered. The motion to suspend prevailed, yeas 133, nays 55.

The following joint resolution, offered by Mr. Boon on a former day, was then taken up:

"Resolved, (the senate concurring therein,) that the speaker of the house of representatives, and the president of the senate, close the present session of congress by an adjournment of the two houses over which they preside respectively, on the first Monday of July next."

Mr. McKean moved to amend by striking out the "1st Monday" and inserting "2d Monday" of July. Mr. Boon modified the proposition accordingly. Mr. Naylor moved to amend by restoring the original reading, and asked the yeas and nays. Not ordered. The motion was rejected. Mr. Gurland, of Lou., moved to strike out the "2d," and insert the "3d" Monday in July; and on this he asked the yeas and nays which were ordered. Mr. G. referred the house to the calendar of business before the house, and instanced several important bills yet to be acted on, whence he argued that the adjournment ought not to take place before the 16th.

Mr. Bouldin said he was anxious that the public business should be done. That it might be done was true. That it might have been done was equally true. But if the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. Gurland) thought that length of time would secure that object, Mr. B. would ask him to look back upon the last six or seven months, and see what had been done in all that time. He said, if they were disposed to do the business now, he had no doubt that every thing material could be done by the 9th of July. If they did not wish to do it, they never would do it in any length of time. If they meant to do it, let them act promptly; if not, let them go home.

Mr. Whitlessy enumerated some important matters to be acted upon before adjournment, and said that the house had now found itself in precisely the predicament he had predicted it would be in the early part of this session. He was of opinion that all this proved the importance and necessity of acting earlier upon the important business of the session. Under the present state of affairs, he could not vote for an earlier day of adjournment than the 16th of July. Mr. Boon thought that all the important business of this session, yet to be done, might well be transacted prior to the 9th of July, if members would but talk less and act more. Mr. Haynes said he would show the estimate in which he held the value of time by moving the previous question. On the question of seconding, tellers were ordered, and the house refused to second the motion of Mr. Haynes: Ayes 72, nays 95. So there was no second.

Mr. Naylor agreed that it was certainly very important that the bills enumerated by several members should be acted upon, and he thought that this might as well be done by the 9th as by the 16th of July, and he should therefore vote for the earlier period. [Here ensued most deafening cries of question! Mr. Haynes took the floor. The cries were repeated yet more loudly.]

Mr. H. said that such vociferations did not terrify him. He would stand till doomsday, if necessary, and say what he had to say. He had risen to ask the yeas and nays.

The Chair. The yeas and nays have been ordered; and the question is on striking out "the 2d" and inserting "the 3d Monday in July."

That question was decided in the negative: yeas 90, nays 121.

Mr. Sherrot Williams moved to postpone the further consideration of this resolution until this day week. Mr. Casey demanded the yeas and nays. Not ordered. Mr. Haynes asked for tellers. Granted. And the motion of Mr. Williams prevailed: Ayes 95, nays 89. So the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until Friday week.

On motion of Mr. Cambreleng, the house then went again into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the sub-treasury bill.

Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, resumed the floor, and concluded his remarks in support of the bill; and the bill was further discussed during the remainder of the day's sitting.

CHRONICLE.

From the Canada frontier. The Albany Evening Journal states on the authority of Mr. J. W. Turner, a deputy marshal at Oswego who arrived at Albany on Monday, express from Lewiston, that the patriots of Upper Canada have again made a rally on their own soil—having formed a camp in "Long Swamp," (an extensive marsh lying between Grand Island and Chippewa creek) where they are now fortifying themselves. The nucleus of this force was formed by refugees who crossed over from the United States in parties of twenty or thirty at a time, so as to evade British vigilance, but volunteers are said to be flocking in to them from all quarters. The number entrenched when they were discovered is supposed to be from 200 to 400.

The alarm was instantly given, and an express sent off to Toronto for a regular force to extricate them. This news says the Journal, is very vague—we believe it comes by way of Toronto—but we think it may be substantially relied upon. This evening's western mail will either refute or confirm it.

Another report—Extract from a letter from P. C. H. Brother, esq. to a gentleman in this city, dated Queenston, 14th June, 1838:

"To day the report is, that the patriots are kicking up another fuss with us. It is said that they crossed last night below Lewiston, and are now in the forest between this and St. Catharine."

Correspondence of the Argus.

Watertown, June 13, 1838.

Dear sir: We have nothing of importance in relation to the affairs of the frontier, save the fact just communicated to me, that this morning while the steamer Onelda was passing Wells' island, Johnson, with four men, appeared in his long boat, constructed in such a manner as to equal the speed of the best steamboat. He and his men gave three cheers. It was attempted to be returned on board the steamboat, but was suppressed. Johnson then raised from his boat the flag of the Sir Robert Peel, and a second time gave three cheers, which was also attempted to be returned by some on board the steamboat, but was in like manner suppressed.

Johnson then made off in his boat towards the island. This occurred near the spot where the "Peel" was burnt.

Johnson's retreat being upon Canadian islands, and the speed of his boat surpassing every thing on the lake or river, when seen, all efforts as yet to take him have failed. He states that he will not be taken alive; and that his fastness, if not impregnable, will defy any force that can for some time at least be brought against it.

Our militia, it cannot be expected, would be willing to go upon Canadian ground, and attempt the arrest of these desperate men; but we are hourly in the expectation of the arrival of some regular troops. Colonel Cummings has arrived here, and is waiting the arrival of the troops; and signifies his readiness to aid the civil officers in their efforts to arrest these men at all hazards.

Another seizure. Capt. Homans, in command at Lewiston, has made another valuable seizure of patriot arms. Ninety stand, with bayonets, were found secreted at Dickerson's tavern, six miles from Lewiston, on the Lockport road. They were principally English Tower muskets and United States manufacture.

This indefatigable officer is preventing much mischief. [Buffalo Com. Adv. June 16th.]

Extract of a letter dated Cornwall, U. C., 4th June.

A very bad feeling exists on both sides, all along the frontier; and I am very sorry to say that it is growing worse every day. Sir John Colborne passed this to-day on his way to Quebec. On his arrival there, he will immediately despatch two or three more regiments to this province. He has made arrangements to place the whole frontier in this quarter in a strong state of military defence. Lord Durham is expected here on Wednesday next. He intends making a tour of the Upper Province, and it is currently reported that he intends moving the seat of government from Toronto to Kingston. This is said to have been recommended by Sir George Arthur.

The war department has ordered two steamboats to be chartered—one on lake Erie and one on lake Ontario—each to be manned and armed. The boat on lake Erie will be placed under the command of lieut. J. T. Homans.

Major general Macomb, to whom has been assigned the command of our troops on the northern frontier, left Washington on the 12th instant and is now at his post. The "Globe" has the following remarks on the appointment of general Macomb. "That nothing may be wanting within its power to prevent collision on the frontier, the war department has ordered the first officer of the army to take charge of the force which is drawn together to suppress the marauding parties on the Canada frontier, made up of the disaffected Canadians, joined by a few outlaws from our side of the line. Whatever can be effected by the limited means which the various demands on our small army leave at the disposal of the commanding general, will doubtless be done to crush the border banditti, whose sole object is that of plunder and revenge. It is possible, too, that the inciters of this gang may hope to produce by the predatory warfare, a general hostile feeling on the frontier, which may lead to difficulties which the respective governments may not be able to compose. To prevent such mischief, no one, we are confident, is better adapted than gen. Macomb."

From the Rochester Democrat, June 15.

Rumor of another outrage. We find the following paragraph in the Toronto Patriot of Tuesday afternoon. We have reason to believe that it is true, although it is possible that it is not. We give it as we find it:

"Another division of the pirates is at work on Lake Erie, where a schooner, laden with merchandise belonging to Mr. Chrysler, of Niagara, has been captured. A despatch, announcing this new outrage, arrived in the city last night, but nothing more than the bare fact has transpired."

The Kingston Spectator of Saturday says: "Two steamers were out last night, having troops on board, searching round the islands for the plunderers, and are not yet returned."

Outrage. We are notified to say that Major Webb, the British officer commanding opposite Black Rock, while on a visit to our city yesterday afternoon, was insulted and maltreated by a parcel of worthless fellows, who constituted themselves champions of the national honor! The court of general sessions, now sitting, have called a special grand jury, on motion of the district attorney, for the prompt investigation of the outrage. [Buffalo Advertiser.]

Three of the individuals who made the unmanly attack on Major Webb, of the British army, have been tried and sentenced as follows: O'Brien to thirty days' imprisonment, and a fine of fifty dollars; Kellogg and Emmons to a fine each of seventy-five dollars. [Globe.]

The Albany Evening Journal states that more than two hundred witnesses, residing along the frontier from Plattsburg to Buffalo, are in attendance on the United States district court. Twelve bills of indictment have been found. Among the persons indicted are Dr. Nelson, Mr. Bryant of Portland, Maine, and a young man by the name of Palmer, of Clinton county. McKenzie, against whom an indictment was found before, was in court on Saturday.

It is stated in the Montreal papers that the government steamer Dee was expected there from Quebec with 200 seamen detached from the several ships lying there for service on the Upper Lakes. We may observe en passant that the above steamer Dee, and another government steamer, the Media, have made the passage across the Atlantic this spring from England.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞ The senate have concurred in the resolution of the house fixing upon Monday the 9th of July as the day of adjournment.

☞ The president has recognized Charles H. Forbes as vice consul of Texas for the port of New York.

☞ We have published some interesting particulars relating to the wreck of the Pulaski, but have not yet seen an authentic statement of the lost and saved. It appears that out of eleven passengers from Florida, in the Pulaski, not one is known to be saved.

The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette of Thursday says: "It is with great satisfaction that we can announce the name of another soul saved from the ill-fated Pulaski. It is Mr. Innis (of Philadelphia) of the firm of Okie & Innis. His friends had letters from him yesterday, dated at Wilmington, North Carolina. He was the person unknown, of the thirteen that were last heard from."

He had been "mourned as dead" by his friends at home.

On the 23d inst. a meeting was held at Charleston, S. C., "to adopt some proper course of action in relation to the melancholy accident to the steam boat Pulaski;" his honor, the mayor in the chair. They adopted a memorial to the house of representatives, earnestly requesting, "that no time may be lost in providing, by all the means in (their) power, against the recurrence of similar disasters." The memorial concludes by praying congress, "that a system of rigid inspection to be instituted, under proper officers to be appointed for that purpose, so directed as to secure both in the construction of the hull and machinery of steamboats adequate strength, and to provide not merely for the prudent management of such boats, but for the safety of the passengers in the event of accidents, are measures which, if adopted, and carried into full effect, will greatly tend to the security of the public. Your petitioners trust that your honorable body will not adjourn without making these and such other provisions on this subject, as your wisdom may suggest, and may be best calculated to effect the object in view—an object in which the whole American people have a deep and abiding interest." They also passed a resolution of thanks to capt. Davis, of the Henry Camerton, who rescued several of the passengers.

THE SUB-TREASURY BILL reported to the house of representatives by the committee of ways and means, was rejected on Monday last by a vote of 111 yeas to 125 nays. On the following day Mr. Foster moved a reconsideration of the vote, but the house refused—Ayes 21, nays 205. A detailed account of the proceedings will be found under the proper head.

MORE SEMINOLES. About 700 Seminole Indians, from Florida, arrived at the Fourche bar, about seven miles below town, in the steamboat South Alabama, from New Orleans, last week, and remained there until Monday, the water being too low for the boat to come up. The Indians were then taken on board the Liverpool and Itasca, each with two keel-boats in tow, and proceeded up the river.

The officers in charge of the party are lieutenants Reynolds and Terry, U. S. army, and a small detachment of U. S. troops.

These Indians are a part of the band of the noted chief Micanopy, who accompanies them, as does Cloud and Nocosola, two other noted chiefs. Near one third of the party are negroes, who appear to have been reared among them.

[Little Rock, (Ark.) Gazette.

THE CHEROKEES. Gen. Scott and suite were at Athens, Tenn. on the 9th instant and left on the following day for Fort Butler, North Carolina. The Journal states that about 7,000 of the Cherokees have been collected, 1,000 of whom have set out for their new homes in the west. The general is of opinion that the whole nation can be removed in a short time, unless his operations should be arrested by new arrangements.

Gov. Bagby, of Alabama, has written a letter to secretary of war, refusing the assent of the state to the proposition for allowing the Cherokees further time for removing to the west.

The governor of Alabama (we learn from the Nashville Union,) has issued orders for calling into service fifteen hundred of the militia of that state, five hundred of whom are to be mounted men. The troops are to be mounted, organized, and then discharged, subject to be called into service at a moment's warning. The reason assigned by the governor for this measure is the apprehension of difficulties with the Cherokees. From present appearances there will be no necessity for the services of these, as the Indians are peaceably making their way to the west, under the judicious arrangements of general Scott, without the slightest indications of hostility.

FROM THE CANADA FRONTIER. Major general Macomb, and brigadier general Brady, arrived at Sackett's Harbor on the 16th instant. A Sackett's Harbor paper mentions the arrival of two hundred regular troops under the command of captain Gwynne, of the 1st regiment of infantry, and capt. McCall of the 4th. They are to be followed by others. The object of these movements, it is said, is "to suppress and capture the banditti headed by William Johnson—protect the commerce of the lake and river St Lawrence, and to restore confidence and safety to all the peaceable and quiet inhabitants residing near the dividing line between the two governments."

The steamboat Telegraph has been chartered by general Macomb for the service of the United States, and it is now being armed and manned for the defence of the frontier, to preserve the laws of neutrality, and to aid the civil authorities in the discharge of their duties.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser "says it was generally understood there that the fight at the "Short Hills," noticed in the next page, had its origin in a tavern broil. The lancers were insolent and overbearing, high words were followed by blows, and a general melee ensued, in which several were severely injured and a few killed. There is no evidence that any violence was premeditated by either party, and so far as we can learn, it was purely a casual encounter. It may, however, be but the prelude to fresh troubles. There is no affinity between the resident population of the province and the British soldiers. The latter are looked upon as foreign mercenaries, and we may expect to hear of frequent collisions between them and the people."

The trial of the persons implicated in the burning of the Sir Robert Peel steamer, was to commence at Watertown, Jefferson county, yesterday under judge Cushman. Anderson is the first named on the list.

The attorney general of the state had arrived to assist the district attorney.

The number of British troops on the Niagara frontier is computed at 500. There is a body of U. S. troops at Buffalo. Gen. Brady left there for Detroit on Thursday the 12th instant.

NORTH-EASTERN FRONTIER. The Portland Advertiser states that gen. Wool of the U. S. army, had proceeded to Augusta (Maine) to confer with governor Kent and his council, now in session, on the subject of establishing one or more military posts near the northern frontier. This distinguished officer has been sent by the war department of the United States at the earnest application of gov. Kent, for the purpose of making a reconnoissance and settling suitable positions for the establishment of posts to protect the territory of Maine from foreign aggression. The Advertiser says, "the importance of these improvements will be appreciated by the people of this state, who look to the final adjustment of our boundary line and the border difficulties with increasing anxiety. We trust that the zeal and earnestness with which the matter is pursued by our executive will lead to a speedy conclusion of this protracted controversy."

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c. The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of the presidents of the banks at New Orleans, held on the 16th instant.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the board of presidents of the banks of New Orleans, the first Monday in January should be fixed on as the time of resumption of said banks: Provided, That the United States Bank of Pennsylvania, through its agency in this city, will furnish a general currency, until the establishment of a national bank, or until such other remedial measure be adopted or sustained by the government in relation to the currency as will insure the country and the banks against the deplorable consequences of a second suspension of specie payments by the government and the banks."

New York, June 26. The business in sterling exchange yesterday, for the Great Western, was at a small decline on the rates current on Saturday, the sales having been made at 8 1-2 a 9 per cent. prem. chiefly at 8 3-4 a 9. Some of the banks refused to draw under 9 1-2 per cent. prem., but we have not heard of any transactions at that rate. On France, 5f. 22 was obtained. The amount of exchange on all places going forward by the Great Western has been more limited than was anticipated.

The Dry Dock Bank. We are happy to say that this institution is again in operation. The injunction has been removed by the chancellor, and the stock is above par. All claims against the bank have been liquidated, and in all respects its usefulness is resumed, under very favorable circumstances.

[N. Y. Jour. of Com. Mississippi Union Bank. This institution, with a capital of fifteen millions, five hundred thousand dollars, gives heavy salaries to its officers. The Natchez Courier says, that it gives to

H. G. Runnels, President,	$10,000
—Gildart, Bank Attorney,	10,000
Samuel Gwin, Cashier,	8,000
—Greenleaf, Ass't. do.	6,000
—Wyatt, Teller,	8,000
—Price, Clerk.	2,000

Total, $39,000

The Girard Bank of Philadelphia has given notice that it will redeem the notes of the Union Bank of Tennessee which are made payable at Baltimore, Philadelphia or New York.

The State Bank of Illinois has declared a half yearly dividend of five dollars a share.

The Union Bank of Maryland has declared a dividend of three per cent. for the last six months.

The Farmers and Planters' Bank has also declared a dividend of three per cent. for the last six months.

Tennessee money market. The Nashville Whig of the 20th instant has the following quotations of the rates of exchange:

U. S. Bank,	10 a 11 pr.
Specie,	10 a 11 do
Kentucky,	8 a 9 do
Virginia,	8 a 9 do
N. Orleans,	5 a 6 do
Indiana,	8 a 9 do
Illinois,	7 a 8 do
Carolinas and Georgia,	2 1-2 a 3 do
Alabama,	par a 3 dis.
Small do	12 dis.

The New York Journal of Commerce of Wednesday, says—

"The sales of the stock exchange indicate an advance of not above one or two per cent. on an average, as compared with prices before the rejection of the sub-treasury bill was known here. The explanation is, that this result has been confidently anticipated, and so the chief advance took place before the vote was taken.

Private banking. We understand that the $50,000,000 bank which has been projected here under the general banking law, is soon to go into operation, and that J. W. Olcott, esq. of Albany, has been chosen president and accepted the appointment.

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The whig convention, which assembled at Concord on the 20th inst., nominated gen. James Wilson as a candidate for governor, and the following gentlemen as candidates for congress: Rockingham district, JOHN PORTER, of Derry. Stafford do JOHN EASTMAN, of Conway. Hillsborough do A. COLBY, of New London. Cheshire do PHINEAS HANDENON, of Keene. Grafton & Coos do JONATHAN SMITH, of Bath.

The election for governor takes place in March next, and for representatives to congress in November.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, JUNE 23, 1838. The board of captains in the navy, convened in Baltimore, on the 28th ultimo, for the examination of midshipmen, adjourned on the 22d instant.

The following is the list of the midshipmen who passed in the order of rank assigned them by the board, after a careful consideration of their several qualifications, and all other circumstances which it became the duty of the board to weigh:

NAVAL GENERAL ORDER. The armament of the exploring expedition being adapted merely for its necessary defence while engaged in the examination and survey of the islands of the Southern ocean, against any attempts to disturb its operations by the savage and warlike inhabitants of those islands; and that the objects which it is destined to promote being altogether scientific and useful, intended for the benefit, equally, of the United States and of all the commercial nations of the world, it is considered to be entirely divested of all military character, that, even in the event of the country being involved in a war before the return of the squadron, its path upon the ocean will be peaceful and its pursuits respected by all belligerents.

The president has, therefore, thought proper, in assigning officers to the command of this squadron, to depart from the usual custom of selecting them from the senior ranks of the navy, and according to their respective grades in the service, and has appointed lieutenant Charles Wilkes first officer to command the exploring squadron, and lieutenant Wm. L. Hudson to command the ship Peacock, and the second officer of said squadron; and to take command thereof in the event of the death of the first officer, or his disability from accident or sickness to conduct the operations of the expedition.

MAHLON DICKERSON.

Navy department, June 22, 1838.

OFFICIAL. The following paper has been officially communicated to the department of state.

Vienna, May 30, 1838.

SIR: In my official note of the 8th of April last, I reserved to myself the power of communicating to you, at a proper time, the result of the steps which I had hastened to take in the proper departments of the interior, for the purpose of modifying essentially, if not of abolishing entirely, the measures with regard to health, and the precautions hitherto employed in the ports of his imperial and royal catholic majesty, with regard to vessels coming from the United States of North America.

My efforts have not been fruitless; and I have this day the pleasure to announce to you, sir, that the said departments have just made, the following dispositions:

Vessels coming from the United States of America provided with clean bills of health, shall be immediately admitted to free entry, (pratique libre.) On the other hand, those which do not bring a clean bill of health shall be subjected to a quarantine of ten or five days respectively, according as the merchandise with which they are laden may be found to belong to the class of objects susceptible of being tainted by the contagious miasma or not.

As to vessels arriving in summer with clean bills of health, they shall be freed from all precautionary quarantine.

I should add that the orders necessary for carrying these measures into execution, have already been despatched to the imperial government of Trieste.

In the hope that I have thus satisfied, so far as depended upon myself, the desire expressed by you on the part of the government of the United States of North America, I have only, sir, to repeat the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

(Signed) METTERNICH.

To Mr. Nathaniel Niles,
Diplomatic agent of the United States.

MOVEMENT OF TROOPS. A detachment of between 60 and 70 U. S. troops, under command of lieutenant W. G. Freeman, 4th artillery, destined for the northern frontier, left Fort Monroe on Saturday last, in the packet-schooner Thaddeus, for New York.

All remaining disposable recruits in New York (190) left that station on Thursday last, for Sackett's Harbor, under command of captain T. P. Gwynne, of the 1st, and capt. G. A. McCall, of the 4th infantry.

A company of 60 recruits, under command of capt. J. Dimick, 1st artillery, arrived at Troy, N. Y., on Tuesday morning, 12th inst. and took passage on one of the canal packets for Whitehall, on their way to Plattsburg.

Lieuts. Carpenter and Lynch have returned in the steam ship Great Western, arrived at New York, and the former reached this city on Monday evening.

We understand that col. Sylvanus Thayer will resume his former station as superintendent of the military academy, at the close of the present examination.

Capt. Charles W. Skinner has been appointed to the command of the steam ship Fulton, now at the navy yard in this city, during the absence of capt. M. C. Perry. [Army and Navy Chron.
